THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, April 30, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we have today a brief from the Family Service Association of Montreal. On my right is Mrs. Carlyle Johnston; she is a social worker, member of the Board of Directors, Chairman of Public Issues Committee and a board member of other social agencies. Next to her is Mr. Robert Davis, a social worker, who is Supervisor of an outpost office in an urban renewal area. Next is the Rev. R. W. Johnson, who is a member of the Board of Directors and Executive Director of Tyndale House. There is also present Mr. Jean Back, who is a member of the Family Service Association, Geriatric Group, a member of the Senior Citizens Forum Committee, and instigator of several social action projects; he is a client of the agency.

Mrs. Johnston will make a short statement, followed by Mr. Davis, Rev. Johnson and Mr. Back, and then we will start the questioning period.

Mrs. M. Carlyle Johnston, Chairman, Public Issues Committee, Family Service Association of Montreal: Thank you Mr. Chairman. You have the brief before you, which is a summary in form. It runs to only two or three pages and represents a consensus of opinion of a number of groups and individuals within the Family Service Association. As you can see by the attached appendices, Family Service represents a cross-section in every sense, in terms of experience and approach.

The Chairman: I neglected to mention the fact that some other ladies and gentlemen have come along. They are very welcome and may participate at a later stage. Go ahead Mrs. Johnston.

Mrs. Johnston: I would like to suggest that in place of presenting the usual summary of the brief itself. I would now like Rev. Johnson to represent a number of different voices, I call on several members of the committee or persons associated with the agency to speak to the brief itself. I would now like Rev. Johnson to comment.

The Rev. R. W. Johnson, Executive Director, Tyndale House: In the Family Service Association brief, the preamble makes this statement:

...future policy making by the Canadian Government concerning the question of poverty in this nation should be cognizant of the critical breakdown in family life especially among poor families because of economic, educational, social condition and polity, and, thereby, should bring together the resources and technology available today to better integrate the basic functions of urban life to assure that man's inalienable right to be human is not destroyed.

To that statement I might add that there are three foundation problems among the under-privileged person. The first has to do often with a self-depreciation image which is imposed upon by a middle class society. The second is the absence of social structures whereby the unbelievable human benefit the modern world has created and amassed can be channelled into the lives of these people. Thirdly, the underprivileged people of our society are deprived of any real means of participating in the decision-making processes and the concrete social activity whereby their practical destiny is determined.

Civilization in Canada is not advancing, because their problems go unanswered. I submit that only a comprehensive approach to total community reformulation will afford a rational strategy for answering these human problems. The problem of the inner hard core of the city has today become very much a psychological problem, and the underprivileged live and act out of a sub-standard image, a reaction of social forces which are constantly beyond their control.

Secondly, there is the non-existence of adequate functional social structures by which humanness is mediated to individual persons. Surface problems are myriad, multiple, medical, educational, housing, jobs, urban services, and so forth. Underneath all of these is the lack of local social structures whereby solutions already invented can be made available to the underprivileged. I submit that they are pawns in a vast bureaucratic vehicle.

Thirdly, the underprivileged have no means whereby they have a sense of doing something that will make any difference in their personal lives. The imperative to reduce poverty must be a comprehensive one. The fragmented approach with one project here and another there, unrelated by any common model is, to quote one source, "...but sophisticated benevolence, never penetrating to the real issues of being human."

There are methods necessary to draw together a real human community in our urban centres throughout Canada. First, there must be the intentional employment of positive symbols in specific geographical areas that are recognized by human beings wherever they might be. We all know of that positive symbol that is raised up in the middle class, that of money. These symbols would be employed through forums, assemblies, posters, community decor, and a positive psychological image for human beings in the neighbourhood.

The second method that should be a possibility is the creation of grass root social structures. They don't exist. That is, to analyze human problems in a particular area, and next to bring local social structures into being so they can feel and identify the particular problems of the underprivileged.

We must continue the above breakdown until all human problems are covered. That is to say, the local structures are the instruments whereby the benefits of our technical society become available to all persons, especially at the grass roots level of our society. Existing structures are not necessarily replaced: they serve them in an important function.

The third aspect in terms of method has to do with community organizations. This is noted in our brief, and further comment will be made in that regard by Mr. Davis.

In conclusion, what I would submit is that the comprehensive community re-development is a necessary strategy for dealing with the tragedies of poverty in this country. Fragmental approaches that have been continued over the past 50 years will never succeed. To make this concern for poverty a political game is also disastrous. Building a model for humanness in a dehumanized society is the order of the day. It must begin now or the year 2000 will note the vast waste of human energies and resources in our concern today for poverty.

Mr. R. A. Davis, Supervisor, Little Burgundy Office, Family Service Association of Montreal: The backbone of our recommendations is, I think, a recommendation for a guaranteed income that would also have an escalator clause according to the cost of living index.

I thought maybe I could say a few words about how we came to this conclusion. It really comes out of our experience with people we know who are presently having to deal with the welfare system as it presently exists, and what this does to them to have to do this. Mrs. McIntyre is here today and she will be able to speak very eloquently, I think, to this later on. I just want to say a few words about one aspect of this, to give an example of what people have to contend with in the way the welfare system hassles them.

The present welfare system has many flaws that even appear equitable and humane to an administrator of welfare, but which in practice really make welfare a reign of terror for the recipients. It is hard to describe how really terrified and how really frightened they are. A case in point is the attempt on the part of welfare officials to ensure that everyone receives the same treatment. They sometimes get criticism that recipients are favorites of certain workers or certain investigators. In order to deal with this they make a system which consists of giving each person who enters the office a number; the numbers are assigned to the investigators on a random basis, so that any time you have business at the welfare office you are talking to someone different each time you come in.

On the surface this appears to be a reasonable and fair way to deal with the charge of favoritism, but in actual practice there are workers who are known to be harsh and punitive, and they make contacting a welfare office for a welfare recipient a little bit like playing Russian roulette. They don't know who they are going to get next, and when they come to the office it might be one of these people who would actually review their budget and cut their welfare grant rather than give them the additional thing that they came to the office for. People are afraid to go to welfare offices because they don't know who they are going to see next. I think this is a realistic fear, because many times this has happened.

Another practice is the pretence of reviewing a person's needs and formulating a model budget. Even the budgets that are drawn up fall far short of the standards of decency; worse than this, in many instances, the actual grant bears no relationship to the budgeting process. They go through this big, long thing of making out a budget, and when they get down to figuring the grant they don't even take the budget into consideration. People think, "Oh, I have been through the budget; these must meet my needs." This is a decoy really. The people making the grant know what that grant is going to be beforehand, and welfare officials even sometimes openly admit that many times that grant is $5 or $10 short of what their scales even call for. Many times they will admit they are giving people $5 or $10 less than the scale says that they should have.

I will not go on to some of these other points about welfare, because I think Mrs. McIntyre can speak very well to that much better than I could. I also have Mrs. Boyd here. These are people who live in the area where I work. Mrs. Boyd is not on welfare, but I think she can tell you what it is like to have a low income and not be on welfare, because in many respects some of the stresses of people who are not on welfare but have a low income experience are every bit as great as those of people who are on welfare, and sometimes their security is less. I hope they will have an opportunity to speak a little later on.

Mr. Jean Back, Geriatric Group, Family Service Association of Montreal: To set the mood for the things I would like to present here I would like to read a letter which appeared some time ago in the Montreal Star. It was written by a certain Mr. Spencer, Ste. Rose.

HARD PICKINGS FOR PENSIONERS
Now that Mr. Benson has a surplus in the old age pension fund, the Members of Parliament want an increase on their $18,000 of which $6,000 is tax free.

I don't belong to any union, so I can't strike.

I got a $1.58 per month increase in my old age pension and a $7.00 increase in my rent because the landlord had to pay higher taxes and $8.00 per hour for a plumber.

When will they invent a pill that will bring swift, painless death for anyone over 65 that wants it?

It represents a mood of people who live exclusively on old age pensions. If I may continue for a moment, it is a question of building houses to house older couples especially. First, to build these houses will take years; there will be waiting lists, and meanwhile old couples spend their last cents to maintain the apartments in which they have lived for years or life. They are accustomed to a certain sector of the town, and taking these people out of the centre would make them feel like displaced persons, so I would plead for help to help these people pay the rents and let them stay in their old apartments, where they are accustomed to live, as long as they are able to continue on their own. I am sure that if the Government and other agencies worked in helping them in this way, it would be much simpler and easier than putting these people into homes and taking them out of their environment and putting them, most of the time, in places out of town or past the limits of the town. I have a statement from a bus driver who comes from outside of town during the period from the 1st to the 10th of the month: "The bus downtown and coming out is full of old people, and after the 10th there are no more old people in my bus simply because these people can't afford to travel around."

Then I would like to launch a real protest against the statement by the Finance Minister when he said it was possible for people to live in Canada on $30 per week. I find this statement impertinent and true. It might be possible for some retired lumber jacks and hillbillies who dwell outside in the bush to live on $30 per week, but not for people living in towns and cities—or what is called living for these people. The average old age pensioner does not get $30 per week. A finance genius like the Finance Minister cannot count. He said each quarter has not 12 weeks but 13. Their three pay cheques cover 12 weeks at $30, so what are they to live on the 13th week? They should send their expense account to Mr. Benson, who has the highest education in the country, and they might get along with that. Insulting people by saying "You can" means, "I dictate you have to live on $30."

Another statement is by Mr. Alan Borovoy, General Counsel of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association:

"The poor on welfare seem to have fewer rights than some of the most dangerous criminals in society."

I bring this up because twice during the last month I heard from older people the opinion, "Why shouldn't I commit a larceny so they put me in prison? In prison I have not the troubles I have while living on my old age pension."

People who have passed their lives honestly and haven't had conflict with the police or the law receive barely $1,200 per year, and the Government spends for crooks, criminals and assassins in the prisons over $6,000 per head. What is the reason to be an honest citizen when the criminals are pampered and the old age pensioner neglected, and even insulted? With this system of helping the criminals and neglecting the old age pensioners, does Canada behave like a civilized country.

Senator Croll: Are you finished.

Mr. Back: If you want, yes.

Senator Croll: We will get back to you again. You will have an opportunity as we go along. Mrs. Johnston will see that you are heard from. She will indicate when she wants us to call on you.

Who is Mrs. Dorothy McIntyre? You sit where you are and let us hear from you.

Mrs. Dorothy McIntyre, Citizens' Group: I am a welfare recipient. I receive welfare once a month, and it is $213.00 a month.

The Chairman: How many children have you?

Mrs. McIntyre: I have five children.

The Chairman: Ages?

Mrs. McIntyre: Eighteen, 15, 14, 9, and my little nephew is 13, he is retarded. We have to live off that, and my daughters go to high school. $213.00! I have to send my daughters to high school, I have to buy their lunches, plus any other thing they need.

Senator Fournier: You are paying rent also?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes, out of that money. My heating, light, everything has to come out of that. We just don't live; we exist. Anything extra the school will furnish if I send them a letter stating that we need certain things, but we have to write a letter.

The Chairman: What do you mean? Warm lunches at the school or clothes?

Mrs. McIntyre: We have to pay for that.

The Chairman: For the warm lunches?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: At noon or...

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes, at lunch.

The Chairman: How much do you pay?

Mrs. McIntyre: Well, my daughters eat heavy. Sometimes it is 21 cents and sometimes 30 cents; it all depends.

The Chairman: Could you ask for clothes, too, from the school?

Mrs. McIntyre: No. Not in high school. If you do the children feel embarrassed, because you have to wait, and they take you down to the store like a little child and fit the things on you, and this is it. The girls are taking up dressmaking, and again you have to send a letter to school stating they need the material, and they will give them the money vouchers to go to the stores, but still not the best, it has to be within reason.

Senator Pearson: Does your 18-year old go to high school, too?

Mrs. McIntyre: My daughter is graduating.

Senator Pearson: Your son.

Mrs. McIntyre: I have a retarded nephew, I said.

The Chairman: How old is the baby?

Mrs. McIntyre: He is 13 years old. We have to pay, believe it or not, $2 a year. Even they know I am under welfare. They sent me three notices for $2.

The Chairman: For what?

Mrs. McIntyre: That is their annual fees.

The Chairman: Annual fees for what? They charge you, do they?

Mrs. McIntyre: This is it; they know we are under welfare.

Senator McGrand: What do the hot lunches consist of?

Mrs. McIntyre: Well, it all depends what they have on the menu that day. My children are allowed 50¢ a day.

Senator McGrand: What is in the hot lunches?

Mrs. McIntyre: Well, sometimes it's meat with potatoes, spaghetti, it all depends.

The Chairman: That $2 is membership in the retarded organization; isn't it?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Mrs. McIntyre: In November, I asked for a stove and they sent me down a worker from the city. He examined my house, he questioned me, did I really need the stove? He had to go down to the kitchen to look at the inside of my old stove to believe me, to see if it was really needed. Finally I was told to try and get a stove of my own. I phoned different places for a secondhand stove. I got the stove, then I had to 'phone and tell the man about it. The stove cost $31. The installation was $60. On my file he has $130 for the stove. Now if I need anything else I can't get it because I have $130.00 marked on my file.

Senator Pearson: Why $130?

Mrs. McIntyre: That is what the investigator marked that he paid for the stove.

The Chairman: You say in effect it was less than that?

Mrs. McIntyre: Actually it was less. It was $91, but he put $130 to get paid for it.

Mr. Davis: Tell him all the expenses.

Mrs. McIntyre: Well, there are so many expenses. You can ask whichever one you want and...

The Chairman: Well, we will get into that in a little while. Any other aspect Mrs. McIntyre?

Mrs. McIntyre: When we go to get things from the welfare it is very hard to get it at times. They tell you you have to watch your budget and everything else. You don't always get it, and sometimes you need clothing. If you go, like I do, to the Family Service they try to help you one way or the other, or I have to go to Rev. Johnson here or go down to the school. This is the way we get our clothing, and sometimes pay a fast bill; it's through that.

The Chairman: We will get back to you again. Mrs. Gladys Boyd?

Mrs. Gladys Boyd, Citizens Committee, Little Burgundy: I have written mine down—I hope you will bear with me—because I was afraid I'd forget something. I am not accustomed to being in this kind of company.

I am a Canadian, born and brought up in Montreal, and a resident in Little Burgundy, in the low income bracket. I represent the Citizens Committee of Little Burgundy; Secretary-Treasurer; Board of Directors, Negro Community Centre; Little Burgundy Council Treasurer; Little Burgundy Co-op Secretary and Organizer, WRAP—which stands for Welfare Rights and Anti Poverty—Organizer, Housing Committee for Little Burgundy, and reporter for Up To The Neck, a paper published by the University Settlement. This may sound impressive, but it just means there are a lot of people that I make contact with; I don't receive salary for any of these jobs. It's purely voluntary.

I can't get work; I am too old at 59. I can't get the old age pension because I am too young. I am capable of doing a good day's work, and I am willing to do it. In order to live I have to rent three rooms and have three foster children. The roomers and children give me annually $3,740; out of this I have to house seven people, feed four people, haircuts, car fare, recreation for four people, medical, dental, glasses and clothing for one.

Now, I receive this amount annually provided all the rooms are rented for the whole year. I had one empty for two weeks in January. A lady died and it took me two weeks to rent it. I have one leaving on May 5, who is being rehabilitated with her children and has got a home, and I don't know if I will rent it right away or not. I mean, this is annually, but it's less than that if I don't keep them rented.

I have to heat 11 rooms, supply gas for four people to cook, electricity for 11 rooms, hallways and entrances, phone, wear and tear on linens, floor coverings, curtains, drapes, blinds, furniture and so on, water rates, fire insurance which is spiralling up on account of these riots and what have you, repairs and upkeep of the building, school taxes and municipal taxes.

In order to meet these expenses I have had to go into my life's savings each month. Even with careful planning—and I live modestly, don't drink or smoke—when I pay my taxes this year there will be enough money left in my account just to keep it open. My savings will not last another five years until I get my old age pension, so my situation looks grim from here. All I can see is in two or three years losing my home, that I worked so hard for when I was young so that I would have security when I got older, my savings gone and in a room somewhere.

Please, don't strip me of my dignity and human rights as a Canadian. I cannot afford the luxuries of a doctor or a lawyer. If the poor and the aged are sick they usually let it take its course until it either gets better by itself or, in many cases, they are carried out in an ambulance or to the morgue. If they are one of the lucky ones who can get someone to drive them to the hospital, or they have the car fare to get there, they sit for hours waiting for their name to be called. Have you ever gone through a hospital clinic waiting room and seen the old tired faces, the lonely dejected faces, the discouraged and the worried faces? If you haven't, walk through and take time to look and say "Thank God that's not my mother, wife or child there." But for the grace of God it could be.

Poor people are exploited daily by merchants and all kinds of people out to get a fast buck. They don't know their rights and cannot afford a lawyer, therefore they pay many times more than what the article cost. If a lawyer's letter comes, or the bailiff, they are helpless. Just like our little seal cubs up north, they don't stand a chance.

If a poor person gets picked up by the law, he can't raise the bail so he stays in goal. The affluent citizen pays his bail and walks out. I've been working with citizens' groups in order to try to find a cure for our ills in our area of Little Burgundy. We need a health and dental clinic so that there will not be the long waiting, the car fare and distances to travel in inclement weather. We need a law office so that the poor can feel they have somewhere to go and find out their rights and know they will have someone who will listen and try to help.

We have plenty of doctors, lawyers and dentists who are willing to give their time and skills to help us, but we need the tools. Churchill once said, "Give us the tools and we'll do the job." And I say, give us the tools and we'll do the job. Please help us to help ourselves.

The municipal government and provincial government make housing code laws and don't enforce them. The result is that the poor are being exploited by paying rent for hovels. Why make laws if they are not enforced?

Welfare and low income citizen groups are organizing all over the country, and very much so in Montreal, for the purpose of securing the following human rights: the right to information, right to representation, a decent suitable or a guaranteed annual income, adequate housing and subsidized rental, education, including adult education and training, complete health and medical services to all, and to those in need assistance regardless of circumstances, the right to control one's life in dignity, including material resources and services.

In closing, please don't wait until we get too angry. I'm sorry.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mrs. Boyd. I am sorry that circumstances are such that you had to put yourself in this position. We hope that will not last.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman and members of the association, we are very glad to have you with us this morning. Perhaps I should tell you that there are times when we may be asking questions that you might not appreciate. I want you to know that the questions we may be asking do not express our actual feeling. We are trying to find out what you are thinking of such a situation. Do not judge us by the questions we may be asking. We are not expressing our feelings. We have been on this for quite some time and have heard all kinds of stories such as we heard this morning. We feel awfully sorry and hope we can achieve doing something about it. I don't know how long it will take, but that is our purpose.

Having said that, I think there are many questions to be asked here, and I will start with the statement that the main criticism of our social security system today relates to its failure with respect to anti-poverty objectives. The Economic Council has pointed the issue of poverty in Canada when it stated in its fifth review that the numbers are not in the thousands, but in the millions.

What I want to say about it is that—I am going to try to be as brief as possible—we in Canada, in my time anyway, we have lived through three wars: 1914, when I was rather young; 1940 to 1944, when I was a young man and played what part I could, and then the Korean War. Throughout these wars, in Canada we have seen great prosperity. The country has never been damaged or hurt by war itself. Everybody worked. Everybody was making money while people of the European countries were being slaughtered; some 200 million had to pay the supreme sacrifice, not including six million Hebrews who were massacred. It was probably the worst time in the history of human life. All through this we never suffered. We slept quietly at nights. We were not afraid of bombs or anything like that. Everybody worked; everybody made money. Yet we find that most of the countries that suffered the most have recovered, while here in Canada, after all these years of prosperity, we have to admit today that we have been a failure. We find, according to the Economic Council, as I read this brief, the numbers affected are not in thousands but in millions. In your opinion, where was the failure? We failed somewhere. We can't hide it. We have to admit it. Even today almost everybody seems to think we have great prosperity on Canadian soil. Where is the failure? What was done wrong?

Mr. Davis: I will say something to it. I think everybody else may have a different idea. Let me give an example right now which may illustrate what I think about it. For instance, there is now a program in the area where I am working, Little Burgundy, for housing, for redevelopment of the area.

Senator Fournier: Before you go farther, would you tell us about this Little Burgundy? What area?

Mr. Davis: This is the area in Montreal which is bounded on the north by St. Antoine Street, on the south by the Lachine Canal, on the east by Guy Street and on the west by Atwater. In other words, it is just a little bit west of downtown and fairly close to the river. It's an old area of the city, and when the Trans-Canada Highway came through this area they decided they were going to have urban renewal in Little Burgundy because of the poor housing there. Well, there is no doubt there is some poor housing in the area.

What they are doing doesn't, sometimes, meet the expectations of the residents; it meets the expectations of middle class people for their kind of housing. I think many residents would like an upgrading of the places they have, because they are low income people and cannot afford the big kind of rents they are going to be charged when they have nice places. They just can't afford that, so we have an area of urban renewal, and it's nice.

What is built is nice. They have already completed part of it called St. Martin's block. It is very nice housing and the people living there like it. There are to be four more areas like this. I don't think it is a bad thing, but I want to point out an aspect of it.

Senator Fournier: You are referring to the high apartment buildings?

Mr. Davis: No, they are not high. It's really been thought through; it is well planned and I think it is as good a program of urban renewal as I have seen or know of anywhere. Of course, I am not a great expert on it, but I haven't seen anything better anywhere.

The thing I want to point out about it is that, first of all there are only going to be four small areas in which this will happen. The rest of it is to be privately developed, and the people that are to live there are going to have to pay a high rent. There are poor people living there now, they are going to get pushed out. I don't think they are as well aware of that as they should be.

The thing I want to point out is that $150 million has been allocated. I know this may not sound a big sum to people used to budgeting in terms of millions sometimes, but for a small area like this it's a lot of money. That $150 million is going to go into the pockets of workmen who don't live in Little Burgundy; it is going to go into the pockets of contractors who don't live in Little Burgundy; it is going to go into the pockets of a lot of people. It is creating a lot of jobs for middle class people, but the people of Little Burgundy just are not seeing any of that $150 million.

If you took $150 million and simply invested it in a trust fund it would probably yield about $5,000 per year per family for the people living in Little Burgundy, and that would do them some good. That is not what the thing is all about. It isn't for them really. There has always been this core of people that all the prosperity has never been for. It has never been for them; it has been for other people and to create jobs for them.

Senator Fournier: What is the population in Little Burgundy, roughly speaking?

Mr. Davis: It's about 14,000.

Senator Pearson: How many families?

Rev. Johnson: Well, we will give you a breakdown on the St. Martin's block, where the housing renewal has gone on. It works out in this district to 1,200 people and 300 families. You can probably use that ratio throughout the whole area.

Senator Fournier: Let us go back to our question of where we failed.

Mr. Davis: The point I was making on it was this. We failed when we say 'We' we are talking about us, not Mrs. McIntyre and Mrs. Boyd and Mr. Back—because we create these jobs for ourselves and we create the prosperity for ourselves. Anybody who can't fit into that is on the outside. That is where we failed. We failed to open up and be willing to...

Rev. Johnson: It is a very complex situation which deals with decision-making at one level. We use Little Burgundy as an example. When the provincial government said they were going to build the Trans-Canada Highway with federal assistance, they came in there a few years ago and told people, "You have five weeks to get out of your houses". They got out of their houses in five weeks without any help from the government to find another place to live in the city on a low income. Today, that highway is suspended in the air; it's part of the break off area of the Trans-Canada Highway. Eight hundred people were thrown out of their houses in a matter of weeks so they could demolish all the slums, but that area is blank today, nothing but rubble all the way along.

That is the kind of decision-making that goes on constantly, that brings social forces to bear upon people who have nothing to say about that kind of thing. If you want a word for it, it is a lack of human kindness or compassion and consideration for what happens when you want to build a highway and then find you don't have the funds. You can think, "In that district, what the hell does it matter to all those people there? They can be shoved all over because they are just slum dwellers." Now, that is the problem.

Senator Fournier: Is that the highway that is not finished?

Rev. Johnson: That is the highway that is not finished and hasn't been for three years, and it may be seven more before it is. Maybe the Liberals now will take care of it.

The Chairman: Mrs. Gordon, have you anything to add to this? It was suggested that you might have.

Mrs. Joan Gordon, Public Issues Committee, Family Services Association of Montreal: I have a great many things to add.

The Chairman: Well, just a few now in answer to the question put by Senator Fournier.

Mrs. Gordon: We fail to give the poor what they really need—love and respect. We haven't given them money, but we certainly haven't given them love or respect. We send them to the hospitals and they become numbers. We send them to the clothes depots which are staffed by church auxiliaries and once again they become numbers. They go there but they don't say what they need; they are told what they can have; there isn't any choice; there is no freedom of choice. If one goes in and asks what one could have for a child, one can't have it because that isn't on the list of needs that the social worker has given them. These things are what really hurt the poor, and they really do suffer, not only from the lack of money but from this lack of love and respect.

The Chairman: Mrs. Gordon, you are a social worker?

Mrs. Gordon: Yes.

The Chairman: Trained?

Mrs. Gordon: I am trained at the undergraduate level.

The Chairman: You are a social worker?

Mrs. Gordon: Yes.

The Chairman: Why, as a social worker, don't you practise what they teach you in the school of social science and provide what these people want rather than what you, carrying out the instructions of some department, say they ought to have?

Mrs. Gordon: It is perfectly true that social workers have failed the people too in some ways, because we have been working with them on an individual basis and have used up our energy on our 38 or 40 cases a year, working with those cases and using ourselves up, eating out of the bureaucratic structure that entangles us.

I have been working with a family with eight children, the father having a marginal income. This man is ill; I sent him to the hospital, where he spent a whole day, lost a day's pay and was told to go home and take aspirin. A few more weeks would go by and he would be ill again. Because of the impossibility of getting this man into a Montreal hospital we finally had him admitted to a chronic hospital outside Montreal where his wife couldn't see him. We discovered that he was suffering from chronic protein malnutrition and chronic anxiety—the two diseases of the poor. His children were being treated with strong psychiatric drugs at the Children's Hospital for bed wetting, and really they were wetting their beds because they were afraid of cockroaches and had no blankets.

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, do you have any further questions before we go on?

Senator Fournier: I will pass on to others.

Senator Fergusson: First I would just like to say that we realize that this is a tremendous effort on behalf of many people who are speaking to us today and we appreciate it very much. I hope they remember that the members of the committee are only people like themselves, and although we may not always sound it we are very sympathetic with your point of view. If we ask questions that perhaps sound not as compassionate as you think they should be, it is because we feel we have to know all these things and we have to ask questions about them.

Mr. Davis said that some social workers are "harsh and punitive". Is this an exception or does this happen very often? Further, when people like you, Mr. Davis, or other social workers, learn of that sort of thing, do you not try to report those who act this way, and if you do, does it have any effect?

Mr. Davis: Well, I think maybe Mrs. McIntyre could speak to how many people there are better than I could.

Mrs. McIntyre: In what way, Mr. Davis? You mean the welfare people?

Mr. Davis: You know, there are some that are good and some that aren't.

Mrs. McIntyre: Some of them are understanding; they try to help you, but it has to go to someone else. You see, they come to see you; they ask you all kinds of questions, and then they take the report back to the office.

Senator Fergusson: Yes, but Mr. Davis said some of them are "harsh and punitive". I would like to know if the majority of them are like that or if it is only the exception.

Mrs. McIntyre: You will find a few, really. They come into your house and they insult you, they ask you all kinds of questions. It is embarrassing at times.

Mr. Davis: There are all kinds of social workers in terms of their training, too. When I mentioned social workers being harsh and punitive, what I had in mind—although Mrs. McIntyre may have other things in mind—were some of the investigators with the Welfare Department, many of whom have very little training. Sometimes these are patronage jobs, I think. I think myself that there is a design to the fact that some of them are chosen and left in positions where they are harsh and punitive. I think this tends to reduce the number of people eligible for grants; it also tends to reduce the grants and to be a money saving thing because I think each local office of the Department of Welfare—although they will deny this to the sky—has a quota of how much money they can spend in a year, how much they can give out in grants. Therefore, if so many eligible people come to them they have to screen them out, and they have to have people like that in order to do it. I think it is the system that does this to people. I think it makes people harsh and punitive.

Senator Fournier: What would be the average age limit of those inspectors? Do you know, roughly

Mr. Davis: In the Welfare Department?

Senator Fournier: Yes.

Mr. Davis: Age limit?

Senator Fournier: Where do you find the toughest one? In the older age bracket or the younger? Do you think a younger fellow would be tougher on a poor family than an older one?

Mrs. McIntyre: It all depends, sir.

Mr. Davis: She can answer that.

Mrs. McIntyre: When a young married man who has small children comes to see you he will try his best. Then you may get one who is older, who will not listen to you, he is very rude to you, very insulting.

The Chairman: You are speaking, of course, of clerks rather than social workers?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes, clerks.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson has the floor.

Mr. Davis: I don't know whether we answered the question. The other part of it was what? Do we do anything about it?

Senator Fergusson: Yes.

Mrs. Johnston: If I may make a comment, we have met with the City Welfare Department from time to time and raised these concerns. There was a meeting, I think, a year ago. How effective has it been? I think Mrs. Siegel and Mrs. Prince, who are social workers with clients, deal on this basis more closely with the Welfare Department.

Mrs. McIntyre: Excuse me. In November this investigator went through my house, and even opened up the stove.

Mrs. Johnston: I wonder if Mrs. Siegel or Mrs. Prince have a comment to make on relations with the City Welfare Department?

Mrs. Lillian Siegel, Public Issues Committee, Family Service Association of Montreal: A part of the problem is the feeling of helplessness we all have. As this lady was saying, we are just citizens, and again we are just social workers. We have to refer our clients to the Legal Aid Department, and if they are treated poorly what can we do? Our hands are tied as well. We try our best. We feel the same way you do after hearing these ladies. We identify with the clients; we feel for them, but what can we do? This is why I am wondering if we can deal with this here. What are we prepared to do now? Are we prepared to look at this guaranteed annual income solution, which may do away with this investigator kind of approach? We do meet with the Department of Welfare, and luckily we solve some problems, but they will also say we have to go to Quebec or depend on other officials.

The Chairman: Mrs. Prince, have you anything to add to what Mrs. Siegel has said?

Mrs. Ellen Prince, Public Issues Committee, Family Service Association of Montreal: Yes. I think there has been a willingness by the welfare departments to share. However, I think the kind of representative we need is an unusual person in this position because of the need for particular training or capacities for liaison work. These are very few such people, and they themselves will say that they face an overwhelming job in relaying this kind of human approach down all the echelons of clerks who are low paid, and so on. They are aware of the problem, but I think at the same time they would say it is a bit more than they can cope with.

I would like to comment on something that we are tossing around. It is rather a point of view that in some ways I think those who administer the City Welfare are really almost defending the coffers. You may apply, and, if you prove a good case, may finally get yourself through the door and eligible. But it is as though they are defending something, and somehow or other I think this is where some of the anger and feelings of punitive treatment arise. They are defending something they don't basically see that the average citizen has a right to until they prove they have a very good case. This is the position from which I believe they operate.

Mr. Davis: I would like to add one thing in answer to Senator Fergusson's question. This is a hard question for us to really come to grips with—"Why don't we do something about it?" I think it has a little bit to do with risk taking; it is a selective process that eliminates people. It just basically gets them fired or pushed out of positions where they are able to make human decisions.

Let me give you an example. I might as well name names around here. There was an incident recently in the St. Martin's block in which there were difficulties between some City employees and some children from the family of one of the residents; a fight developed and the matter went to court. One of the employees in the Habitation Office—which is the St. Martin's block office that facilitates the public housing there—is a very courageous guy, and he stood up to the City officials who were about to throw these people out of their homes in the St. Martin's block because their kids had gotten into a fight with one of the janitors. It was a serious fight and one of the janitors was seriously hurt; it wasn't a minor incident by any means. Nevertheless, that is no reason to throw a whole family out of their housing. Consequently he stood up to the City officials who wanted to throw them out, and the thanks that he got for his work was being kicked upstairs into another job. I don't know whether it's kicked upstairs sort of kicked parallel I think. Ken, can you help us out?

Mr. C. Ken Banks, Community Organization Worker: He was moved immediately, the same day. His job was changed to a different type of work.

Senator Fergusson: I have a lot more questions, but I think I had better let someone else continue.

Senator Pearson: I was just going to comment on Appendix C, concerning debt and the peddler. Is there any control of peddlers at all in Montreal?

Mr. Davis: Yes. I think we should at this point hear from Mr. Banks. He is kind of our expert in this area.

Mr. Banks: Well, many of those situations are emergencies, crises, when they happen and you do whatever seems logical. I guess we go on the seat of our pants when we try to get through this type of situation. We call lawyers and other people who should know something about this.

In answer to your question, there doesn't seem to be very much control. They may have to have licences and this type of thing, but there doesn't seem to be very much control of their activity. This is the reality officially. There may be very strong restrictions, but they are not effective. I guess that is the reality of it.

Mr. Davis: You might give him Smith's figures. In about 80 per cent of all financial transactions to buy goods and services in the province of Quebec, the buyer has no legal protection, no protection whatsoever.

Senator Pearson: This is the real problem of the whole thing?

Mr. Davis: On the consumer side it is. We think there are two areas that make the problem. One of them is income and the other is how much people can get. Another aspect is how they have to spend it. I think Mrs. Boyd is a good example of that. She may get a little more money than Mrs. McIntyre, but it is how she has to spend it that puts her in practically the same boat. You know that the average Canadian is in debt. He is in poverty really, basically, because if something ever happened to him that he couldn't work, then he would be right with Mrs. Boyd and Mrs. McIntyre. We all would be if something happened to us. It's that simple.

Senator Pearson: Would you advocate more protection for the consumer or the borrower?

Mr. Davis: Yes. I would advocate nationalization of credit, all credit. I think that if in the province of Quebec you nationalized credit and charged a straight 6 per cent per annum interest for credit you could finance the entire educational system for the whole province, just with the income you would make from credit. But, of course, you might have a little hassle with some of the finance companies if you wanted to do that. I think this is where the real crux of the matter is, because these are very powerful individuals that control the money and the purse strings, and they tell the governments what to do.

Senator Pearson: These pedlars are not very powerful individuals. They may be powerful in their own community, but not nationwide or citywide.

Senator Fournier: They are very powerful salesmen, sir.

Mr. Davis: For instance, Mrs. McIntyre and I have a big hassle over credit, because she is on welfare and she can't get the regular kind of credit that you would get from some of the department stores. You would pay 18 per cent interest a year,—big deal. So I say to her, "You are lucky you don't get that." She replies, "I am not lucky because I have got to have things." Therefore, she has to get credit from pedlars and other people. How much does it cost you in interest?

Mrs. McIntyre: Sometimes double.

Mr. Davis: Thirty-two to 36 per cent.

Senator Pearson: You were talking about the underprivileged being denied the right to partake in the direction of their own destiny. How would you solve this problem, or have you any idea how this can be changed?

Rev. Johnson: In my elaboration of this, I suggested that there are three methods necessary to develop the community. One of them is the employment of, as I said, positive symbols in particular areas of our society, and these symbols have to do with helping people to understand the positive aspect. What kind of a symbol is it—and you know what I speak of when I speak of a symbol—when a government comes in, moves people out of their homes, calls it a slum area and does things that psychologically upset people? These things must be done so that people are not imposed on and degraded as human beings. The second point I mentioned was that there is no grass roots social structure; there are three different governments at the federal, provincial and municipal levels all operating in a world that has nothing to do with the people that they are dealing with.

You talk about a man like Frank Hanley, who is our counsellor. He was just defeated, but the point I am making is that his was the only kind of relationship that people could have; they would phone him, he would make some comment and send a letter to somebody, but you would never hear anything more about it. I mean, where is this social structure for the people to have anything to say? It doesn't exist. What is happening is like our whole governmental system is operating—in a vacuum; it talks to itself and thinks it's representing the people.

Senator Pearson: You referred to the unfinished express highway. This is one of the things that I feel is wrong. You have no co-ordination between different groups of governments.

Rev. Johnson: That is just what I said. You don't have the co-ordination; each level of government operates in a vacuum. The municipal government operates in one vacuum and so on.

Senator Pearson: They displace all the people living there because they want a highway. They want urban renewal so they say "All right, we will have urban renewal. Put another class of people in there. Get rid of the people that are there now, because they are no good."

Rev. Johnson: Exactly. The force being exerted is a political force in three different areas, like three different wheels just rolling over the social context underneath, which is the people those three governments are supposed to represent.

When you have one man who is supposed to represent thousands of people, he can't. It's impossible. There is no structure down there at the grass roots level for anything to be known. What voice do they have?

I mean, today you talk about the organization of the poor. Boy! I'll tell you, they are trying to do the best they can.

Senator Pearson: I would say the social worker should be called in on all these projects, because the social worker is really in touch with these people.

Rev. Johnson: I will go so far as to say that you might be walking down the right path when you say that, but I am suggesting at the beginning of this little elaboration that there has to be some comprehensiveness to this. It's a multiplicity of complications, if you want to put it that way; you have to have representation at a grass roots level, and the social worker himself isn't at the grass roots level.

I live adjacent to the area myself and am down there 90 per cent of the time, but even people who live in the area, don't know what is going on sometimes. So, you see, that isn't the answer. The answer has to do with a kind of social structure that doesn't exist, that is going to be comprehensive, so that we can plug in all the technology of our modern world so that the guy on the grass roots level gets it, and especially the poor. When you find the Post Office strike disrupting all the letters to these people who are crying for a dollar just to buy their next day's food, or that day's foods, you can see how social forces disrupt the underprivileged. They have nothing to do with it. It's just a wheel grinding them under.

The Chairman: Mrs. Linkletter, have you something to add to this aspect? Mrs. Johnson suggested you might have.

Mrs. A. Linkletter, Public Issues Committee, Family Service Association of Montreal: When Senator Fournier asked how we failed, I wanted to ask whether you have heard the tape that was presented at a medical convention on brainwashing of the prisoners of war during the Korean War. This bears very strongly on it; this is the answer to the question. That tape analyzed how American soldiers were brainwashed and the analysis brought out certain factors. It brought out the factor that of the American soldiers—unlike the Turks that came out of the camps 100 per cent—six out of ten, or four out of ten, depending on the camp, were able to be brainwashed, or came out of camp in a pitiful state, or simply died. Six out of ten died in some camps. Why? The analysis was that basically Americans have no loyalty; they have no loyalty to their home, to their church, to their community, to their country. We have failed to teach loyalty. They don't understand the very basic human concept of "Love thy neighbour." They don't know their institutions. This is one of the things that came out.

I feel very strongly about this, that we haven't taught values. I don't mean just the poor; I mean everybody. This is part of our whole system. We haven't taught values and—something that I have been pleading with my political party to do for years—we haven't taught our political institution structure to people. They don't understand it. Why do we have the Frank Hanleys? The power is at the base. People have power. If they organize themselves they can do anything. They can throw out the Frank Hanleys.

This is one thing I am fighting in my own county at the moment. When you elect people—and we all have power; all have people power—you fail in the democratic society if you don't do one thing. You don't only select good candidates and work to elect them, but the most important function of all, which we haven't taught people, which the power structure has avoided telling people, is that you have to make them responsible to the group that elected them. It is that watchdog part of democracy that counts.

One recommendation the Senate could make is something Mr. Trudeau has been doing in the federal Liberal Party, I have seen a great change in the federal Liberal Party since he became Prime Minister, in the whole structure of the party, the openness of it. Even welfare organizations such as family service organizations—God bless them!—SPWC and a few others, are the most undemocratic institutions you could ever come across because they are not responsible to anybody. They have nice boards, and I sit on one, but they are just chosen out of the blue, they don't really represent the community, and this is a recommendation I think should be made. If you are going to have that structure and that institution in the community, I think that somehow or other you have to recommend that we have a good representation of the community. In a democratic society you should elect those boards from the grass roots and they should be open to everybody. Why should a few people sit down and make the decisions?

The Chairman: Mrs. Linkletter, in the first place, let me say that I read that article in the New Yorker, four issues of it, a couple of years ago. I did not quite come to the conclusion that you did, but I re-read it because it was such an interesting article, the first of its kind I have seen. I saw comments on it and I am afraid they did not take quite the same views that you did. There is a great deal to what you say, but let me say here you are activists, you are all social workers and all interested. Let the committee ask you a question for a change. Under the Canada Assistance Act Mrs. McIntyre has a case, has a claim, and she has told us all about it. There is provision under the Canada Assistance Act for her to appeal that decision. In your province, of all the provinces in Canada, there is no appeal board established.

Mr. Davis: We are painfully aware of it.

The Chairman: If there is, it was just established recently. How many appeals have been entered on behalf of these people by your organization?

Mrs. Linkletter: I can't answer that one, but I can tell you one thing. In our province appeals are almost unheard of at any level, and one of the reasons is that we don't know and understand the structure of the institutions. For the little bit of knowledge that I have gained in my own community I had to dig and dig and dig, because nobody knows, and the people who know don't want to tell you. I think it is the government's responsibility to see that people have this knowledge.

Rev. Johnson: If I might just add something in regard to this question, one thing that the government lets the people know exactly what to do in terms of their rights is how to pay their tax. Everybody understands that. It comes out in nice booklet form, and that is the kind of grass roots involvement that is necessary to make these statutes known. With my college education I can look up all the answers that have been provided by the statutes of every government in this country, but I can't expect Mrs. McIntyre to do that, and that is part of the problem.

The Chairman: Rev. Johnson, I am not asking Mrs. McIntyre to do that. We have seen Mrs. McIntyre and heard the type of life she is leading. I am asking why you didn't do it.

Mr. Davis: It is really more grim than you are making it out here, because you are saying, why don't we appeal? We go down to the welfare office and we are told there is no appeal beyond the director of the particular welfare office. We go to him and we hassle him all the time, and the people in the community hassle him, but they don't get very much out of him, you see, because there is no way to go beyond him. Not only that, but we can't even get the...

The Chairman: You say there is no way you can get beyond him. Of course there is. The statutes say there must be an appeal under the Canada Assistance Act. This is plain and simple. It has been there since 1966. We passed it. We know all about it, and everybody else in the country seems to know about it.

You have within your province a legal aid system; not too good a system, but you have a system. Why hasn't somebody taken that case to court? It doesn't cost you anything. Why hasn't somebody taken it to court for a declaration on that? They have not, and they must comply with the act. It is as simple as that. The Americans have been doing it for the last five or six years. The result is they have case law on it so that a person like Mrs. McIntyre is protected. You may lose the case, I don't know, but at least she goes in there under your guidance and the guidance of the legal people and helps establish case law; in United States they have taken their cases to the Supreme Court of the United States and established rights. We raised that with Mr. Borovoy when he came with the Civil Liberties group, if you remember. They said they would. That is one of the things you people should have done.

I am not being critical. You have a tough job. But when you tell us certain things that should happen are not happening, I would indicate to you that this participation should not only come from us; it has got to come from you, and unless it comes from the people in this fashion we are not going to get very far.

Mrs. Prince: May I just make a suggestion for the sake of keeping the thing in proper perspective? For every Mrs. McIntyre who happens to have a social worker who may or may not know the channels of appeals, there are hundreds of people who are so involved in the whole culture of poverty that they haven't even begun to make it, as Mrs. McIntyre has, to a social agency. We must always remember when we think of one series of steps that can be taken that there are many, many more who haven't even begun to get mobilized.

The Chairman: Mrs. Prince, all we need to do is to establish one case and you have got it made. The rest of them can read and they can tell exactly what the score is. You don't have to establish too many of those; just one.

Mrs. McIntyre: Sir, you say establish one person. I have five children. Will I be guaranteed my money next month or a month after?

The Chairman: The one thing that the courts have said is that until such time as there is a declaration—other courts have said this and ours will say the same thing—you can't interfere with the person's welfare allowance; it must remain. That is basic. Let's get on. Senator Pearson, do you have anything else?

Senator Pearson: A fragmented social work has no real value. Who made that statement?

Rev. Johnson: What was the statement again?

Senator Pearson: The fragmented social work is no real value to you people in that community.

The Chairman: I don't think he said social work. I think fragmented remedy to poverty is what he said. Is that right?

Rev. Johnson: Yes. I said a fragmented approach with one project here and another project there.

Senator Croll: You remember the United Church raised it?

Rev. Johnson: Yes.

Senator Pearson: Fine. I pass then.

Senator McGrand: I go back to the statement that you made earlier, that is in your brief, on which there has been considerable discussion: You refer to the grass roots social structure that does not exist. We have spoken quite a bit about this, but in urban renewal there are many factors involved. It is going on in practically every city in Canada. The land in certain areas where the housing is not too good will yield greater taxes to the city if the houses are demolished and a high rise building is put up. Another factor is that the developers are interested in this sort of thing. The construction industry depends on it and the labour unions in the construction trades depend on it.

Without this sort of thing going on business would drop off, but at the same time it must place an awful burden on the people in these areas. Now, it seems to me that all the houses in those areas need is a little fixing up so that people can live in them.

Mrs. McIntyre: Right.

Mrs. Boyd: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: Now, we have talked about brainwashing here, but there must be an awful lot of brainwashing going on in order to persuade those who are in charge of things to carry out this sort of undertaking. That leads us back to the question of the grass roots social structure that does not exist. I would like to start the discussion from that angle again. Do we need this type of urban renewal going on, the demolition of half decent housing and the erection of massive buildings?

Mr. Davis: I think it keeps the economy going. In that case it is a good thing.

Senator McGrand: And you pay a price for it.

Mr. Davis: That's O.K. Let's keep on doing it. That's fine, but let's not take it through Little Burgundy. Let's not take it through Lower Westmount where I live. Let's take it through Upper Westmount, because the people there can afford to get housing some place else. Let's take it through Mayor McIntyre's house. Let's take his house for it, you see, but not that of somebody else who can't afford it. I don't care. If it supports the economy, fine. Let's bring it some place else.

Mr. Banks: I think this is part of the reality in Montreal. I don't have the specific figures, but just from a newspaper article I was reading in the last few weeks there are, I understand, in let's say the last 10 years, approximately 20,000 housing units that have been demolished because they were substandard. Yet I don't know how many new low income units have been built between the Jean Mons project and Little Burgundy. Perhaps, shall we say, 2,000. Would that be possible? Maybe 10 per cent have been rebuilt as new housing units. Therefore 90 per cent of these low income housing units that were demolished have not been replaced. What was gained by tearing them down?

Senator McGrand: That is what I want to know. What was gained by tearing them down?

Mrs. Boyd: The city gets the land.

The Chairman: We are not going to obtain the answer to that one while we are sitting in here. What is your next question?

Senator McGrand: I wouldn't want to be diverted off that one.

Mr. Davis: We think it's a lousy idea, to put it bluntly.

The Chairman: Senator Quart has a question.

Senator Quart: It is not along these lines. On Appendix D, paragraph 2, you say:

The welfare system is designed for the purpose of making bureaucratic jobs for middle and upper income people—not to serve the poor.

Then you go on to ask, "Why is this elaborate system needed?" You then say:

The traditional answer is that it prevents fraud. The truth is that most poor people are very honest and scrupulous.

As a matter of fact, I think most people are whether they are poor or not. We only hear of the dishonest and unscrupulous ones. This is hard to take:

Many very rich and middle income people get that way by being dishonest. Yet the myth persists that the income of poor people should be reviewed before they are given welfare while the rich and middle income are presumed honest enough that random spot checks are deemed sufficient to ensure that taxes are not being cheated on.

Mr. Davis: I made the statement, senator.

Senator Quart: That is why I am asking you, Mr. Davis.

Mr. Davis: I am not sure, though. You say that you are challenging...

Senator Quart: I didn't say. I am asking you. You said it.

Mr. Davis: You are asking me to prove it. Right?

Senator Quart: Yes.

Mr. Davis: Alright. I can't prove it. This is another aspect of this whole thing. We can put the spy-glass on poor people and examine every minute part of their lives, even to how many times they go to the bathroom in the daytime, but in many respects we do not have the basic facts about the incomes of rich people that we need. For instance, why aren't the incomes of the foundations thrown open for public scrutiny? Why are these men allowed to use these not-for-profit foundations to carry on their high finance work and shift their funds? I know for a fact that this happens in America because this is documented in The Rich and Super Rich by Lumberg, when he says that the rich people use these foundations to get out of paying taxes. They will give money to the foundation, they won't have to pay taxes on it because it is a gift, and then they will have the foundation loan it back to them at 1 or 2 per cent interest, so they have their money back again. We don't watch their comings and goings at all as we watch poor people's, so I can't answer the question.

Senator Quart: I think you must agree that there are a tremendous number of people, of even moderate incomes, who are doing all they can as individuals. As you mention, these funds, do you think some of these funds are being used for let us say, the Canadian Institute for the Blind and many others. What would these groups do without such funds?

Mr. Davis: I'm sorry. I am not talking about the funds that go to the usual kinds of charitable organizations like family service organizations.

Senator Quart: I mean the foundations as well.

Mr. Davis: I am talking about the McConnell Foundation, for example, and others like them.

The Chairman: Wait. Mr. Davis...

Mr. Davis: I want to know.

The Chairman: You ought to know before you make the statement. That is what we are getting at. I know what you are talking about, and I have read the book too. They talk about the large American charitable foundations that once upon a time practised the method of loaning back. That does not happen in this country and it is not permitted under our foundation system law. Our foundation system is very tight in this country, and it does not happen here in that fashion. If a man establishes a foundation it is for a purpose. He is given an exemption from taxation, but from then on it is used for whatever purpose that he has to account for. The sort of business that was done in the United States at an earlier period is not done here. It is not even being done in the United States now, because they have tightened their laws.

Mr. Davis: I just think the financial affairs of rich people should be more open to scrutiny, because the financial affairs of poor people are. That is my point.

Senator Quart: I am not a business person, but I cannot go along with you there either. I think most people receive scrutiny from the Income Tax Department, and I think maybe the middle income or rich people receive more scrutiny. Personally, I think they should and that they do. Anyway, we are not going into this argument, because my conscience is clear. Perhaps you will help me to collect rent on two properties I have to have in Montreal to qualify myself for the Senate. The rent is four and five months behind because the man is unemployed. I have not increased the rent. This is just a little committee of one I am talking about, and I believe there are many, many more the same. Perhaps you would help me to collect the rents as an absentee landlord, which I don't want to persecute these people to do or put them out, because where would they go? I am sure your statement was not meant in that way, Mr. Davis; you look much too nice to mean that the rich and middle income people get that way by being dishonest. If you mean they increase their income by being dishonest, I think that is a little bit rough.

Let me also ask you this. Do you receive the co-operation of Manpower to find jobs for the poor, and do the social workers go over and above their duties in the office to maybe inform Manpower and try to secure a job for these people?

Mr. Davis: I wonder if Mrs. Banks would speak to this.

Mrs. Patricia Banks, Social Worker: We phone them regularly, occasionally with some success, but not consistently, because often the people we are concerned with don't have a skill or training. Manpower doesn't have jobs for them.

Senator Quart: There is a certain somewhere where the unskilled person can be placed in Manpower.

Mrs. Banks: Only if employers are looking for unskilled labour also.

The Chairman: Senator Quart is making this point. Is there not a department that looks after the skilled and the unskilled?

Mrs. Banks: But they don't always have jobs.

The Chairman: She didn't say that.

Senator Quart: I can understand that, but do you...

Mrs. Banks: That is what we are concerned with, whether people get jobs or not.

Senator Quart: Have you not even a limited amount of success, or do you just say, "Well, it's no use phoning"?

Mr. Davis: Let me give you an example from Mrs. Banks' case load. It is an example of a fellow who gets caught in bureaucratic red tape. This fellow is a seaman, a fireman, and he makes good money when he is working. The trouble is that he had an ulcer, he was unable to work for a while and finally ended up on welfare. Here is this poor fellow. He is now able to work again, but he sits at home on welfare because he can't scrape up $240 for his union dues. The Welfare Department says, "We'll give you the $240 if you get a job first." The union and the companies say to him, "Well, look, we can't hire you on until you get your dues paid". He's caught right in the middle.

Here is the extent of what we are trying to do. We were even going to pass the hat around in our office to try to scrape up the $240 for a loan to this guy, which he could pay us back afterwards. But we thought, "No, we are not going to let the province off the hook that easily if we possibly can." We may still have to take up the collection. We went to the provincial Welfare Department; we wrote them a letter fully explaining this fellow's difficulty and said our agency would be happy to advance this $240 for him so that he could get his union dues paid up and could go out to work. We explained that he had a good opportunity that week to go out on freighter, that he didn't have his union dues but our agency would advance the money if they would guarantee it. We have taken all the risk out of it, you see, and we haven't heard from them yet. We just sent them a telegram to see if they were going to answer us, but in the meantime this guy may never be able to get out now because he missed a chance.

Senator Pearson: How did he lose his union membership?

Mr. Davis: He didn't lose his union membership; he couldn't pay his back dues. He still has his membership.

The Chairman: Mr. Davis, in such an instance—and this is merely for clarification—it seems evident that you are not getting anything from the bureaucrats. Would you not have a little reserve from which to pay it, when you knew he had the job and could pay it back later from his salary? Would you not have a little money of your own within the organization—I don't mean personally—but within the organization little kitty to pay it yourself in order to get this man working; He could pay you back later?

Mr. Davis: If there is an expert on the agency budget here...

Mrs. Prince: I am one of these people who are always after risk money. They accuse me of handing money on the corner of Népean and St. Catherine. It isn't true at all. I just feel the need because I work with the grass roots. I was appalled to find out the other day that our agency has $500 per month risk money.

The Chairman: "Risk"?

Mrs. Prince: Yes. Risk money. $500 for the whole agency. I have stopped asking because it's so ridiculous. It has made us a nickel and dime agency, because we have been nickel and dime social workers. We are going to change; we are going to become active; we are going to be strong catalysts within the community and turn people on to what is really wrong.

Mr. Banks: I understand—I don't deal with the budget—just from talking to some of our administrators within the agency that there are provincial controls of how much money is available to give out for this type of thing. We are very definitely limited by law, by the government, on how much of this type of thing we can give out, and if we give out more than a certain amount we are penalized in our budget for workers' salaries and administrative costs. This is only secondhand knowledge. You would have to speak to an administrator.

The Chairman: I do not think you are right Mr. Banks. The agency has a budget and within that budget you do as you please. I am sure there are no limitations. You use good sound judgment. I just saw the budget.

Mr. Davis: It's not that easy.

The Chairman: If you are a private independent agency...

Mr. Davis: Well, we're not. A third of our funds come from the province.

The Chairman: Yes, $150,000 out of $450,000.

Mr. Davis: I don't know whether I am talking out of school or not. I'll talk, anyhow. It has traditionally been a complaint in Montreal, for instance, that the English-speaking community gets all the welfare money and the French-speaking community doesn't get it. I think there is some truth to this.

The Chairman: We had the Welfare Director of Montreal here. What is his name?

Mrs. Johnston: Mr. Seguin.

The Chairman: Yes. Mr. Seguin made a good impression on us here in presenting the case as a knowledgeable, able man. We have seen a great number of them. He indicated, if I am not mistaken, that 75 per cent of the people of Montreal were French and they were receiving 90 per cent of the welfare. I am pretty sure I am right on that. That was his statement, so the statement that you make doesn't fit into his.

Mrs. Johnston: May I clarify this?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Johnston: He was talking about different funds from what Mr. Davis was talking about. Where our freedom might lie, in terms of funding, is the grant we get from United Red Feather Services, which is the other large grant we get.

The Chairman: $250,000.

Mrs. Johnston: On the other hand, what has happened, in effect, is that there has been a ceiling on what is being raised by the Community Chest in Montreal for the last five years. With increasing personnel costs to hold our staff, to whom obviously we have to give annual raises and so on, we are penalized and faced with the problem of cutting back. We have received no increase in the grant from United Red Feather Services in the last five years, I would think. As a matter of fact, from most member agencies there has been a cut-back in service.

In the area of emergency funds, as you are, I am sure, aware, a number of years ago the administration of the provincial welfare funds was undertaken by the agency itself. It was under the old Quebec public charities act. We acted for the Government. That change over meant a considerable reduction in the operation of Family Service for a number of years. I think there was a time we were administering funds for the professional social workers and the agency. It dropped off considerably and is now back to a professional staff of 35.

We had a considerable change in policy in working things out, and more and more the Government has undertaken responsibility for various areas of agency service, and, as you can see from the budget, they are meeting a considerable portion of it. On the other hand, our free funds are what we would expect to have some flexibility in our planning with. This has tended to be eaten away by the fact that the Government very often has given verbal assurances to underwrite the expense of a project; in subsequent reviews this may be several thousand dollars and it hasn't been possible for them to meet that. I am not sure if this is related to a home care project, but there was a project approved by the Government, on which I think, the Victorian Order of Nurses and Family Service co-operated. It was our understanding that the Victorian Order of Nurses would assume responsibility for a debt of, I think, approximately $1,000, or slightly more, and we still carry it on our books from a year and a half ago. The Victorian Order of Nurses hasn't been able to do it.

We are caught in decisions being made on many levels so that our freedom, even for an emergency budget, is very limited. I think you find a policy may seem rigid and limited coming from the board of directors because we are under particular instructions from Red Feather and the province not to run up the bill.

Senator Quart: Believe me, I am very concerned about the poor and have always been in voluntary service, so don't think I am being tough about this. I am very concerned about the case of the seaman who had a job to go to but couldn't pay the $240 union dues. Did the social worker, or someone dealing with that case, go to organizations such as the Kiwanis, or the Rotary Club? I am sure if they had been approached you would have had that money, and he could have paid it back.

Rev. Johnson: I'd like to answer that. The question posed, senator, is based on a concept of operation that doesn't exist, which is that these people and organizations and so on have the compassion to see this. They operate in an administrative financial concept. Even some of the board that I sit with for Family Service are operating in this administrative financial concept, that if we can see some return we will buy something for them, some object, some material thing, we will contribute the money. But when you start saying we will have to risk money from our organization for someone from whom we might not get it back, that isn't understood by the people who have the purse strings.

Senator Quart: I agree, but that man had a ship to go on immediately and I would have broken every rule to try to find even an individual who would trust him. As even you yourself say, they are honest and scrupulous. I would have done everything over and above that.

Senator Fournier: I would like to add something to this, not to be critical of this man, because there are so many cases like that. What effort did the man, himself make to get the $240? Or did he stay at home and say, "I haven't got the money"? I think the effort should start first with the individual, then from there call for help.

Rev. Johnson: Well, sir, there is one point I want to try and get across, which I mentioned at the very beginning. We are dealing with human beings who have been depreciated psychologically. Have you ever had any state of depression in your own life, sir? Have you ever had any feeling that you didn't know where to turn next? Have you ever felt that when you woke up the next day there would be nothing you could do? Have you ever felt, because of a death or something happening to your life, completely closed off from the world?

I am saying to you, sir, that when the conditions of a man's life are such that he has never known any psychological victory for his own personal ego or over the environment in which he lives, it is difficult for him to act responsibly and understandably in his daily life. What I am saying is that the psychological thing is deep, and often we have to look at it as though society is the mother and he is the baby and we have to give milk to him; and it may mean that we have to give milk for a long time before he is psychologically able to stand on his own two feet, as every baby has to learn to do. I say that because of the multiplicity of problems and fragmentation of the help there isn't a good enough mother available to wean that particular baby to a point where it can make responsible decisions.

Senator Fournier: Well, I am not going to start an argument with you, because I think that in some cases we are far apart, although this is a subject that I would like to discuss with you. I don't share all your views by any means, because I think you are particularizing on one case. I am talking of the average man. I want to know from you what an average man has done to help himself?

Rev. Johnson: I say to you, sir, the underprivileged cannot be rated categorically on the basis of being average.

Senator Fournier: You are taking the whole rule in a bag.

Rev. Johnson: I say that when you talk about the poverty situation in a bag you are talking about psychological problems of people who have faced it all the way from their birth. It's a vicious cycle, sir.

The Chairman: Mrs. Prince, you wanted to say something?

Mrs. Prince: Yes. May I answer the senator's question about the possibility of exploring other resources in the community, and also underscore Mrs. Johnston's answer that both the Red Feather and the province, which are sources of funds, don't go into debt.

I think the social agencies have had many, many years of exploring, developing and using, in numerous and very imaginative ways, community resources. The agencies themselves have spent a lot of community money; we have really had to stop and take a good hard look at what we are doing, and we decided that what we are doing is putting on Band-aids. We are running around putting on Band-aids but never getting at the illness, at the problem. This is one more instance of an endless series of situations in which we could have done this and might have done that, and I can appreciate your looking at it from your point of view, but it is still another Band-aid, and it still has not come anywhere near the underlying problem, which has something to do with the full economic structure that this man got caught in in the first place. We have to make a choice and we still have to Band-aid work. But we are also saying that we must make a choice and we must deal with the illness. I think this is part of an answer, too.

Senator Quart: There is only one point on which I differ with you. I agree with you on the other matter, but this was not a case of alleviating suffering for the moment. This man had a job waiting for him. He could have boarded that ship; he was assured of the job. Maybe I am being overly enthusiastic about the whole deal, but this is different from a case where a person might want food or something. This was a case of a man having a job, and I would have moved heaven and hell to find somebody who would trust him.

Mr. Sam Mhlanga, Staff, Family Service Association of Montreal: I was just going to say, sir, that we seem to get caught in discussing incidents. We have taken up ten minutes on this incident and I am wondering to myself why you don't look at what lies behind an incident like that instead of wasting time talking about the little things about the incident. That's all I have to say, sir.

The Chairman: That is what Rev. Johnson has been saying, isn't it?

Senator Quart: Yes. Since you mentioned the incident, that is why I played on it.

Senator Fournier: I want to go back to the beginning and take a look at what the Family Service Association of Montreal is. We haven't heard anything yet but the heading. I would like to hear about that in a few words—your membership, how you operate, your staff.

Mr. Davis: Did you get a copy of our brief?

The Chairman: Yes. It does not appear in the brief. There is nothing in the brief that gives the answer to the question he is asking.

Mrs. Johnston: The Family Service Association has existed since 1900. It was developed originally to serve families, and, as I indicated earlier, the administration of relief was the major service for many years. In terms of the number of families served, Mr. Davis, I am going to ask you in a minute for Little Burgundy. We offer individual and group counselling and the number of families coming to the Agency on this basis during last year was 2,272. This is a different service from what would be happening on—

Senator Fournier: Is it a federal or provincial organization?

Mrs. Johnston: It is a local agency.

Senator Fournier: For the City of Montreal only?

Mr. Davis: City of Montreal.

Mrs. Johnston: But it would have membership in the Family Service Association. Affiliations with national organizations, but no other link.

Senator Fournier: You have no membership fee? You have everybody in certain communities?

Mrs. Johnston: I think I indicated in the brief that it was all economic groups in the non-French speaking population. This has been a recent development to move out more into the Jewish and English Catholic communities.

Senator Fournier: I am satisfied. I have a number of little questions here which could be answered very shortly. We were talking a while ago about this sailor. I do not want an answer, because these things have happened. Suppose you have $240 to give to this man, you give it at noon and he goes out and drinks it in the afternoon? I do not want any answer, but that sort of thing has happened.

Senator Quart: Not if he paid it to the union.

Senator Fournier: We often hear about these inspectors. In every brief everyone is dissatisfied with the inspectors. I can agree with that. I was surprised to hear from Mrs. McIntyre that the older inspectors were the toughest ones. I thought the younger ones would be.

Mrs. McIntyre: No, sir.

Senator Fournier: Let us classify them into three. You have the young unmarried inspector, a young fellow at the age of 20?

Mrs. McIntyre: I haven't had one.

Senator Fournier: Then you have the young married man who is very sympathetic to the poor people; and finally you get the old fellow?

Mrs. McIntyre: Well, first of all the old fellow didn't want to speak in English. When he found out I could speak French, that was when the fight started.

Senator Fournier: Let us speak in general.

Mrs. McIntyre: This is the individual I am talking about. You understand, you can only talk about what happened to you. You can't talk about what happened to anybody else. You have to talk about what experience you had yourself.

Senator Fournier: I am wondering if any other of the good people you have today—

The Chairman: In the very back row a young lady hasn't had a chance.

Miss Christine Gordon, Homemaker: I would like to know what is happening here, because I am really not part of it at all. I am just, you know, kind of half there and half not there. You asked earlier on how we failed, and I would like to know the point of this committee being here to judge on what is happening in the poor areas. Why do you even feel you have the right to do that? and even how we feel we have the right to be here talking. I should be on that side because my job so far has been going into houses of the poor and being their maid. I have been their maid, I have cleaned up all their pots and pans and made their beds, and that has been my job. It has meant a very small income, and it's an income that I find it hard to survive on, as Mrs. Boyd does on her income, but I got into the job because I don't understand the bureaucracies. I don't understand it at all.

As I seem to be the young one here, I am going to say that everything, even the agency itself, leaves me out. It might leave me out all my life. I don't think by the time I become 25 I'm going to say, "Well, I understand it all," as you seem to think you understand it all, because you have all been saying, "I understand Mrs. Boyd. I understand all of you. We are just trying to get at what is happening here." So if you understand, I wish you would help me to understand, because I don't. I don't think we are doing anything here, I really don't, but talking around several issues. I think some things have to be answered.

I know last Friday when I came out of the home of the family that was having a very rough time at the moment I was angry. I was terribly angry, and if I had been here than I probably would have smashed all these damn tables. Now it's, you know, a week afterwards and I am not so angry any more I suppose.

I just would like you to answer me, what exactly are you going to do? You have all these facts. You have been all over the place. You have seen many tears and heard many stories. What are you going to do with them all? If indeed you are going to do anything with them. I fear they are going to be thrown away somewhere, and we are still going to have to fight the same things that we fight now.

The Chairman: Miss Gordon, I can tell you we are going to do a great deal with them. We are hearing you, as we heard other people, and there are a great number of other people who want to be heard just like you want to be heard. We will make recommendations to the Government which we hope will be acceptable in so that it will alleviate, if not eradicate, most of the conditions which you are speaking about now.

Miss Gordon: You have been talking around the problems.

The Chairman: No. We have been talking to the problem. It's your brief we are talking about. Other people have talked about other problems that concern them, and if you read the report of the meeting you will see that we haven't been talking around it; we have been talking to it, completely.

Miss Gordon: I have a feeling that you are trying to defend yourselves.

The Chairman: Against what?

Miss Gordon: Against the fact that you failed.

The Chairman: We haven't even started yet. How could we fail?

Miss Gordon: All of you here are in the age group that have seen the wars, as you have said. Perhaps when you came out of the wars you planned for a new world where there would be peace, and there would be hope for everybody, but, as you say yourself, you have failed. Are you trying to defend your own failure?

The Chairman: No, we didn't say we failed.

Senator Fournier: I read it from the brief, but I agree with it.

The Chairman: That wasn't the question at all. We said, where has society failed? In the circumstances...

Miss Gordon: What are you? You are part of the society.

The Chairman: So are you.

Miss Gordon: I agree, but I can't find where I am in this society. I am asking you, because you happen to be on top and happen to be in control. Where?

The Chairman: I think I know where I am, the members of this committee know where they are, and you will in time find yourself, too.

Miss Gordon: You are right here in this room and you are trying to find these people. I don't know whether you are ever going to achieve that; I really don't.

The Chairman: If I were you I would have a little more faith than that.

Senator Fournier: We mentioned pedlars. Don't we, in Montreal, have two types of pedlars: the licensed pedlars and unlicensed pedlars?

Mr. Banks: The way things are now, I guess it doesn't matter too much whether they are licensed or not. I would imagine the people we are dealing with are licensed. I don't know. The fact is that there are very little means for these people to protect themselves. We have already mentioned how people of low income need these peddlars because they want to get certain necessary items. They are not buying luxuries, they are buying things they all require to get by from day to day, and they are paying 100 per cent interest for this simply because the Government has not done its job in providing a means by which these people can protect themselves. Now, if these people have problems where they still cannot protect themselves, okay, we are there. But we still don't have a means; the Government doesn't provide us with any means to help them protect themselves. This is the thing I found most frustrating, which perhaps makes the whole area of social work a terribly frustrating field of endeavour, because we don't have adequate tools to work with in the form of legislation by the Government, to help balance things, to give the consumer at least an equal chance with the vendor; you know, to give them an equal opportunity to protect each other. They don't have this really, and that is my comment.

The Chairman: What you are saying in effect, Mr. Banks, is that there is a protection, but they haven't the legal facilities of the capability of providing them.

Mr. Davis: It is not a good act, though. It has many loopholes and many faults, and there is a need for legislation. I agree there is a need for enforcement. There is also a need for adequate legislation for consumer protection in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Banks: If I could speak further, just briefly, we tried to get to the heart of the frustration of this situation—just speaking of this one instance, and there are so many like it—to see what more we could do to limit this type of activity, to equalize things a bit more. We went to lawyers; we went around to any authorities that we thought could give us some answers within our existing laws and by-laws, and asked what we can do to help people protect themselves more. We found from these authorities that really we couldn't do too much more; we needed more legislation and much more enforcement, ways of getting enforcement. All I can say is, we tried very hard and we ended up very frustrated.

The Chairman: The Quebec Bar Association will be before us in a week or ten days' time. They have a brief along that line, indicating what they intend to do in the future that is not being done now.

Senator Fournier: I would like to have your opinion of a case, if I give you an example. We find, as well you know, that there are people who are better off on welfare than if they were working, on account of their inadequate earning power because of lack of education or some physical condition. I feel very sympathetic towards a man in that situation. Let us assume that this man working, if all he can earn is $60, naturally he can't live on $60. If he quits the job he can go on Welfare and get $80. Those are not exact figures to the dollar, but that is very general across the country. According to the present law that is the position, and we do not agree with it. I may say, there will be a big change. How, I don't even know. Would it be better to subsidize salaries of $60 up to an income which would permit a man to provide a decent life for his family by saying, "You have a job and you can earn $60. You will have to work for your $60, then we will pay the balance, whether it is $25 or even $40, to make it up to $100". He would have an incentive to keep on the job and active, and he could be paid the balance without going through all this red tape, questioning and so on. Or do you believe it is better to say, "Go and get on the unemployment insurance, get all you can out of it and we will pay the balance"?

Mr. Davis: I would agree with your solution except that I think it raises certain other problems for businesses. There are a lot of small industries that are really having a hard time just to make it. They are probably obsolete industries that ought to have been gotten rid of anyhow in the computer technology age, but nevertheless they still exist. Some of them are even being subsidized by the Government. This would be another form of Government subsidy to those industries, and it certainly wouldn't encourage them to pay a minimum wage. I am not so sure if it wouldn't be a way of encouraging scab labour. I think it would be. Once you subsidize the salary the company can continue to pay below the minimum wage and get away with it, and still sell its products on the market. You see what that is going to do to the profits?

Senator Fournier: We have heard that before. You are not the first one to say that.

Mr. Davis: They are going to have an unfair advantage over other industries that pay a minimum wage, and I don't know how you are going to get around it.

Rev. Johnson: Psychologically speaking, it's correct in terms of seeing that as of primary importance for the individual, having an incentive that allows him to continue to take some creative part in the society in which he lives.

Mr. Davis: Personally I like it, because I think it's a step on the way to a planned economy, which is exactly what I think this country needs. A lot of people wouldn't agree with that.

Senator Pearson: On the first page of Appendix A, there are the results of a survey of 97 families. You list what each family received in the way of either welfare or earnings. We have talked about the guaranteed income quite a bit in this Committee over the months that we have been sitting. Have you made a study of guaranteed income at all? Have you heard of it?

Mr. Davis: Well, of course, we recommend a guaranteed income in Canada in our recommendation. I am not sure I know which aspect. You mean the economic aspect, senator?

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Mr. Davis: Unfortunately, we have no economists on our staff. We are kind of handicapped there. I think this is a weakness in our agency. We haven't done this, no.

Senator Pearson: I notice that an article in U.S. News & World Report suggests $1,600 for a family of four. That is, $500 for each parent and $300 for each child; they would be allowed $800 food tickets beyond that and earnings of $720 before tax, which is a total of about $3,150. They would be charged 50 per cent on anything earned beyond that. This seems to me a very small amount in this country. I just don't quite see how they are going to work it.

Mr. Davis: I will tell you how I think the minimum income should be determined. Maybe you, me, Mr. Banks and Mrs. Johnston should go to a typical place like Little Burgundy, take over Mrs. McIntyre's place for about three or four months, to see the minimum we could live on, and let that be the minimum income.

Senator Pearson: The Economic Council of Canada made a survey of this. They recommended a family of four should receive $4,200 as a minimum, which is a lot higher than in the United States, and I just can't see where the United States got the $1,600 figure.

Mr. Davis: I think any time you start quoting figures like that you have to take the other end of it into consideration, which is how people have to spend their money. Not only what it is, but how they have to spend it. If you are living on a farm and growing some of your own food it makes a difference. You mentioned that it was a lot different living in the city than in the country.

Senator McGrand: Thank you for the opportunity. There was considerable discussion about the man Senator Fournier mentioned, who could not help himself; but there are people who are so emotionally undernourished that they just cannot get themselves together any more. That is what I think you had in mind.

Let us go back to the subject of tearing down certain parts of our cities. So much of our prosperity depends on the construction industry, and so much of the construction industry depends on urban renewal, or so-called urban renewal.

Because of this urban renewal, people living in low income areas are displaced and here to go to some other part of the city. They have to go. What effect does it have on these people to lose the community life they had in that particular area for maybe five or six years, or longer, among associates and friends? Where do they go when they have to leave that area, and are they better off or worse off now? This question of urban renewal is so important that I think a group like this should express themselves freely on the short term and long term effects of it.

Mr. Davis: First of all, I can't speak for all the people, but I can speak for myself. I live in an area that is under the threat of urban renewal right now. That is sometimes worse than being in an urban renewal area in a way, because we have been told that any time within the next five years we could be moved out and our home demolished. Now, we don't own it. We are just renting, see. We haven't been there long. We have only been there since about February, but it really came home to me the other day when one of our neighbours came and said he had heard they were going ahead right away with the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway, and a ramp onto it would go over the site of the building we live in. It is going to happen this summer. This is what he said. Gosh! My wife and I got a little up tight about this, you know, and started talking about it. But it really didn't come home to me until my little daughter, who is about 4½, asked, "Daddy, when are they going to knock our house down?" Well, you know, it really got me.

Rev. Johnson: I would say it is even more vivid than that in the lives of persons who are faced from day to day with the mere problem of existing if they are threatened with the loss of the hovel they have called home. That can't be expressed in words, but it is the kind of psychological conditioning that, although I have not a degree in psychology, I say could go so far as to mark them for life, and it would take clinical care to pull them back out of their withdrawal, due to that threat of what might happen to them and its psychological effect; first the threat of being moved out and then finding somewhere to move to. As a matter of fact, I can tell you of a family from Little Burgundy faced with this situation, each member of which suffered physical illness during the next six to eight months because of the biological strain placed upon them.

Senator McGrand: I am glad you mentioned that, because this problem is going to be with us and there is no mistake about it. The greatest part of construction industry, the building of overhead passes and all this sort of thing, is going to take place in our large cities; as our cities get bigger and bigger more and more of this sort of thing will take place and there is going to be an increase in the psychological depression of people.

Now, at what time are you going to speak out so that the whole nation can hear you? What is the alternative for those who are directing the economy of the nation who feel that massive construction and reconstruction in our cities is essential? This is something we should get to grips with.

Mr. Davis: I think these things can be dealt with and still keep the construction industry going. I think, for instance, we ought to say to hell with the automobile manufacturers; we ought to say we are going to have adequate mass transit and put our efforts and our money into that. It will be underground. We will build more shopping centres and more things underground where it won't wreck people's homes and lives.

Senator McGrand: That is number 1. What is the next one?

Rev. Johnson: I say the second one has to do with dealing with these people as human beings in making the decisions that will have to be made regarding the new transit systems, new highways and new buildings that must be built. In other words, at present there is no dealing with people; there are only decisions made that come in over on top of them. Get them involved in this kind of thing. We have the problem right within our agency, that we don't have people helping to make decisions about their own lives, because a group of people on the board from downtown are making those decisions.

The Chairman: I think, Mr. Johnson, I should inform you that in the three urban renewal schemes that took place in the City of Toronto in the last five or six years, the people in the area organized themselves. They went before the Planning Board and the Planning Board arranged, under authority that they have, that these people could not be moved until such time as homes were found for them, which they could afford. When the renewal was finished they had the right to return to the place from which they had been moved, and almost 60 per cent of them chose to return. That is the modern concept of urban renewal that is being practised in the United States to a far greater extent than it is here, but some of the municipalities are taking it up. I am merely relating it to you.

Rev. Johnson: The basic question, sir, is whether or not the people themselves have asked that they be removed. Maybe they don't want to be removed.

Senator McGrand: When you say these people returned, you said they had the right to return. Now, you cannot return to a neighborhood where a whole block of houses has been demolished and a highrise apartment gone up, or something like that. You say they returned there. How can they return? How can they integrate in the community life, whatever community life they had previous to that?

Rev. Johnson: And, I say to you that with the fragmentation of the workers within the area, the different agencies—religious, governmental and social—are not equipped today to provide the necessary kind of integration back into that community, if you go so far as to renew the area.

Mr. Banks: I think the senator is right here. I agree with you. If I could take it one step farther, you are right Senator Croll, in saying that the Government and the housing departments have taken great pains to say to the people in Little Burgundy, "Before we go anywhere with this block plan, you have to have an action committee that is going to talk with us".

I worked in Toronto, in Rexdale, the Thistletown Housing Project, several years ago, where to a different degree of course, the people were being moved out into the suburban area in that case. They were, upon moving the people in, asking them to form groups to work with this project. I guess my only comment is that after, say, about five years of working on these two projects and trying to, as part of my job, involve people in this process of getting across to the Government what they want, what they feel they need, I don't feel that the people actually implementing the program have listened. They have said, "Please tell us. Tell us everything you want", and then they close their ears. I really believe that.

The Chairman: Mr. Banks, you know that in the renewal that took place in the core of Toronto they actually came back when those houses were built. They were moved out to the suburbs and some came back.

Senator Pearson: How would they come back to the Spadina Expressway?

The Chairman: No. Spadina Expressway is not urban renewal in any sense.

Senator Pearson: I know, but it is construction.

The Chairman: I am talking about urban renewal. They talk, of course, about the roads that went through.

Senator Pearson: They are talking of construction here. Senator McGrand, the problem is construction here; not just urban renewal.

The Chairman: Mrs. McIntyre, did you have something to say?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes, sir. How are you going to move back into a house where a school is being made larger?

The Chairman: A school made larger?

Mrs. McIntyre: Yes. Our house is being taken for the school.

The Chairman: They build other houses there to accommodate you.

Mrs. McIntyre: We are waiting to see where they are going to build them. We won't get the same kind of house, sir.

The Chairman: You get a better house, I think.

Mrs. McIntyre: My house is a nice house if it's fixed up proper.

The Chairman: They may do that.

Mr. Davis: I wanted to add, if I could, to this business of planning and changing neighborhoods. I think too often planners have used kind of clichés; I don't know where they developed from, but they use them without really stopping to think what they might mean. A good example of this is people will say, "Well, gee, we've got to get the kids off the streets", so they build a big playground some place. They knock down 15 buildings and make a playground for the kids. Well, in some respects, although there is some hazard from traffic—and I think we ought to just take a residential street and make them corner it off—the truth is, when the kids are on the streets they are getting a kind of natural adult supervision; people are walking back and forth. Down in Little Burgundy this is true, people go forth and back there; the kids are in the streets, the people are there, too, and they can watch the kids. Send them off to a playground without any supervision, then they are really in trouble.

Senator Fournier: This is not in the form of a question, but there was a statement made here this morning that I heard for the first time, which to me is one of the best. I guess it was Mrs. Linkletter, when she said, "We have not taught values". You can build a long lecture of that.

The Chairman: Mrs. Johnston has something to say.

Mrs. Johnston: I want to express our thanks for the opportunity to present the brief to you, and, also, to make a comment on it. I think you may have sensed, in our presentation and in the discussion, that we feel very much caught in a situation where we are interested and concerned with the particular individual, particular situation. This is a part of the problem of social work. How do you move from an individual basis and arrive at some effective approach to what is being spelled out for the individual in terms of broad social changes? This is something we are attempting to do, and you can sense our lack of sophistication in using the system. We put it in those terms. It is a problem of time.

I was interested in what Senator Quart said about why we didn't go, in the case of this particular man, and approach the Kiwanis Club, or whatever service organization it might be. We have done that. This is what I did 20 years ago when I worked with the Family Service Association, but I think there suddenly comes a point in time where spending three or four hours, whatever it may be, on one situation, has to be stopped, and we have to begin by moving hundreds and thousands and making changes that will affect far more than one situation. It is always this balance and this tension that each of us has.

Mr. Davis: There is just one more point I want to raise, and it is this. I wanted to get back to something that Miss Gordon said earlier, which is that we are very concerned with what you are going to do, what the committee is going to do, and we want to know if there is a timetable for you to report and make your recommendations; and if so, how can we find out what they are? We want to keep up with what you're doing.

The Chairman: When the Parliament is adjourned in June, this committee will visit various parts of Canada that it has not already visited. In June, July, August and September, and in September we will be back here. In September we will be back here to hear some of the experts that we have not heard, and fill in with some of the people who have asked for a little more time to prepare briefs. After that we will give consideration to our report, and in due course we will make our report and our recommendations, which we hope will be acceptable to the Government. That is about the normal way in which we operate. There is nothing much more that we can do.

Senator Fournier: I think there is a point that I would like to make to this gentleman here. Mr. Davis, you were talking about participation. This committee is going round to get people to participate, to get your view. It will not be our own decision; it will be your decision, from what we hear from you and various groups around the country. This is exactly what we are trying to do. We are not going to be the dictators and say to you people or to the people of Canada, "This is what we want to do". We want to be in a position to do what you people are asking us to do.

The Chairman: The recommendations, of course, will be made by the committee. We thought we had heard from about everybody who wanted to be heard, but recently we had requests for a great number of other people to be heard. An interest has suddenly arisen so that a great many more people wish to be heard, and I think we have to hear them. It is really the first time in the history of this country when a total look at poverty has been taken by any committee. As Rev. Johnson says, in the past we have fragmented it. We have studied housing, health, and any number of things, and never really put them together. The time has now come for us to see if we cannot put them all together and come up with some solution that, in the light of what we have at the present time, may well change our concept of our approach to welfare which has turned into poverty.

Mrs. Linkletter: I would like to make a very special plea. When Miss Gordon spoke she said some things that were very true, not only of people in poverty, but of juveniles, and I ran across a lot of them in the last two years. She said, "I don't know who I am". My special plea to you is to understand her, and this other group might have to have some solutions in our society. You said, "If you don't know, then I can't help you." That was the point when I began wondering if all this dialogue is going to pay, because if you can't understand and can't help her, then I don't think these hearings are going to be a success. I am going to beg you to please understand.

The Chairman: Mrs. Linkletter, if she does not understand who she is at her age, what can I do for her?

Mrs. Linkletter: Most of us don't.

The Chairman: I think I understand who I am, and if you don't I think you have missed something.

Mrs. Linkletter: We have lost our identity.

Senator Fergusson: I think I agree with Mrs. Linkletter, and I think we should take into consideration many of the things that Miss Gordon said.

The Chairman: I said that I could not solve her problem, but maybe the committee will find some solution.

Senator Quart: I might just say that I am a grandmother of 23 grandchildren and a great grandmother of three, so I have tried to bridge the generation gap. I understand you to a great extent, but we also ask the young people to understand us.

The Chairman: We thank you for coming here today, for your interest and your concern. We do understand what you are up against in the kind of work that you are doing. You are not new or fresh to us. We have heard from similar groups who have presented their case forcibly and ably, and we will give your presentation a great deal of thought. It is not an easy problem. We will deal with it as quickly as we can.

Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

FAMILY SERVICE ASSOCIATION OF MONTREAL
BRIEF ON POVERTY

Having taken into consideration the scope of personal needs of the people serviced by the Family Service Association, for responsible improvement of family life among the English-speaking residents in Montreal, and focusing upon the services now offered to this end, it is the consensus of the Board of Directors and Staff of the Family Service Association, following a selective analysis of this Agency's work, that future policy making by the Canadian Government concerning the question of poverty in this nation should be cognisant of the critical breakdown in family life especially among poor families because of economic, educational, social condition and polity, and, thereby, should bring together the resources and technology available today to better integrate the basic functions of urban life to assure that man's unalienable right to be human is not destroyed. Consequently, the Family Service Association submits the following recommendations which we believe will re-orient human life in such a way to meet the demand of maintaining a truly human society.

RECOMMENDATIONS AND CONCLUSIONS

1. We maintain that an adequate income to uphold a decent standard of living is the right of every individual in Canada. Therefore, we recommend that individual incomes be guaranteed. Or incomes be adjusted annually and regionally according to the Cost of Living Index of the Economic Council of Canada.

2. We maintain that financial assistance to individuals should be made on a different basis than is presently the case. Therefore, we recommend that economic and educational provisions be instigated in the economic structures for deprived individuals to help them lead a more productive and fulfilling life.

3. In a nation where tenant living is a growing concern, we maintain that the tenant living conditions lack protective safeguards. Therefore, we recommend that legislation be presented to the Canadian Government that would protect all tenants and landlords on an equal basis.

4. We maintain that the individual consumer is not protected equally with the vendor in regards to consumer credit and the purchase of goods. Therefore, we recommend that ways and means be explored, both legislative and educative, to protect the consumer, vis-a-vis credit and advertising. This, we believe, is necessary to ensure that luxury and comfort items are not confused with necessity items by all individuals.

5. We believe that the foregoing recommendations represent only partial or limited solutions to the problem of poverty. Without an exploration of the ways in which wealth has been concentrated and the means by which it may be redistributed, any program aimed at solving the problem of poverty would be largely ineffective.

APPENDIX A

The 97 families on which this report is based, were among the last 115 cases accepted for service in 1969. The 18 single persons accepted during this period have been omitted from these findings, because they presented particular problems, which differed not only in size but in quality, (many were elderly), from the family groups. It should be noted that the families ranged from two to eleven persons in size.

FINDINGS

Income Levels

Twenty-four families, averaging 3.5 persons, received less than $2,000 per annum. Twenty-six families, averaging 4.2 persons, received between $2,000 and $2,900 per annum. Seventeen families, averaging 4.4 persons, received $3,000 and $3,900 per annum. (Two of these families consisted of 10 members, 1 of 11 members). Ten families, averaging 4.1 persons, received between $4,000 and $4,900 per annum. The remaining 20 families, averaging 4.3 persons, received between $5,000 and $12,000 per annum.

This would suggest that 77 families were living on a less than adequate income. Twenty (20) families might be considered to have an adequate income.

Single Parent Families

Forty-one (41) of the 77 low income families were single parent families, (39 mothers).

Five (5) of the 20 higher income families were single parent families.

Reasons for Single Parent Families Among Low Income Groups

Separation accounts for 22 instances.

Death accounts for 11 instances.

Unmarried Mothers account for 7 instances.

Divorce accounts for 1 instance.

Sources of Income of Low Income Families

Thirty-six families were supported by wage-earners (only 10 of them were women). Twenty-five families were supported by Public Assistance (in only one instance were there earnings as well). Eight families were supported by Unemployment Insurance. Five families were supported by Needy Mothers' Allowance. Two families were supported by Department of Veterans Affairs pensions.

A significant contributing factor to the economic deprivation of families which were being supported by one wage-earner, was the high incidence of separation—the need to maintain separate establishments.

Health problems accounted for a large number of the families receiving Public Assistance, but in a number of instances, mothers in good health were required at home to care for children. A surprising number had high school education and might be considered excellent employment prospects.

Mental and Physical Health and Relationship Problems

There appeared to be little significant difference between low and higher income groups in the incidence of mental and physical health problems. All but one of the two parent families in the higher income group, and only 23 of the 36 two parent families in the low income group, were noted to have marital problems. This difference might be accounted for by the fact that higher income families tended to seek help around relationship difficulties, while lower income families frequently sought and received more tangible services, such as help with financing or access to goods and services. The tangible needs tended to obscure the other, and treatment is virtually impossible or ineffective when there are no incomes available to relieve the day-to-day living problems. In approximately one-third of the families of each group, parent-child relationship problems were noted. School drop-outs, particularly in the low income group, were noted.

Other Problems

Indebtedness was noted in a number of instances as was the lack of adequate legal aid for the low income family. Housing presented a major problem for all low income families.

The Immigrant Family had a number of special problems: the inapplicability of the Manpower language-training program for immigrants more than one year in Canada, the inadequacy of the retraining programs as applied to immigrants, in general certain discrimination affecting employment and the basic accommodation of immigrants.

APPENDIX B

A Summary of Family Service Association's Experience in Little Burgundy: July 1, 1967 to May 1, 1969.

Background and Objectives

The Little Burgundy experience began in July 1967 with the assignment of one caseworker to an office located in an area designated for urban renewal.¹ This move was partly in response to a request made to Family Service Association a year earlier by the South Area Council.² Partly, it represented a more concrete reflection of the agency's growing wish to reach out to its constituency, specifically those parts of it unable or unwilling, for a variety of reasons, to seek out its services on their own behalf. In selecting the Little Burgundy area for this kind of outreach operation, FSA were particularly mindful of the opportunity it provided to work with a community in transition and to be not only present in a social situation undergoing change, but, hopefully, to play some kind of role as a change agent—in ways that were initially unspecified and yet to be discovered. In this regard, the Little Burgundy experience was at the same time a kind of "experiment": not only did it assert a wish to bring the traditional agency service—casework—closer to a given population and there see, to translate it into terms which had meaning for that population, but it deliberately set out to explore for itself the possible effectiveness and viability of a new and different role in community involvement and community action. These two objectives—the adaptation and delivery of the traditional "remedial" services, and the search for initiatives geared to acting positively on the environment—proved to be, in many respects, closely interdependent and interrelated.

In locating its staff physically in the same quarters as the Société de service social aux familles, and indeed in sharing with that agency the cost of the outpost operation on some kind of partnership basis, FSA was not only taking into account practical considerations, but was actively seeking to foster collaboration with its French-speaking counterpart. This was seen by both agencies as a first step toward a long-range goal of providing family services to a total population with as much consistency, coverage and dovetailing, as well as economy of effort as possible. The latter was of course consistent with the growing view of "community" as a complex, heterogeneous entity made up of many and varied elements, rather than as a closed, supposedly homogeneous linguistic or sectarian enclave.

¹ The area so designated and named "Little Burgundy" is the one bounded by Guy and Atwater Streets to the East and West, and by St. Antoine Street and the Lachine Canal to the North and South.

Remedial Services

Even though the implantation of casework services in the Little Burgundy neighbourhood were not formally greatly publicized, the availability of those services gradually became known, largely through the operation of an effective "grapevine", with the result that the greatest proportion of clients came self-referred or directed to the agency by friends or relatives. Over time, referrals were made by a variety of other social and health agencies with the notable exception of the City Welfare Department and the schools from whom referrals were rare. An unofficial anti-social agency position on the part of the former and the existence of rather rigid channelling procedures on the part of the latter appear to have been responsible for this. Some efforts were made to open channels of communication and collaboration with both these sources, with limited results.

The significance of the casework experience in Little Burgundy would appear to lie, not so much in a simple statistical picture of the volume of service given, for in that regard the pattern is fairly typical, and shows the usual gradual increase in the demand for service. Rather, its meaning can be read in the kind of service sought and given, and in the more characteristic ways in which the service was used. Typically, the client coming to the Little Burgundy office was one in need of concrete, usually emergency, help, with problems related to food and shelter—i.e., was a person caught up in the basic struggle for survival. Any professional judgement with respect to the character or chronicity of the particular dysfunctioning manifested by this clientele must be made in the light of this reality: whatever their psycho-social failings might be as persons, their basic problem lies in or is overshadowed by the stress generated by living in untenable situations. Whether their circumstances be cause or effect of their coping deficiencies, their basic call is for help in making their particular reality somewhat more bearable. This involves assistance in finding one's way through the "system", and not infrequently, through the very system of services supposedly designed to "help". All but a small percentage of persons seeking the agency's services in Little Burgundy were in financial difficulty and in many instances caught up in the complexities of public assistance procedures.

Clients coming to the Little Burgundy office typically "dropped in", and this fact made the open-door and the ready availability of staff essential. A heavy proportion of contacts were on a first-aid kind of basis, with immediate action to be taken on the presenting problem. This often represented a redirection of referral of the client to subsistence services. This activity revealed the inadequacy of many of these services, both in the private and public sector. Groups such as unattached unemployed older men were particularly difficult to serve, due to the lack of resources.

Attempts to involve some clients in somewhat longer-term, rehabilitative contacts, were successful in only a few instances, an outcome not surprising in the light of the fact that the motivation behind many requests for service was dispelled once the particular crisis was past, making a "foresight" kind of assistance impossible for the worker because it was irrelevant for the client. One important consideration, however, is that a certain number of clients did come back to the agency at other points of crisis and, with some, one could note over time the development of a sense of trust in the agency and of the view that it was a place to which one could turn when in difficulty. The fact that, when attempted, more intensive casework activity resulted in only limited repair and limited healing should not lead one to discount the crucial importance of a service that is crisis-oriented and serves at least to "hold the pieces together" this—in some as yet unevaluated way—preventing further dysfunctioning and further breakdown. This becomes a particularly important factor when one takes into account the large number of children involved in the families served.

Growing out of the activities of the casework staff, some limited attempt was made to expand and diversify that service whose intent was primarily remedial, notably the development of a Mothers' Day Out programme. The goals in setting up this programme were twofold: to allow mothers of small children a half-day a week respite from the daily routine of their case and, over time, hopefully foster a constructive use of this "free" time; an even more important consideration was to provide pre-school children with an opportunity for social and learning stimulation not available in their own homes. This kind of "head-start" experience proved to be the most effective result of the programme. Few mothers were actually freed for a half-day during their child's attendance since most had smaller children for whom to care at home. However, the programme did provide opportunity for contact with mothers and families on other than a crisis basis, and allowed volunteers and staff to interact with mothers on a planning and supportive basis.

Community-related Activities

The agency's involvement in the Little Burgundy community occurred at two levels: that of direct "animation" of some residents in groups, and that related to what might be called the "community of services", i.e. other institutions, groups and agencies. Two staff members addressed themselves particularly to the community sphere of activity—the community organizer and the coordinator in charge of the Little Burgundy office.

The agency first addressed itself to families and individuals displaced by the expropriation carried out in connection with the Trans-Canada Highway (north side of St. Antoine Street). This involved helping displaced families make use of legal help where indicated, and, through the use of indigenous staff provided by the agency, facilitate the transition to other housing. In spite of its inherent merit, this project began too late to be of significant effectiveness.

The bulk of the "animation" activity with groups of residents occurred in relation to two groups of parents: the Royal Arthur Parents' Association and the Concerned Parents of St. Anthony and Affiliated Schools. Both of these groups operated outside the school framework, though increasingly in cooperation with school administrative personnel. The Royal Arthur group explored Recommendation I of the Parent Report and generally maintained an interest (though took no initiatives) in matters educational. This group undertook two projects in the first two years of its existence. It first became active in trying to obtain fencing and increased safety measures on the CNR tracks crossing the area. Having pursued their campaign a certain distance, the group was instrumental in the formation of a committee made up of some social agencies in the area, citizens' groups and CNR personnel. A firm and formal promise was obtained by this group that suitable fencing and other safety measures would be installed. At the same time, it was understood that continuing safety education measures would be undertaken by the schools, citizens' groups and some social agencies acting collaboratively. This provided a concrete basis for further coordinated efforts on the part of various community elements.

The Royal Arthur group's second initiative led to the establishment of a community clothing room operated by the parents in space provided by the Negro Community Centre. In spite of some administrative and procedural difficulties, this service seemed to provide a worthwhile addition to the resources available to all neighbourhood families. It provided the parents' group with a sense of purpose, an opportunity to engage in a meaningful process of collective activity which led them, at the end of their second year, to direct their efforts more specifically to problems developing from the proposed renewal of Campbell's Blocks. In this latter initiative, both groups sponsored by the agency joined forces, and gave indication of becoming more clearly "action" groups. Up to this point, the other group, the "Concerned Parents" group had been involved largely with providing recreational activities for the children in the Catholic schools and, at the end of their first year of existence, were undertaking the more formidable task of making representation to the City for the provision of more playground space.

Agency involvement with community components other than citizens' groups per se addressed itself to four areas: (1) the coordination of services; (2) the improvement of services and development of new services; (3) planning and (4) social action.

(1) Specific efforts at coordinating services occurred in relation to the given objective to serve the total English-speaking community in Little Burgundy, some four thousand people, about half Roman Catholic and the other half of other or no religious affiliation. Specific terms of collaboration were worked out whereby FSA staff were to extend case-work and community organization services to the Catholic population, as well as to its own constituency, in return for a counterpart arrangement where the Catholic family agency would serve the non-Catholic population in Point St. Charles. Similarly, FSA agreed to pick up whatever role might have been carried by the Montreal Council of Social Agencies' staff. As it happened, this role had already been phased out. Discussions were also held with the Society for the Protection of Women and Children regarding mutually satisfactory terms of inter-agency referrals. Some contact was established with the schools with a view to encouraging early referrals to Family Service. In connection with Christmas giving, the agency also took some initiative to ensure coordination of effort among various neighbourhood resources. Efforts to encourage some fruitful liaison with the Company of Young Canadians also working in the area proved unsuccessful, and communication with this group remained on an informal basis. Peripheral to the coordination activity yet hopefully contributing to it, were contacts essentially of interpretation and information to the staffs of agencies such as the Child Health Association, Children's Service Centre and Allcroft, the Diet Dispensary, the Council and Red Feather Groups, as well as with colleague services such as the Negro Community Centre, Tynedale House, the City Housing Department, the Victorian Order of Nurses.

(2) Activities addressed to the improvement of services and the development of new services were—some abortive, some successful, some in process beyond the period covered by this report. Among the first group was a project proposed by the Mental Hygiene Institute to offer services and carry out research in Belmont School. This did not materialize, but agency time was invested in groundwork and in exploring feasibility. A beginning interest on the part of the Seventh Day Adventist Church in establishing a social service centre in the vicinity was explored and an offer of help with planning and coordination was made by FSA, but this was not pursued by the church group. A plan proposed by Rotary Club to make available sewing machines for a neighbourhood sewing room was also explored, and liaison established with the Société de Service social aux Familles in connection with their interest in taking initiative in this regard.

Contacts with this same agency allowed for a regular exchange of information and exploration of possible areas of collaboration. Most notable of these was the joint preparation of a brief and a meeting with officials of the City Welfare Department in an effort to facilitate the use of their service for clients, and generally press for more humane and efficient procedures. Finally, a beginning contact was made in the direction of exploring the possible development of psychiatric services for children. The Mothers' Day Out programme already referred to represented a different kind of "service". It also involved coordination of staff, volunteers, and host agency.

(3) Community-related planning activities were carried out through involvement in the South Area Council, specifically in the Steering Committee appointed to give it a more dynamic, action-oriented emphasis and a Little-Burgundy-wide coordinating role. The proposed new structure of the Council was seen as fostering not only coordination of effort within the network of English-speaking services, but also as serving as a formal bridge for continuing involvement and collaboration with the French-speaking community.

Contacts maintained with the City Housing Department staff in Little Burgundy provided for the exchange of information about agency activity in the area, on the one hand, and city plans for the neighbourhood on the other. A survey of some residents of Campbell's Blocks (the next area slated for urban renewal) was carried out as part of an effort to identify more closely the needs and wants of a segment of the community and, if possible, to detect some leadership potential for future involvement in organized community activity.

(4) Certain social action activities were also carried out, specifically related to the work of the Committee for the Safety of Pedestrians Crossing the CNR Tracks. There was also participation in the work of a committee originating in the St. Henri district, consisting of a group of French-speaking workers intent on addressing the problems generated by the policies and procedures of the City Welfare Department. The participation of concerned English speaking residents of Little Burgundy was encouraged and facilitated by FSA staff.

In retrospect, to date, the Little Burgundy experience suggests... apart from justification for continuing to bring remedial services to a particularly disadvantaged and demoralized population (i.e., family services)... two major functions for FSA: 1) a "creation and coordination of services" function and 2) a community action function.

The first function, that of creating and coordinating services, represents a continuing involvement with the community of institutions and services, for example, schools, churches, and various groups, as well as other agencies. It supposes the agency in the role of a stimulator or energizer who identifies the need, does the groundwork activity, "starts things" and determines (and mobilizes) the leadership appropriate to carry out a plan. The "community action" function calls for a commitment to provide staff and means to foster and enhance citizen participation in the affairs of the community. This represents an activity through which the people themselves are helped to sort out what their problems are and to organize the forces in their area in order to take steps to solve these problems. It calls for direct involvement with the population and should include using residents on "project" committees along with board and staff. Such an involvement would suppose a concerted programme of information and interpretation to the people concerned and the deliberate and planful development of their leadership possibilities. Other supporting functions to the above two consist in study and analysis of the community, both total and specific... a sifting and analysis of available data and a search for new data. Acquiring cumulatively knowledge of the community would represent an essential step not only in sketching out programme direction but in establishing programme priorities for the agency itself, both in terms of its total constituency and specific constituencies within it. All of these activities suppose and would require a continuing and effective link with relevant community planning bodies.

PEDDLERS—ACCOUNTS BUYERS IN LITTLE BURGUNDY

by: Kenneth Banks

On the morning of Friday, 20 February 1970, I happened onto a discouraging situation, let me share it with you.

This particular Friday, when I dropped into the Centre, to say "hi", one of the women who works there said that she had something to ask me when I got out of the other meeting. She is a very intelligent woman, who takes wonderful care of her husband, ten children (including an infant), and runs a house and still has time to help on school groups and at the Clothing Depot. When I came back, it took some coaxing from her friends to get her to tell me that three weeks before, her television console, stereo set, two lamps, an artificial fireplace of emotional value, fifty (50) long playing records and several tables had been taken by the bailiffs because they had missed $2 payment towards a $60 debt for children's clothing, bought from a door-to-door peddler.

In various low income areas of Montreal, there are peddlers who offer term payments to people who cannot get credit elsewhere due to low income. The people of these areas refer to the peddler with whom they deal as "my Jew".

I was very upset that this would happen to any family operating under financial stress, but with this particular family which functions quite well, I found it appalling that this situation would occur. That same afternoon, I dropped over to her house in order to see the summons and the court order. The $60 debt was now up to $137, with court and bailiff's costs added in. Moreover, the sum was not owed to her peddler, but he had sold the account to an accounts' buyer.

I called Association Coopérative d'économie Familiale for information as to the legal aspects of this seizure. Their lawyer said that they usually didn't have loop-holes, and that the court protected these companies; as a matter of fact, they employ a full time lawyer to process their court actions at the Account Buyers. Then I called the manager of the Account Buyers, after establishing that the family was under the impression that they would have to pay the total amount, less $18 paid since the seizure, in order to get the furniture back. They couldn't raise this kind of money and had almost despaired of getting the furniture back. When the manager came to the phone, he demanded to know who I was, why I was called on the client's behalf, and what would I do about the situation. He said that such families have difficulties because they can't stay out of bed and have too many children, he also said that the client's brother had reneged on his account with them and skipped town, and in order to force the client to tell them the whereabouts of this brother, they took the client's furniture. At this point I was angry, but felt that it would not help our case to blow off at him as he held all of the cards. After his editorial comments, we settled down to hard bargaining. He said that we must pay the costs of court and seizure, over and above the court's settlement, before we could gain release of the furniture, this amounted to $58.25. The remainder of $105.25, plus 9 per cent interest, would be paid at a rate of $2 per week. I replied that the client had no money for this and since he couldn't get that kind of money for the furniture on a bailiff's sale anyhow, he should accept the $20 which we could raise from our petty cash in "social welfare money" to help the client. (I thought we might as well give him a line). He replied that his accountants would suspend him if he gave the stuff up too cheaply, and how would he feed his family? I replied that if this happened, we would be glad to help him too. He accepted the $20 for his release papers, but we still had to pay off the bailiff's trucking and storage charge. I called an agency lawyer but he couldn't do anything for us at this point.

The next Tuesday the husband, wife and myself went to the Accounts Buyers to get their release for the $20. We asked to see their balance sheet and to know when they would be through paying on this account, plus when we asked for an itemized contract of account, we received a demonstration of some of the wildest mathematical manipulations and double talk that we had ever seen. After trying to get a straight answer three times, we succumbed to the harangue. Again I felt helpless and frustrated, and told him that social agencies had traditionally taken a soft line on exploitation, but that this trend was changing, that the agencies and their clientele were becoming aware of alternatives to doing business this way. The manager replied that he was a taxpayer and that social agencies could only operate as long as taxpayers allowed them to function. He said that we knew that we could do nothing. We left. I had a headache. The important lesson learned from that encounter was, as the husband said, "those bastards are real crooks, aren't they?" They realized that the law and court protected the companies, and that they don't stand a chance against the whims of these business men. Most important, they realized that it wasn't their fault, they didn't have to feel ashamed over the seizure of their furniture. But this still didn't help the fact that the court action had still doubled their liability, and they still hadn't paid the bailiff.

The wife called the bailiff's warehouse for three days without success. Finally, I drove out to Bogan Street near Hochelaga Avenue in the East End to find that the "warehouse" was a corner flat with the drapes pulled and a "For Rent" sign in the window. After ringing the bell, I waited until a man peeked around the drapes and asked what I wanted. I stated my purpose. He then looked through his files, which were perched on old TV sets and said that if he picked up the stuff in the next afternoon, it would cost us $26.50.

The next day, the clients rented a trailer which we hooked onto my car (they don't have one), and with a Family Service Association cheque and client money, we headed out to Bogan Street warehouse. We got there at 4:40 p.m. and rang the doorbell. Finally a guy came around the building and told us that we should wait as they were loading stuff in back. When they were through, the man I had spoken to in English the afternoon before, told us in French that it was his quitting time, we couldn't get the stuff. The wife, whom I hadn't realized spoke French, suddenly came out with a tirade of French which got us into the office. Then he wouldn't accept the Family Service Association cheque. We argued to no avail and we knew that none of us ever carried that kind of money. But we checked our pockets anyway—I had $11.48 by some freak chance, she had $12 apartment rent money left after renting the trailer, and he had $2 in his wallet. We had $26.48 in cash! A drunk who had watched us with some interest as we emptied our pockets, offered to chip in a nickle, but the proprietor graciously waived the $.48. We got our receipt. Then we found that he didn't have the stuff around there. After some grumbling, he gave us another address where we would meet him to get the furniture. We were skeptical, but what could we do? At least, we had a receipt. Twenty minutes later, we found ourselves in an alleyway behind a modern highrise apartment building, alone. Ten minutes later the bailiff arrived too, and lo and behold, the whole garage of the apartment building was filled with seized washers, TV sets, tables, rugs, a beautiful Thunderbird, everything you could imagine! Our client's belongings were spread around in such a way that it was obvious that they weren't expected to retrieve them. I would imagine that they do prefer to sell this stuff from the way that setup looks. The clients are now happy, the Accounts Buyer is happy (the court order still looms over the clients' furniture). I will also be happy if we can let as many as possible of our workers and clients learn from our experience. Observe these points:

1. Don't buy from a door-to-door salesman.
2. If you can't get bank or department store credit, go to Association Coopérative d'économie Familiale (through Family Service Association's help).
3. If you do get a summons, get it to your social worker who should go to court with you.

4. Tell everyone you know, not to deal with this type of businessman.

5. That we should help form action groups to get Provincial and/or Federal legislation to protect the poor consumer.

NOTE: It is important to note that this is but one of many such cases.

APPENDIX D

COMMENTS ON SENATE POVERTY COMMITTEE BRIEF

by: R. A. Davis, Supervisor
Little Burgundy Office

1. I think it is dangerous to define poverty as income alone. How people have to spend what they get is equally important, especially when it appears that the lower the income, the higher the proportion is eaten up in interest charges from increasingly legitimate sources. A person from the Cooperative Family Economics Association of the Region of Montreal, the other day indicated that the average Canadian has a minus net worth or is in debt. False values in society can put pressures on people to live in NDG (Notre Dame de Grace) and actually neglect survival needs. This is a dimension of poverty which is not often attended to—the so-called “middle class” poverty.

2. The welfare system is designed for the purpose of making bureaucratic jobs for middle and upper income people—not to serve the poor. Why is this elaborate system needed? The traditional answer is that it prevents fraud. The truth is that most poor people are very honest and scrupulous. Many very rich and middle income people get that way by being dishonest. Yet the myth persists that the income of poor people should be reviewed before they are given welfare while the rich and middle income are presumed honest enough that random spot checks are deemed sufficient to insure that taxes are not being cheated on.

3. Raising the legal standards for minimum decency of living is not enough. Legislation must be administered. As long as it is necessary for people to apply for welfare, there will always be a large reservoir of people who lack the verbal skills, or who are afraid to apply at Welfare Departments guarded by policemen. Presently, the poor are required to demonstrate they are poor to establish their eligibility. Until the administration is turned around, many will continue to be ineligible and in great need. The burden of proof should be on the bureaucracy to show that people are ineligible or else they will be presumed to be eligible if they declare their income to be below a certain level. At present, middle and upper income people are assumed to be filing correct income tax returns until they are proven fraudulent. Poor people should be accorded the same right.

In actual practice, the flow of funds through the welfare departments is regulated through—1. the establishment of eligibility, 2. “budgetting”. Whether it is practiced or not, intimidation is a very real possibility under the present system.

4. The question of employment has to do with people who have been made obsolete by technology—i.e. the question of putting people back into the labor market is itself an obsolete form for settling the employment question. In former times, employees benefited from having a large pool of unemployed, unskilled laborers always available to trade physical labour for depressed wages. Machines have eliminated the need for unskilled manual labour in most fields of employment. They have seriously reduced the need for many white collar jobs. The economy has coped with this by—1. Padding the existing structure of jobs, which may help to raise profits or stabilize them, but which do not concentrate on the essentials non-survival. Specifically, the private industry sector pours billions into advertising, marketing, packaging, public relations and sales at the upper income levels, all designed to stimulate buying for non-survival needs. Questions of public health, nutrition, shelter and transportation have a smaller economic emphasis. The kinds of jobs being created are bureaucratic jobs which are easily controlled by the large private sector financial empires. They are jobs which tend to stabilize and petrify the present class structure. People who cannot easily fit into this structure be of health, lack of verbal skills or the needed control and ability to be compliant in the face of pressures to conform to the rigidity of this structure end up poor. Many of them would not want the kind of jobs being offered by the present structure of society even if they could find acceptance in them.

2. Industry has coped with mechanization and automation by an increased emphasis on the consumptive process. When prices are adjusted partially by industry agreements and “self-regulation” and partially by supply and demand, the consumer rather than the wage earner gets the emphasis. We have mentioned the emphasis for artificial stimulation to create new "needs". Planned obsolescence and an emphasis on the value of having only things that are new are other techniques to stimulate greater demand. In short, the economy needs poor people as consumers and not as producers. They are being stimulated as much as middle class people to spend their resources on non-survival "needs". Because they have fewer resources they are more vulnerable and less able to protect themselves from the multi-media onslaught.

In human terms the distortions of basic human values and disintegration of communities is appalling. In economic terms the cliché that poverty is a disease that everyone has an interest in eliminating is not exactly accurate. The poor are efficient consumers—i.e. in relation to the very small incomes they receive they can be relied upon to buy a high proportion of non-essential goods. If they had a little more money, they could afford to shop more carefully and to exercise better judgment. It should also be noted that the poor provide organized crime with its greatest source of income.

For these reasons I believe it is unrealistic to speak of putting people on welfare back into the labor market. It would tend to perpetuate the present structure of society, even if it were possible. It would not deal with the problems of affluence.

I would like to look for a moment at the problem of a guaranteed income. People often make vague statements about a guaranteed income having "unpredictable" effects on the economy. Both the proponents and opponents seem to neglect the possibility that a guaranteed income could be studied scientifically before its institution. I hold that there are certain things that could be said about it.

The greatest fear usually expressed is that everyone would quit his job, and we would all starve to death. This is patent nonsense. People just aren't going to allow themselves or their neighbors to starve. Work really has to be done for survival. A guaranteed income would not change that fact. What it would do would be to change the present wage system. If the possibility of forcing people to work through the threat of deprivation were eliminated, a lot of jobs which are disliked would either be eliminated or, if essential, receive higher wages. In short, the labor market, if unregulated, is like any other market—it reverts to the law of supply and demand. The regulator has always been the threat of cutting people off from subsistence. Remove this and the labor market will seek its level. Non-essential jobs will be eliminated. Nobody would pay higher wages for jobs that didn't need to be done. They couldn't afford it. Essential work would be done by those who wanted to work in survival-oriented jobs, either through choice or the inducement of higher wages, or a combination of the two. Many presently low-paying jobs would tend to get much upgraded. Many high paying jobs would be much downgraded. One fact would tend to emerge. People would be happy with their work or they wouldn't work, or they would find some other work.

There is little doubt that many people would not work at all given the present array of tasks offered by society if they could be assured of a very modest but decent income. A premium would be placed on the acceleration of automation to take up the slack in essential services for survival. It is doubtful, however, whether these people would remain idle. They would begin to redefine work in terms which they would be free to invent. This would probably result in the development of new skills in the arts and sciences of human development.

Of course, some people say: "How can you make people behave themselves if you cannot use the sanction of threatening their livelihood?" This question is a serious one and bears analysis. Would a guaranteed income tend to weaken the restraints of civilization which have formed man into his present character? Would we be producing people, suddenly "liberated" from their normal patterns of living, who, bored and empty, would dissolve into an anti-social mob which would end up destroying the very goose that laid the golden egg. There are, I think, some very effective restraints to present this. Most people are not stupid enough to stand around and watch sources of golden eggs being throttled. They would act, in community, to protect their geese from bored, empty people. Even bored, empty people manage to look after their own geese, e.g. the rich of present day society. The sanction of threatening livelihood could still be replaced by the threatening of freedom if necessary.

If the possible effects of a guaranteed income be good, why haven't we had it already? We have been living in a relatively affluent world for roughly 20 years now. Why hasn't it been tried before? Here the answer almost seems to be self-evident. Despite the soothing sounds of comfort which often come from the mouths of proponents of guaranteed income, it would mean nothing short of the complete abolition of the free enterprise economy which is built on the foundation of coerced labour using the sanction of deprivation of the means of survival. The sanction is rarely, if ever, employed. The threat is enough to keep society organized the way it presently is. Remove this sanction and the basis for privilege now enjoyed by those who direct the top echelons of corporate life would also be removed.

Guaranteed Income is often couched in the rhetoric of liberal humanitarianism. In fact, it is a very radical idea calling for a wide-sweeping change in the economic structure of society.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, May 5, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order. During this month representatives of provinces will appear and present their point of view on the study we are making. The first one, which is here today, is the Province of Nova Scotia. On my right is the Honourable Gordon A. Tidman, who is a very distinguished Nova Scotian, born, brought up and educated in Nova Scotia. He has been Minister of Public Welfare for the province since 1969 and is a distinguished member of the bar. He has been in politics since 1967.

He will introduce his colleagues and make an opening statement.

The Honourable Gordon A. Tidman, Minister of Public Welfare, Province of Nova Scotia: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Senator Fergusson, Senator Inman and gentlemen: May I first introduce these two distinguished gentlemen. On my immediate right is Dr. F.R. MacKinnon, Deputy Minister of Public Welfare for the province. Sitting next to Dr. MacKinnon is Mr. John Angus MacKenzie, Director of Research and Planning.

May I first of all express our thanks for the opportunity to appear to give our views on the pressing problem of poverty in Canada. We realize, Mr. Chairman, that you have read volumes of material presented to you during the time these hearings have been in progress. We also realize that some of the things we will be saying today will be repetitious. However, they are our views and in that respect are unique.

With your permission Mr. Chairman, I will give a short summary of our brief and recommendations.

A form of income guarantee for all persons is under wide discussion in Canada and elsewhere today. We felt our brief would be incomplete without expressing our views on such a program. We are not convinced that a guaranteed annual income would be a panacea for our problem of poverty. While we support a system that would provide an adequate income for the total population we have serious doubts about a universal program at this time. Some questions we have regarding such a proposal are:

1. There is not sufficient evidence that a universal program would do away with the need for supplementation and consequently we may simply add another program to an already confusing welfare delivery system.

2. We have doubts regarding the matter of incentive.

3. The cost of financing with adequate levels of payment.

4. What inflationary pressures would be created by such a program.

However, Mr. Chairman, we feel that these questions should be further researched and we are very anxious to see the results of programs presently in effect in the State of New Jersey, which I am sure will provide many useful insights in ascertaining the feasibility of introducing such a program.

We feel we should be placing more emphasis on making payments under our present assistance programs more adequate and secure for long term recipients of assistance. If the Federal Government would consider simplifying, stabilizing and making adequate assistance payments to persons whose need is well known and long term the beneficial effect in alleviating poverty could be very great. The suggested change would include such groups as the physically and mentally disabled, the blind and widows with dependent children. In Nova Scotia these groups comprise approximately 90 per cent of the total assistance case load.

In our brief, Mr. Chairman, we make the following specific recommendations.

1. That the Canada Assistance Plan be amended to provide a more stable and adequate income for long term unemployable recipients of social assistance;

2. That increased federal sharing beyond 50 per cent be provided to the Atlantic provinces under the Canada Assistance, and that this increased cost sharing be related to the special social welfare needs of each province;

3. That a massive, imaginative and creative effort be made in the field of housing to encourage low cost housing, public housing and, indeed, all types of housing for the poor and marginal income groups;

4. That the federal Government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, pay a subsidy for a five-year period to provide homes for families earning $5,000 or less, and based upon family need;

5. That the Income Tax Act structure be amended to increase the personal exemption for mentally and physically disabled persons so that continuing incentive may be provided for their employment;

6. That development programs for areas such as the Atlantic provinces place as much emphasis on human resources as on the physical side. The federal Government should involve industry, labour, consumers of services, the universities and government at all levels in a program of regional development to upgrade education, improve housing, create employment opportunities and prevent poverty at its source;

7. That much greater flexibility and imagination be introduced into the provision of tax incentives, and that tax incentives and subsidies be provided to private industry to enlist this sector in a war on poverty so that job opportunities may be created, training opportunities provided, and the skill and expertise of industry fully utilized;

8. That the federal Government revitalize the rehabilitation program it started in 1951, which is now almost static, and that through increased federal sharing from 50 to at least 75 per cent and other similar devices:

(a) additional assistance be provided for sheltered workshops and activity centres for the disabled and handicapped;

(b) additional grants and resources be made available to rehabilitation centres;

(c) new models of federal/provincial co-operation and co-ordination be encouraged between the Departments of Public Welfare and Public Health so that greater impetus may be given to job training, upgrading, counselling, and placement of marginal workers, underdeveloped minority groups, and recipients of assistance;

(d) day care programs, head start activities and homemaker services receive increased federal assistance and encouragement;

9. The development of a social insurance program to provide for loss of income due to sickness and disability, coordinated if possible with the unemployment insurance program and earnings related;

10. That the federal Government act immediately on the recommendation contained in the Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada and substantially strengthen the social science research capabilities in Canada; that special attention be given to the practical application of research knowledge and techniques to the social problems confronting us.

11. That a Social Science Council of Canada be created with the highest level of representation from the social sciences, and from those involved in the practical application of the social sciences to social welfare programming and policy making; that this council be the counterpart of the Economic Council of Canada, and that these two bodies make continuing recommendations regarding the elimination of poverty in Canada;

12. The establishment of a select representative body advisory to the Minister of National Health and Welfare composed of representatives from the fields of finance, business, industry, labour, the professions, the media, the universities and government at all levels to consider the problems of poverty in Canada and to make recommendations how poverty may be eradicated.

That, Mr. Chairman, is a summary of the brief, and we are now at your pleasure.

Senator Carter: Mr. Tidman, I gather from your brief that you are not too optimistic about the operation of the guaranteed annual income.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: As I have mentioned, we have many reservations. It is rather difficult to be in principle against a type of program that would guarantee a basic and adequate income for all Canadians. However, I have mentioned some of the matters that concern us about such a program, such as what it would do to incentive, whether or not it would simplify a delivery system or whether it would merely add another program to a delivery system that people now are saying is very confusing. I think at all levels of government we are concerned about the inflationary pressures that would be created by such a program if money became available, what this would do to prices, and we are particularly concerned about, what it would do for housing, especially in areas where housing is in short supply and people with low incomes find it very difficult to get housing; we are concerned about what inflationary pressures would do to that situation.

Senator Carter: Is it not a fact that there is a tendency on the part of provinces today to try to consolidate social payments under the umbrella of the Canada Assistance Plan? Would you agree with that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, yes, I think so in some areas. For instance, the assistance to the disabled and blind is now coming under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Carter: Would not the guaranteed income be carrying it another step further to its logical conclusion?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I do not think it would, because you are in a different area altogether. That may be good for some programs. I do not know whether a universal program can operate following through the principle you have stated to its logical conclusion.

Senator Carter: The Canada Assistance Plan is based on need, and its main purpose was to eliminate the old system of a means test. The Canada Assistance Plan does not define need; it leaves each province to make its own definition of need. Can you tell the committee how need is defined in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: There are many formulae of need. There is a benefit level, based on a cost of living index. In our province, unfortunately, that cost of living index is what it was in 1965 rather than as it is in 1970, and we had a lot to say to the Honourable Mr. Munro on Friday when we presented a brief to him regarding a formula under the Canada Assistance Plan. Benefit levels are set, and this determines need. We have rather a unique situation in Nova Scotia in that we have municipal units responsible, for the most part, for short term assistance, the province being responsible for long term assistance. We set out a minimum level of payments to the municipal units in order for them to have cost sharing with the province, but they are pretty well on their own as to what levels they can establish.

Senator Carter: You have a maximum, a ceiling, I think I read somewhere in your brief, of $175?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: That is right.

Senator Carter: No matter how big the family or how great the need?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: That is right.

Senator Carter: So you are really not carrying out the spirit of the Canada Assistance Plan, because if a need is greater than $175 a month it is not recognized.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, that is true, and we would very much like to remove that ceiling. Of course, this is another matter that we pointed out. As your chairman pointed out, this is a matter which is contained in Appendix B of the brief you have before you. It is a matter we discussed very thoroughly and about which we stated our concerns to Mr. Munro on Friday last.

Senator Carter: If you spend $175 a month on a family you get half of that back from the federal Government do you not?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Carter: Therefore, you are actually only spending less than $80.00. Suppose the need was $200 a month, you would still get $100 back. Your increase would only go up from $90 to $100, which is $10 a month. What is the obstacle preventing that? Nova Scotia is paying taxes just like everybody else. Why don't you try to get back your share from the federal Government? What is preventing you from doing this?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We do that, senator, but we have many programs in the department and it is a matter of trying to do all you can with the money which is available, that is, provincial moneys.

The level was increased from $150 to $175 last July. Of course, we would like very much to increase that again by either taking the ceiling off of it altogether or to at least increase it to $200 or $250 a month rather than $175.

Senator Carter: If we did that wouldn't we be getting closer to the guaranteed annual income?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It depends upon what type of guaranteed income you are talking about. I would appreciate it if you would define for me the type of program you envisage under a guaranteed income plan.

Senator Carter: It has been brought out in evidence which we have had before, particularly from Dr. Willard, that our idea of guaranteed annual income is a little different from yours. You seem to feel that a guaranteed annual income would cover everything and that there would be no need for any other services. Dr. Willard told us quite plainly that if we had a guaranteed annual income we would still have specifications and short term assistance.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: That is exactly what I am saying.

Senator Carter: I suppose the guaranteed annual income depends on what money can be allocated to it. I would envisage that we would get set goals or targets which we would meet. We might not be able to meet it the first, second or third year, but we would have the targets and work towards it. I am not concerned about the dollars and cents, but the principle of the thing as compared with the Canada Assistance Plan and the hodge-podge which we have today.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Of course, as I stated before, it is pretty difficult to be against such a program in principle, but unfortunately it is a matter of the practical application and whether it will in fact work. That is why we feel that one has to take a hard look at its practical application and what will be the problems if such a program is introduced.

We are simply pointing out in our brief that we are concerned about these particular problems I have mentioned and would like to see more research done on them. We are certainly very interested in learning the results, when they are available, of this project that is now underway in New Jersey.

Senator Carter: You have not given us any concrete evidence. You have expressed your concern in a very vague way. We are all concerned and all see problems. You must have more than that to go on if you are planning to shoot the thing down. You have got to have pretty good solid evidence, the same as you would have if you were going to support it.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I have someone with me, senator, who has done a lot of research into the forms of guaranteed income. Perhaps Mr. MacKenzie would like to say a few words.

Mr. John A. MacKenzie, Director of Research and Planning, Department of Public Welfare, Province of Nova Scotia: It becomes very difficult. The type of guaranteed income I ascertain you are speaking about is really embodied in the Canada Assistance Plan which was designed to pay assistance to people on the basis of need. If that is all you define as a guaranteed income then I do not think we have a quarrel. When you speak of Theobald and Friedman and some of the other chaps who have been writing on things like the negative income tax, the Theobald supplement, or demogrant system, you will find that there have been many questions raised.

If you take the Friedman approach, which guarantees a portion of needed income, whether this be a flat portion or a graduated one, it is probably cheaper, but it really does not deal with the problem of poverty. I do not think it will deal with the problem of poverty any more effectively than our present needs test program which is in operation with the Canada Assistance Plan. In addition to this it is always based on last year's earnings and it does not get at immediate short term needs. Therefore, you already have some supplementation. As you know, in these types of programs when you have a flaw like this you are going to get into a great deal more supplementation. Of course, one of the assets here is supposed to be that it will contribute toward incentives. People who work will always get more and therefore they will be encouraged to work. This is of course assuming that man only works in order to make money, and there are writers who have some serious questions as to why man works, and whether he works for bread alone.

Senator Carter: The New Jersey experiment has pretty well answered that question, has it not?

Mr. MacKenzie: I do not think it has yet. They are looking at a number of things, such as the effect of an occurring income of a negative income variety which is a percentage of total need. In a number of ways they are looking at it in respect to the mobility of a person, whether he will move to take a job, and consequently look at the incentives. They are also looking at it in respect to the family solidarity and the effects of such a program of the education attainment, relationship between husband and wife, political consciousness of the family and a variety of factors. Maybe there is something out recently which I have not seen.

Senator Carter: With regard to one point incentive, if they have demonstrated anything at all they have demonstrated that the guaranteed annual income did not destroy incentive. If the working poor get additional payment, on the contrary, it encourages them to get into the mainstream of life and to participate in life and society and work harder to maintain that position and to improve it.

Mr. MacKenzie: I am not sure it has categorically proven this one way or the other. My understanding is that they still have some time to go in analyzing this in order to find out. This is one of the things we are hanging our arguments onto, but we want to see the results first.

If you look at the second form which is Theobald's, you will see that it is mainly based on the assumption of the new social order rather than the Friedman type which is based on promoting the free enterprise system and doing away with the interference of governments with so many welfare programs. Theobald would deal with the problem of poverty.

There would be a guarantee but once again it would be based on last year's income, because it would be done through the tax structure. It would be tremendously costly.

Senator Carter: How costly would that be? I know it would be costly, but I would think it would cut down the cost. Administering it through income tax means you have to pay for it anyway.

Mr. MacKenzie: I do not think there is anyone who has said that the Theobald plan would be less costly.

Senator Carter: What is making the extra cost?

Mr. MacKenzie: I think that when you move from an inadequate to a poverty program, to a program to provide assistance on a poverty level, you automatically go up in cost.

Senator Carter: Are we not doing that in the guaranteed income supplement at the present time?

Mr. MacKenzie: I do not think we are, and if we are, we are doing it for a very small segment of the population.

Senator Carter: I know it was for a small segment of the population but are you saying it is increasing the cost?

Mr. MacKenzie: Pardon me?

Senator Carter: Are you saying that it is increasing the cost because we are doing this, paying the old age pensioner a negative income tax instead of the guaranteed income supplement?

Mr. MacKenzie: I think the total cost of the program has increased.

Senator Carter: It has increased because of the payments but not because of the administration.

Mr. MacKenzie: Oh, no, I am not singling out administration or payments, because there are many unanswered questions.

Senator Carter: If you are going to pay even more, you must increase the cost. I cannot see the force of your argument.

Mr. MacKenzie: The force of my argument is this, that nobody really seemed to know what it was going to cost. Every time you read an article there is a different suggestion, as to a different cost of guaranteed income, and this varies with the type of guaranteed income.

Senator Carter: You said earlier in answer to a question that it would not be any more than the Canada Assistance Plan now, and if the Canada Assistance Plan is not working as it should that is not the fault of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. MacKenzie: No.

Senator Carter: It is the fault of the provinces and of the priorities they give. If you in Nova Scotia decide to have a ceiling of $175 a month, you are establishing a priority.

Mr. MacKenzie: That is right, but when you look at the Atlantic Provinces you have a two-fold problem. On the one hand you have a large segment of dependent population and you have a relatively low provincial tax base to support that population, because of the backwardness in respect of industrial development. You have also got the problem of trying to introduce industrial development and to provide jobs. And you are going off at two tangents at the same time. You have to have the population to do this. You have an added factor of a heavy dependency load. I think there is agreement that the welfare payments, aside from the categorically dependent, are not the answer to poverty in the long run. Only jobs are, and an adequate wage structure. You get in the double bind and that is what we are concerned with.

One of the big flaws we see in the Canada Assistance Plan is that the Canada Assistance Plan is based on the formula of dollar for dollar and as such it assumes that each province has an equal tax base from which to put moneys into welfare. Over and above this, because of our state of industrial development, our high unemployment rates, our low labour force participation rates—and this is probably more exaggerated in Newfoundland than in any other province—you have this trouble and this problem with a much larger proportion of the population, including welfare.

The answer is to alter the formula in a way which would take into consideration regional disparity, which would take into consideration the needs across Canada, rather than introduce any blanket new program, which we do not really know so much about yet.

Senator Carter: I gather from your recommendations that you recommend there should be a different basis for the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. MacKenzie: That is right.

Senator Carter: What formula would you prefer? Would you prefer the 50 per cent plus an extra in proportion to the difference between the annual per capita income, or something like that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This is what the formula is based on. It is one based on labour force participation rates and per capita income, and takes into account the difference in per capita income in various provinces, and the formula is arrived at after taking those factors into consideration.

Senator Carter: Have you submitted a copy of the formula?

Mr. MacKenzie: Yes, we have.

Senator Carter: Could you get it to this committee, the actual formula?

Mr. MacKenzie: Yes. I believe it is in Appendix B.

The Chairman: What was the old formula?

Mr. MacKenzie: It is not in the appendix but in a separate brief which we referred to Mr. Munro.

Senator Sparrow: You referred to page 11?

Mr. MacKenzie: The formula is not in this brief but in a separate brief. What we tried to do in the formula is a variation in industrial development over the tax resource base to provide that.

Using these figures in Newfoundland, instead of the dollar for dollar as in the Canada Assistance Plan, Newfoundland would get $1.40 for every dollar expended, taking into consideration the greater need in this particular area, due to the increased assistance case load and due to factors like the lower state of industrial development, which is a reflection of the tax.

The Chairman: Mr. MacKenzie, what is the present formula?

Mr. MacKenzie: Dollar for dollar.

The Chairman: How do they fix it? What was the thinking behind it? There must have been negotiations?

Dr. MacKinnon: How was it fixed? I think, Mr. Chairman, there were no negotiations. This idea of a 50-50 split has become somewhat historic and traditional. I do not think there is any rationale to it. I am not aware that there was any rationale to it.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Was there not, Dr. MacKinnon? At the time the formula was arrived at, did not the Atlantic Provinces make representations that a formula should be taken into consideration?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: And other items we are now seeking should be taken into consideration?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, but I understood the question to be, how was the 50 per cent arrived at, what was the rationale behind it? And I am not aware that there was any rationale, any specific rationale.

Senator Carter: The act does not specifically say that. It said you would make a separate agreement with the provinces. Could they come up with a different formula at the beginning?

Dr. MacKinnon: That is a matter of opinion. The Atlantic Provinces did make strong representations, and we in Nova Scotia made strong representations, at that time. We did not achieve a change. There was no change. And we were told—again, this is pure supposition, I cannot prove it—we were told there were other drastic changes made in the sharing formula, not in the 50 per cent but in other aspects of the sharing formula which were the result of the pressures which the Atlantic Provinces made at that time.

To be specific, when the Canada Assistance Plan came out in 1966 or 1967, there were no sharing provisions for child welfare services, which are quite a large item of expenditure in the provinces.

At a later stage, child welfare expenditures were included. This meant a very substantial sum of money to Nova Scotia, which we were able to re-invest in expanding our program. This extra federal revenue was re-invested in the expansion of the other aspects of the program. But we did not succeed in changing the basic 50 per cent formula, in other words, the sharing, when the field of sharing, senator, was broadened.

Senator Carter: What about able bodied relief? Was there any sharing of that prior to the Canada Assistance Plan? It is shared now under the Canada Assistance Plan, isn't it?

Dr. MacKinnon: It is something like the old Employment Assistance Act of 1966.

Senator Carter: I am not talking about that.

Dr. MacKinnon: No, but you asked if there was any sharing prior to the Canada Assistance Plan, and I am saying that there was, but that you could not supplement the income of a wage earner under the old system. Now you can. For example, dealing with supplementation to a low income wage earner in the bracket of $2,000 a year, prior to 1967 under the Canada Assistance Plan, if you supplemented that, it was not shareable; it now is shareable.

The Chairman: The minister has just given me the formula presented to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. With your permission I shall place it on the record. Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

"The Formula"

A. Personal income per person requires adjustment on the basis of national average labour force participation rates, thus:

$$\frac{\text{Labour force participation rate/Canada}}{\text{Labour force participation rate/Province}} \times \text{Personal income/person/province} = \text{Personal income/person/province at national average labour force participation rate:}$$

This personal income per person at national average labour force participation rates reflects:

- (i) differences in wages;
- (ii) differences due to differences in unemployment rates;
- (iii) differences due to differences in wage structure e.g., due to differences in proportions of the labour force engaged in industry, services and agriculture;
- (iv) in general differences in the income distribution, i.e., a low adjusted average personal income per person shows a distribution like a flat pyramid; a high one, like a sharp pyramid; the adjusted income is therefore, a good measure of poverty and consequently of expected caseload, if comparable standards of assistance are set across the country. (The poverty line will proportionately take in more people in the case of a flat pyramid).

B. Through the equalization payments of the Federal Department of Finance, provinces are in a position to spend a certain per cent (say, the national average) of their net revenue on welfare. However, the equalization payments do not take into account the need for a number of provinces to spend more than this national average because their prospective caseload is proportionately greater than in other provinces. (See A above) This is, of course, true even when some of the poorer provinces in actual practice spend less than the national average. It may be contended that the equalization payments do not achieve what they were supposed to, because priorities are perceived differently by different provincial governments. If, therefore, the Department wishes to steer completely clear of the fiscal policy, it will have to set some lower limit up to which payments will be matched as at present. This lower limit could be the national average. If the province for fiscal reasons is unable to do so, the Federal Department of Finance could make a conditional grant, matched by the Canada Assistance Plan to allow the province to bring up its expenditure to the national average. (But see II D.)

C. Not only do some poor provinces spend more than the national average, they should spend more in order to make assistance standards uniform across the country. Since they should spend more than the national average, because they have a higher proportion of potential welfare recipients, the question arises: how much more? A factor which relates the adjusted personal income per person to the average personal income in Canada would indicate how much worse off a province is than Canada as a whole. (See points (i), (ii), (iii), (iv), but particularly (iv), under A above.) The most obvious way of doing this would simply be to take the proportion of the two, as follows:

Where:

- L.P.P. = Labour force participation rate in province
- L.P.C. = Labour force participation rate in Canada
- P.I.P.C. = Personal income per person in Canada
- P.I.P.P. = Personal income per person in province.

D. On the basis of this factor, the Canada Assistance Plan could adjust its payments to the provinces whose factor is greater than 1 in the following way:

The federal government sets no upper and lower limits and therefore does not exercise pressure to improve assistance standards and make them comparable throughout the country. Present expenditures are reimbursed on the basis of the factor only. Whereas, at present, a provincial outlay is matched dollar for dollar, it could be matched by an amount equal to the factor. If, e.g., the factor is 1.40, $1.40 is contributed for every $1.00 spend by the province. Table 35 shows what would have happened if this method had been in force for 1967-1968."

Senator Carter: The $175 ceiling that you have in Nova Scotia was established prior to the Canada Assistance Plan, was it?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It was established last July, senator.

Senator Carter: Only last July? What was the ceiling before that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It was $150 prior to that.

Senator Carter: At the bottom of page 11 of your brief you give figures indicating that if you were to adjust the poverty level for Nova Scotia you would have two separate amounts. You would have $2,656 for a poverty level in an urban environment whereas you would have $2,231 in a rural environment. If we persuaded the Government to bring in a guaranteed annual income, would you then also have separate levels in that guaranteed income for rural and urban areas?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We simply suggest there, senator, that the cost of living in fact differs as between urban and rural areas.

Senator Carter: But if we had a guaranteed annual income would you suggest having different levels of income for urban and rural areas?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We are, of course, looking at the problems that happen with a guaranteed annual income, and this would be one of them. We are simply pointing out there, senator, that the cost of living is different as between urban and rural areas. That difference exists primarily because of the difference in shelter costs. If you were, in fact, going to provide the same things for people living in urban areas as opposed to those living in rural areas, then you would have to take that into consideration, yes.

Senator McGrand: You would have to apply some kind of means test.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It would not really be a needs test. There is a principle involved there, but it is simply based on the cost of living in the two areas.

Senator Carter: But do you think a guaranteed annual income should have two separate income levels; that it should discriminate between urban and rural areas as a matter of principle?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We are saying it is a fact that the cost of living is different in an urban area as opposed to a rural area and that that should be taken into consideration.

The Chairman: Following that same line of questioning, may I just point out to the Minister that in respect of Old Age Security, Family Allowance and Unemployment Insurance, people in urban and rural areas receive like sums. Moreover, people living in urban and rural areas pay taxes in like sums. Why should a distinction be drawn as you suggest? Have we not, Mr. Minister, already established a method or pattern of dealing with these matters.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, yes; what you say is certainly true, senator. I cannot argue with that.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the gentlemen who are here this morning for their large, complete and informative brief. I should like to direct my first question to page 1, recommendation No. 3, dealing with housing. This committee has been intensely interested in housing. The members of the committee have visited many public housing projects in the course of our travels. I should like to know what efforts your province has made in the field of housing, and whether you think there should be a change in the landlord and tenant laws.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: If I may answer your last question first, senator, there were in fact changes in the landlord and tenant law at this session of the legislature in Nova Scotia. Various things were changed. For example, one change enabled a body to be set up to adjudicate arguments between landlords and tenants. Another change empowered such body to in fact establish rentals, if there was any argument over rentals. Another change did away with items that had been in the Distress for Rents Act for many years, and did away with distress for rents altogether, placing the landlord in the same position as any other creditor instead of giving him priority as he had had.

Senator Inman: The reason why I am concerned is that there is no question that in many cases poor people are being exploited by landlords. For example, in one house that I visited on the west coast the furnace was broken, several windows in the upper storey were broken, and yet, although the woman paid $150 in rent a month, the landlord refused to do anything about repairing these things. I am interested in knowing what your province is doing in situations of that kind.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: When I was a member of the Law Amendments Committee hearing representations from various groups, mostly tenant groups but some landlord groups as well, I heard arguments and listened to descriptions of situations similar to what you have just described, senator; we listened to the various recommendations those groups had to make so far as the legislation was concerned, and I must say that the changes we effected in the legislation went a long way to alleviating some of the problems you have described.

Senator Inman: Do you find public housing satisfactory in your province or do you have many complaints about it?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Most of the public housing projects are joint projects and are based on rules and regulations under which Central Mortgage and Housing is governed. One thing we have pointed out in this brief is that there are, in the field of housing, certain areas other than public housing that, perhaps, should be examined, because the results would be more beneficial. It seems to me, for instance, that one problem in housing that needs to be looked at is the problem of low income people not being able to raise money either for buying an existing home or repairing an existing home. Even before I went into government I found as a practising lawyer that it was very difficult for low income people to buy through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation an existing home in a rural area. It was also very difficult for them to get funds to repair their homes. So far as conventional mortgage companies were concerned, these places were very low on the priority list. The companies were not very interested in lending money to people in such areas; moreover, the companies were not interested in lending money to people with an income at such a level that they really needed assistance.

This is an area in which Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has failed. I don't mean to be critical of Central Mortgage and Housing, but it is a fact that they are not doing this type of thing. Of course there is a concerted effort in the field of public housing now, but that is taking people out of their own homes and out of their own areas and putting them all together into one particular area. And I must say that in the province of Nova Scotia we have had some bad experiences in doing just that. For instance, in Nova Scotia there was an area called Africville. People did in fact relocate from Africville, from a very low standard of living accommodation, into a public housing project. They simply moved. What has happened since then has not been very pretty, because they have ended up having to make payments which they did not have to make before. Where they were before, they owned their own homes, whatever type of homes they might be, and they had no payments to make. But now they are in a position where they have regular payments to make and it is very difficult at their income levels to do that. What we have said is that there should be some program or some follow-up procedure rather than just providing homes or groups of homes for low-income people and saying "this is your home; you move in, and everything is fine." Because everything is not fine and social development programs and homemaker services should go along with the housing. There are houses, for instance, in Nova Scotia that could be purchased at a very low price and that could be provided for these people, but there is no vehicle that we have now to do this for people on low incomes.

Senator Inman: Is there any movement with regard to the rehabilitating of older and larger homes and making them into apartments?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: There has not been to date, but this is one area we feel should be explored and we are doing it on a small scale.

Senator Inman: I think St. John did a good job on that sort of thing. Now with reference to page 3, recommendation 8, do you have Head Start in your province?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Inman: Do you find it proving satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, yes. I have not had that much experience with the Head Start activities. They are, of course, used by the Social Development Division, and this is one area of the Department which I feel in the short time that I have been there was certainly needed, and there is a future for it. I have visited several areas in the province where the Social Development Division is working, and I have been very much impressed by the type of work they are doing where people are relocating. In some areas they have built under the Nova Scotia Housing Commission in co-operative groups, and we have people who work with the families and in fact try to rehabilitate the families, and Head Start activities are very active in these projects during the summer months. Perhaps Dr. MacKinnon could enlarge on that.

Dr. MacKinnon: There is not much I can add. It is too early yet to answer your question. We have been at it for three years. It is one of the benefits that came from the federal sharing of costs of community development. We started it first three or four years ago with one project, and then expanded it to three or four in the second year, and then up to ten or eleven in the third year, and this year we have something in the vicinity of 14 or 15 Head Start projects throughout the province.

Senator Inman: Generally you find it well accepted?

Dr. MacKinnon: It is accepted most enthusiastically with complete co-operation from the communities involved, black and white. We started it first in a black community and then moved into disadvantaged white communities.

Senator Inman: Because I feel this should have a bearing on the question of poverty.

Dr. MacKinnon: We are being optimistic. We think it is having an effect and that it will have an effect, but to answer your question scientifically and say we have absolute proof that it is happening, and so on, beyond an opinion—at this stage it would not be fair to say that we have. It is too early.

Senator Inman: Regarding day-care centres, I wonder if there is any thought given in your province to trying to encourage industry to establish day-care centres, that is industries where women are employed? There is one place, I believe, in Ontario where industry has established such centres with good results. That is why I am wondering if any thought has been given to doing this in your province.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No, although it is one of the recommendations we have made, that industry be involved and should look at areas in which they could provide an input to solve some of these problems. Of course this is a particular problem where the woman is the breadwinner in the family and who has problems regarding facilities for her children during the day while she is working. Since our province is largely rural rather than urban, it is something that could not be used in a large portion of the province.

Senator Inman: But you are getting some industry there?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, we are and we are making progress. I don't like to paint too black a picture of the province of Nova Scotia. But while we are making progress, we would like to catch up a little more quickly than we are doing.

The Chairman: I neglected to mention the fact that Senator Harold Connolly will not be here today. He is ill.

Senator Fergusson: I have several questions I want to ask. At the outset let me say that I think we have all found the brief most informative and extremely interesting. It is particularly so to people from the Atlantic Provinces who have many of the problems that you have in Nova Scotia.

On page 8 at recommendations (a) and (b) you ask for additional assistance to be provided for workshops and activity centres for the disabled and handicapped and also, in (b), additional grants for rehabilitation centres. Now you also refer to this on page 19, I think, but you do not elaborate on it. Would you tell us just how much you have in mind or just what do you think should be provided?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, what we have said is that the sharing should be increased from 50 per cent to 75 per cent for activity centres and shelter workshops.

Senator Fergusson: This applies to all the things where you have asked for sharing?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We say it should be done in all fields of rehabilitation, including workshops and activity centres and rehabilitation centres. We think the sharing should be increased to 75 per cent from 50 per cent.

Senator Fergusson: How many rehabilitation centres do you have in Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Dr. MacKinnon tells me that in total we have one rehabilitation centre, one shelter workshop and eight activity centres.

Senator Fergusson: What is an activity centre?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Well, I will attempt to define an activity centre and if I get into difficulty, Dr. MacKinnon can assist me. It is a problem which I have had since I came into the Department, senator, to answer exactly that question. These are centres operated for the most part by the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded and they direct their efforts to the mentally disabled who are not able to be rehabilitated to provide an activity for them. In other words, to have some sort of program for their benefit. As I said, these are people who are not capable of being rehabilitated and the aim is to provide an activity for them.

Senator Sparrow: I have a supplementary question. Are you talking of schools now, retarded children's schools?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No.

Senator Sparrow: They are in addition to these, then?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: How many of those have you?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We have four homes for severely mentally retarded children in four separate areas of the province. We have one in the Halifax-Dartmouth area, located in Dartmouth; one in Digby, for the western region; one in Pictou, for the central region; and one in Sydney, for the Cape Breton area.

Senator Sparrow: These are institutions and not schools?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: Does not the provincial government support these activity centres? You mentioned they were under the mental health.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes. We have just finished devising a formula under which we can assist activity centres, and we assist the sheltered workshop as well.

Senator Fergusson: You mean, you did not do it before?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We did it by way of grants, in some cases, but we did work out a cost-sharing formula, depending on how much money the local community or association put in, and we have matched that. That is the formula that is used at the present time.

Senator Sparrow: Is there a federal contribution to those centres under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, we receive federal sharing.

The Chairman: 50 per cent.

Dr. MacKinnon: It does not work out at exactly 50 per cent; it is salaries and travel. They are not the only items in the operation of a sheltered workshop, rehabilitation centre or activity centre, but it works out at somewhere between 40 and 50 per cent.

Senator Fergusson: You have to provide the place in which it operates?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, but there is no sharing of the capital costs or equipment or that kind of thing, but that is minor.

Senator Sparrow: Then in the one sheltered workshop, in the activity centres and rehabilitation centres, do you, as a province, pay 100 per cent of salaries and travelling costs, and then get a rebate of 50 per cent, or does the community pay a portion of the salaries?

Dr. MacKinnon: Our formula with these centres is approximately 50 per cent. The same formula the federal Government has with us, we have with them.

Senator Sparrow: You get back 50 per cent?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And so they do not pay 50 per cent, but the total cost?

Dr. MacKinnon: Let us take, for example, an activity centre that cost $20,000. They would have to raise $10,000 locally, in some way, and we would put in $10,000 and get $5,000 back, so it works out at $10,000 from the local community, $5,000 from us and $5,000 from the central government.

Senator Fergusson: On page 10, under item 26, you say that you think there should be a major amendment to the Canada Assistance Plan so that a program could be introduced "that guarantees a stable income for all those considered by the Province to be in the category of long-term recipients of assistance."

Who do you consider come into this group of long-term recipients of assistance?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The physically and mentally disabled, the blind, widows with dependent children or deserted wives with dependent children, would be people we would consider to be long-term recipients.

Senator Fergusson: This is one of the things I wanted to ask you about, on which I did not see anything in the brief, and that is about the working women who are heads of families. Do they pose a problem in Nova Scotia? We have found in many places that this is a great problem. One thing is that many women, even though earning salaries to support children, do not get as good pay as men doing the same job, and this adds to the poverty problem for these people. This is quite a big problem throughout Canada, and you did not seem to mention it—unless I missed it. I was wondering if you do not recognize this as a real problem in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, senator, it would be unfair to say that we do not.

Senator Fergusson: Maybe it is not a big problem.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: A large portion of our long-term case load is made up of widows or deserted wives with dependent children. What we are saying in Recommendation No. 26 is that these people really should be adequately cared for, and you may, if you like, say that we want to guarantee an adequate level of income.

The Chairman: That is what I thought you were saying. Mr. Minister, so you know that they are half the poverty problem in Canada?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We say it contributes about 90 per cent of our problem in the Province of Nova Scotia. There are two ways of approaching it. These people should have a more adequate level of income, because there is no hope of their getting back into the labour force. Within that group you would have to separate the women with dependent children from the physically disabled and mentally disabled, the blind, deaf, etcetera, and have a type of program such as day care centres for these mothers and a different type of program for them. They can perhaps be rehabilitated, or in cases of wives with disabled husbands, perhaps you could work with the disabled husband so that he would in fact become the homemaker and the woman could then go out to work. There are age-old problems, as you have mentioned, as to whether or not a woman doing the same job as a man should receive equal pay, but we are saying that there should be a program for these people to guarantee them an adequate level of income.

Really you could put them in that category and, as far as administration is concerned, you could pretty well leave them alone. You would consider them as unemployable and you would not have to go checking on them all the time, to see what they are doing, what they are making, and how they are, with regular physical examinations to determine whether they are in fact still disabled, with regular visitations to determine what additional income is received over the year. We feel, for this particular group, that if they were set aside it would not be necessary to do that as intensively, and the administration costs would not be as great.

Senator Fergusson: You feel that 90 per cent of your problem is this sort of family?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes. I was amazed at those figures. Of course, as you know, there are many criticisms of the welfare system in all the provinces, and we are no different in Nova Scotia. On the one hand, people cry that many are receiving assistance who in fact should not be receiving it. On the other hand, there are people who say that we are not providing the level of assistance we should for people who are receiving assistance. So there is really confusion in the minds of the public.

I think they have a tendency to lump everything together, and they have either one point of view or the other point of view. There are many people in Nova Scotia who have the point of view that there is something wrong with the welfare system because there is a lot of employable people who are in fact not employed, so I was very interested in knowing what the figures and percentages are.

Senator Fergusson: Have you been able to discover what they are?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We consider that in Nova Scotia 90 per cent of the total public assistance case load is made up of people whom we would consider unemployable. Included in that 90 per cent are, of course, deserted wives and widows with children.

Senator Fergusson: Is it not too bad that we cannot make people understand these figures? If they did understand there would not be so much criticism.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, I think we should try harder to do that.

Senator Fergusson: What is needed is education of the people.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, our preliminary study indicated that the figure for Nova Scotia is 65 per cent rather than the 90 per cent you have mentioned. You are nearer the problem than we are, of course, but those are the figures we have. It is about 50 per cent across the country, with some variations, and in Nova Scotia it is 65 per cent, but you say it is 90 per cent and you may be right.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I do not know how you worked out those figures.

The Chairman: We did the same kind of guessing that you did.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: You obviously did not do the same type of guessing.

The Chairman: Anyway, those are our figures, but you may know more about this than we do.

Senator Fergusson: I should like to ask a question about item 70 on page 25:

Poverty in Canada should be and is just as much of a concern of finance, business, industry and labour as it is of a selected group of politicians, public servants, social workers and others who happen to be directly concerned with it.

Apparently, you think that they should all get together to work out these problems. How do you think you will be able to persuade those people to sit on a board to study the matter and make recommendations. If you can get them to do that, what kind of work can they do?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: You asked a question as to whether industry was, in fact, interested in setting up day care centres for their working women. This is one area, perhaps, in which industry could assist. There may be principles of business by which businessmen look at a problem and arrive at a solution. What we are saying is that the problem of poverty is no different. A businessman with sound business principles can look at a problem, and using those same techniques he may be able to come up with programs for attacking the problem of poverty. The problem of landing a man on the moon has been solved, as have many other problems, by industry today.

Senator Fergusson: Do you mean that new technology might be applied to this problem?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We think it is possible that some inputs could be made in that direction.

Senator Fergusson: That does not mean that you can persuade them to do it.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We are saying that, in fact, they should be doing it. I do not know whether any concentrated effort has been made to persuade them.

Senator McGrand: On page 14 you say:

The 1965 brief on poverty in Nova Scotia stated that 75 per cent of Nova Scotia families earning $3,000 or less owned their own homes.

Would that be general throughout Nova Scotia, both urban and rural?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, it would include both rural and urban.

Senator McGrand: On page 60 of Appendix A you say:

For the entire province of Nova Scotia, the rural non-farm inhabitants have the lowest total family incomes.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator McGrand: In other words, you are saying that 75 per cent of Nova Scotia families own their homes, and they have the lowest income in the entire province; is that right?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator McGrand: These people, I presume, are part-time woods workers, part-time farm help, part-time fishermen, and part-time workers on the highways?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator McGrand: At page 25 of Appendix A you say that there is a relationship between poverty and land ownership. I would like to hear that discussed. Would you tell us what you mean when you say there is a relationship between poverty and land ownership.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This is in Appendix A, which is an extract from the Dalhousie brief. Perhaps I should ask Dr. MacKinnon to say a few words on this.

Dr. MacKinnon: In the eastern part of the province particularly there are many examples of this kind of thing, senator, where young people have moved out to work in our own centres of population, or they have come up here to central Canada to work, and they have left the old people and a few others who were not aggressive enough to go elsewhere to find employment. Those who are left have these small farm holdings, which have now become completely marginal so far as income is concerned. There is a very large number of those. What I take the Dalhousie brief to be saying is that we have an inordinately large number of holdings like that. The Canadian Welfare Council did a survey of Inverness County, which is rather typical.

Senator McGrand: Yes, I read it.

Dr. MacKinnon: It brought out that in Inverness County there is a declining population because of an exodus of young people. The old people have been left on the old farm holdings, and they have an inadequate income, and they are unable to make improvements. The buildings are deteriorating, but they own them.

I do not know what the Dalhousie brief is proving when it says this, but there seems to be a relationship between poverty or a very low income and home ownership. These people own their homes, but that is all that can be said about them. They are in an area of declining values, and in 10 or 20 years there will be nothing left but stone fences and spruce.

Senator McGrand: And the buildings are deteriorating all the time.

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes.

Senator McGrand: You mentioned that this survey was of Inverness County, but you could have mentioned also Guysborough County.

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes.

Senator McGrand: Guysborough is the poorest county in Nova Scotia.

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, and there is Antigonish and Pictou about which the same thing can be said.

Senator McGrand: Reference to these statistics indicates that in most of the communities the average of the non-farm rural people runs from about 60 per cent to sometimes nearly 80 per cent of the families who are below the average of adequate income. It is evident in most of the counties in Nova Scotia and, to my mind, represents a serious problem.

How do you feel that this can be overcome in Nova Scotia? Will the guaranteed income we have mentioned make life better for these people? Can they stay where they are rather than migrate to the larger centres if they receive some assistance in the way of a guaranteed annual income?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No, a guaranteed income route would not really solve the problem. The need is job opportunities for these people.

Senator McGrand: What kind of jobs would you provide for them? Where would you find this expansion of industry that would employ these people?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I wish I had the answer to that question as do, I am sure, many other people. This is something that is going on everywhere. We are no different in Nova Scotia. There is a trend of movement from the rural to the urban areas because of job opportunities, with concentration on growth centres in various areas of the provinces.

Industrial development in the Province of Nova Scotia has not been confined to growth areas. Industry has located and provided job opportunities in rural areas. These areas of the province cannot be ignored. There must be some development in them. Consideration has to be given to what can best be introduced in the particular area. If it is an agricultural area, then maybe it is a place to develop agricultural industry, such as canning factories, cold storage plants and other installations.

Senator McGrand: Reference is made to the fact that the buildings at Inverness and other places are deteriorating and the land is not used, but is growing up in spruce. Do you not think that this is one way to increase Nova Scotia's potential wealth?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Do you mean by way of a guaranteed income?

Senator McGrand: No, by allowing these areas to grow up in spruce?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I do not know to what extent it would increase it or whether we could move everyone out of the rural areas and allow them to grow back.

Senator McGrand: They do not have to leave these areas. In fact, they stay there and work in the development of the resources. Do you not think that has great potential in the relief of the economic conditions of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Personally I do not think that it would have that great an impact.

Senator McGrand: All right; you have answered my question.

Senator Fergusson: It would be a rather long term.

Senator McGrand: Of course it is long term.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have an hours of work act in the province?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No; we have a minimum wage act.

Senator Sparrow: No maximum hours of work per week?

The Chairman: Wait; Nova Scotia is never that far behind the rest of the country. I do not think that can be true.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It is covered in the minimum wage act.

Senator Sparrow: What are your hours of work?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I think it is 40. I cannot tell you.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow can take it for granted that they have hours of work legislation.

Senator Sparrow: I wondered whether it was 44 or 48 hours. It differs in various provinces.

Would you give me your provincial budget for this year and the last number of years?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The provincial revenues applied to welfare?

Senator Sparrow: No, the total provincial budget. I have your department's annual budgets. The figure I have for this year is $32,900,000.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It is between $32 million and $33 million for the current year.

Senator Sparrow: What is your total provincial budget?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Approximately $300 million.

Senator Sparrow: What rebate do you receive from the federal Government on the $32,900,000?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It varies; I think our recoveries were approximately $14 million last year.

Senator Sparrow: Is there a municipal contribution in addition to that amount?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: What is the amount of the additional municipal contributions?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I do not have the total figures with respect to all the municipal contributions.

Dr. MacKinnon: It is between $2 million and $3 million; it would not be more than $3 million.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have the figures for the amount spent on your department in the years 1965 and 1966? I have the 1967 and 1968 figure as $19,300,000, but I would like to go back to the previous two years.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This is an approximate figure, Mr. Chairman, but in the year 1959-60 the provincial expenditure in the field of welfare would have been approximately $10 million.

Senator Sparrow: That is the 1959-60 figure?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: I was asking about 1965-66.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, I realize you were.

Senator Sparrow: You have not got those figures?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I have not.

Senator Sparrow: When the Canada Pension Plan came into effect, how did that affect your provincial budget on welfare?

The Chairman: The Canada Pension Plan or the Canada Assistance Plan?

Senator Sparrow: The Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We have had increases. We certainly have not decreased our provincial expenditure under the Canada Assistance Plan. What it in fact meant was that we could expand our welfare services with the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Sparrow: You never experienced in the last several years a decrease in the provincial budget?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Certainly not. Far from it.

Senator Sparrow: That is quite a jump in the figures, 1967-68 to 1970-71. It is over 60 per cent, is it not?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: That is a fair increase. That would be on such things as increasing the maximum from $150 to $175?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: That is right, and programs for family and child welfare and aids for the disabled, programs for severely retarded children, and of course opening the area of social development in the province. The department that Mr. MacKenzie heads is only three years old, I believe.

Senator Sparrow: If you projected your planning into, say, the next four or five years, as a percentage would you foresee a 60 per cent increase in the next four years?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I would not like to say that we would foresee that large an increase in the next four years, but there certainly will be increases, depending on what the economic conditions are in those four years. There has been no decrease. To answer your question, I could not foresee an increase of that magnitude over the next four years.

Senator Sparrow: Can you give us an estimate of the needs of your province for, say, this year in that budget of $32 million, the increase for even this year that would give your province what you consider an adequate social service?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: If we did two things in the social assistance field, if we removed the ceiling completely and brought up the benefit levels in line with today's costs, we feel this would cost us in excess of $5 million, to do those two things.

Senator Sparrow: When you say "in excess", you mean between $5 million and $6 million?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Between $5 million and $6 million.

Senator Sparrow: Half of which would come from the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Would you think an initial $2½ million—speaking approximately now—of the provincial budget would give your people adequate services at this time?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It would give adequate benefit levels of assistance, yes.

Senator Sparrow: Relating it to need?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: That does not affect education, housing and that type of thing at all?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No, certainly not.

Senator Sparrow: Have you any estimates of those requirements?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No, I would not like to make a guess, although Dr. MacKinnon or Mr. MacKenzie might be able to say something on that.

Dr. MacKinnon: I am afraid it would be a "guesstimate" and not worth very much. There are other areas of services besides this that are perhaps small in terms of financial cost, such as family and child welfare services, where the pay-off is relatively large and the investment relatively small, or should be and could be. Certainly in the area of services for rehabilitation and family and child welfare alone this, too, would be a "guesstimate". Certainly somewhere between $500,000 and $1 million could be very easily ploughed into our structure and the maximum returns got from it; not diminishing returns but maximum returns.

Senator Sparrow: That would be in relation to a direct needs program and the figure of $5 million to $6 million. You are talking for your province of about $5 per capita additional cost in those services. I am trying to relate it across Canada, the initial cost that may be involved.

Dr. MacKinnon: There is one other factor that has been lost sight of. The figure of 90 per cent was quoted. Nova Scotia has been—I hesitate to use the word "parsimonious"—but we have been very careful with those who are getting assistance, and this may account for the 90 per cent figure, the accuracy of what the minister stated about the 90 per cent figure. We have been very careful and parsimonious about those to whom we give assistance. There are many, many people in Nova Scotia who are not getting assistance, but who in the other provinces would get assistance, although I cannot prove that.

The Chairman: No, you do not have to prove it. You can say that categorically, you do not have to prove it. We have been around and we know. What you are saying, in effect, is that there are many people in Nova Scotia who should be receiving assistance but are not receiving assistance because you cannot afford to give that assistance?

Dr. MacKinnon: That is correct, sir.

The Chairman: It is as simple as that. We know that, and that is one of the things we have to correct, and correct quickly.

Senator Sparrow: Those people are included in the figures we have been discussing in the last few minutes?

Dr. MacKinnon: No. I do not think we have included them in the calculation the minister has given you, which is based on things as they are.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: When I said 90 per cent, that is the present case load. Certainly that is a big factor. With that 10 per cent it would be much greater, if we were doing the things we would like to do for people who are not getting that assistance.

Dr. MacKinnon: The $5 million or $6 million projection is based on things as they are, not on things as we would like them to be. In terms of the case load, that is hypothetical at this point really, but we know that it should be there.

Mr. MacKenzie: The $5 million or $6 million is based on actual case load figures now and what it will cost simply to bring them up to current standards of living with the present case load; that is, remove our provincial ceiling and provide adequate assistance at the municipal level according to 1970 standards. It does not include new cases coming on as a result of increased ceilings. That is just public assistance. Child welfare would need another $5 million also, so you are talking about $10 million without the increasing case load due to increased ceilings. You are not talking about housing, other than in an indirect way by helping people to pay for housing.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Which is an unknown and could certainly send that figure spiralling because, as we have mentioned, there are a lot of people who are not receiving assistance, whom we cannot afford to provide assistance for. That figure of between $5 million and $6 million could very well go to $7 million or $8 million, or in excess of that if you take into consideration the additional case load we would have.

Senator Sparrow: What people should be receiving assistance—and I am not saying increased amounts—but are not receiving assistance?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: For instance, there are people who by virtue of the income they are earning there is no budget deficit, therefore we have no real record of them. They do not qualify for assistance.

Senator Sparrow: The working poor?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

The Chairman: It is interesting to note that in some of the memorandum which was provided for members of the committee that our figure on adequacy was $5,350,000 as against their $5 million. We were not such bad guessers.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Our guessing was more in line with that figure.

Senator Sparrow: What is the maximum work week?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The maximum work week is 48 hours.

Senator Sparrow: Is that a nine or eight hour day?

The Chairman: Six days, eight hours.

Senator Sparrow: With overtime after eight hours?

The Chairman: It is my turn to ask a few questions. Arising from the questions that have been raised, Mr. Minister. Assuming for a moment that we lived by the Constitution as it is with income from the federal Government, services from the provincial Government, and method of delivery by the Canada Assistance Act, what would be your view?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: You mean as to whether we could stay with that type of system?

The Chairman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This is exactly what we are saying, Mr. Chairman. It is a question of improving the present system and that of course includes the Canada Assistance Act rather than getting into a completely new field which may be simply another program and added to the Canada Assistance Act.

The Chairman: Our thinking is that the income should come from the federal Government, the services should come from the provincial Government and the method of delivering the services should be under the Canada Assistance Act. We feel that that is a good approach. Do you agree with that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

The Chairman: We are also thinking in these terms: a guaranteed income or maintenance income will not do away with the Canada Pension Act, Unemployment Assistance Act and short term employees needs. What is your thinking in that regard?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I agree with you.

The Chairman: That is fine. Let us go on a little further. Under the Canada Assistance Act, Mr. Minister, there is a legal right to meet a need as I read it and I am sure as you read it, because you are a lawyer.

Suppose a person took you to court tomorrow and said that his need is $300 and can prove this to you, what would be your position under those circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The only argument, Mr. Chairman, you would have is whether you are meeting the need with the resources you have available.

The Chairman: The act says nothing about resources available. There is nothing in the act that says resources available it says need. If you have not had time to look into this aspect, we understand.

You had Dr. Willard's presentation as to what a family of four in Montreal and a family of four in Toronto would require. He states that the Toronto family of four needs up to $4,861 and that the equivalent in Montreal would need $3,297. If you were pulled into court on some such a case, and there will be such cases like this in Canada some place soon, because it is long overdue. Your defence would be that we cannot afford it, not that you say it is adequate. You have already said here today that it is not adequate.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: That is your example, not mine. That would be one of the arguments and then of course under the Canada Assistance Act each province defines need.

The Chairman: Do you have a right to define need? Your definition of need is not one that is written out. Your definition is left to the welfare supervisors. I do not think the deputy minister lays out a definition for need.

Dr. MacKinnon: The regulations under the Nova Scotia Act define need in terms of a budget for one, two, three or four people and the regulations again superimpose this feeling. I am not a lawyer but I believe that is a definition of need within our laws.

The Chairman: This is the thing that is troubling me. I live in the Province of Ontario and Mr. Minister, you live in the Province of Nova Scotia. Let us assume for the moment that we are both receiving the same salary and we have the same size family. You pay taxes and I pay taxes to the federal Government. We are talking about federal taxes on this basis. The money which you pay in the way of taxes is used in part to provide for the people in my province with greater amounts spent on food, clothing and shelter and basic needs than your own people in your own province. How do we reconcile that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Are you saying you have people in your province who are helping to provide levels of assistance for people in my province as well?

The Chairman: No, I am saying that you are doing the providing. I am providing assistance in my province. You are paying the same taxes which I am paying. You are providing your people with less and my province provides more from your money. How do we justify that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This of course is when we are talking about a program under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is interesting to hear you say that. I have always heard the argument in reverse rather than the way you have put it.

The Chairman: You can put it either way.

Senator Sparrow: Is not that made up by equalization payments as such, although I realize that of the tax dollar paid in Nova Scotia more goes to the welfare recipient in Montreal or Ontario, because the rates are higher and 50 per cent of that rate is paid by the federal Government. Is that what you are saying, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Yes, but the deputy minister, speaking a few moments ago, said that when they fixed these sums of money at the time on a 50-50 basis, they did not mention equalization at all and said it was made up in some other way. That is what is troubling me and should be troubling all of us. What I am trying to get at, and what has been bothering me ever since we started this inquiry, and what I cannot for the world of me understand, is how a man in any part of Canada can receive from the Government as a matter of right something for basic needs, less than another man in another part of Canada, once the needs are established. That is the point I am making. If the need is $300, why should they be in a position of saying we cannot meet the needs, we have not the facilities, when the Government says it is the need—the federal Government, who are responsible for it? That is my whole concern.

Senator Sparrow: Is there any basis of argument, then, in your brief, based on this thinking that the Atlantic Provinces should have more than 50 per cent?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: This is exactly the point in our recommendation No. 2, contained in our brief, and certainly is the essence of the brief we presented to Mr. Munro on Friday. It was this, that there should be a formula that would take into consideration the ability of all the provinces to pay and to provide these services and if in fact provinces do not have the same ability, as great ability as other provinces, then there should be a compensating factor, there should be a change in the formula, and there should be more than the 50-50 cost sharing arrangement for those provinces. This is exactly the point that we have in mind in recommendation No. 2.

Senator Sparrow: We should not be discussing this amongst ourselves here, Mr. Chairman, but is this what you are getting at?

The Chairman: Exactly, exactly. It is something going through my mind that we will have to consider. This is why I had some difficulty. What Senator Carter was saying is that if we provide a guaranteed income for people across this country—when I talk about guaranteed income, I am talking about an adequate guaranteed income, in the light of what the Canada Council is talking about—if we provide that for everyone in the country, no matter where they live, so long as they qualify in residence and citizenship or whatever other qualifications there may be, how could a poor province conceivably have any objection? That is difficult for me to understand.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We are still Canadians, senator. We feel that there are many problems with the plan, and we feel that, in the present system, things could be done to attack the problems that you are enunciating right now. We could do them under the present system, without a guaranteed income.

The Chairman: When you talk about a system without the guaranteed income, you are talking about the demogrant, you are talking about increasing family allowances, increasing old age security. When you increase family allowances, you make no provision for the single man or the man with little or no family, and he gets no benefit when you increase that allowance. When you talk about old age security, you have to provide it much beyond the present scope, to make it meaningful.

There have been two studies made in this country, one by the Conservative party and one by the National Democratic Party. Both are a matter of record and I am sure you have seen them, and both of them have endorsed it and say this is the way of the future.

Mr. MacKenzie: I wonder if I might interject something here. I think there is a little bit of confusion. We are not averse to guaranteeing an adequate income to our population. What we are saying is that there is already an instrument set up in the Canada Assistance Plan and that this instrument can be used to guarantee an adequate income and let us not get into something that really has not been tested, like the negative tax approach, or the Theobald approach or the demogrant. Let us leave those aside. We have a system and there is a mechanism within that system to guarantee an adequate income to all Canadians. Let us use this.

Referring back to a comment you made earlier, in regard to equalization grants, my understanding of equalization grants is that they attempt to provide a uniform level across the country, trying to level off the country. What we are saying is that in the Atlantic Provinces a levelling off is not enough. We have extraordinary needs and therefore we have to pay extra dollars. You cannot try to establish an average, because our number of welfare recipients is larger, our dependency rate is larger, and therefore if you try to establish just an average, you do not deal with the above-average costs of this type of population.

But, to get back to your point, Mr. Chairman, we are not against guaranteeing an adequate income.

The Chairman: We have to straighten out something. You say you do not like the negative income tax. Is not that exactly what we are doing with the old age security—using the negative income tax principle? Are we or are we not, Mr. MacKenzie?

Mr. MacKenzie: We are, to the extent that we do not guarantee 100 per cent of need.

The Chairman: I do not want to use the term “quibble”, I do not argue with you about it; but are we not practising the negative income tax, and have we not been doing it since 1967, for the old age security people?

Mr. MacKenzie: Yes, we have, but . . .

The Chairman: Let me get beyond that. I said the Conservative party has endorsed it, and the N.D.P. had endorsed it. Are there any other parties in Nova Scotia?

Dr. MacKinnon: No.

The Chairman: Then I have covered them all. Let me get back to this point. In the first place, there are no Friedman followers in this group. We are not thinking of him, his views are not our views at all. Theobald's views are our views in part only. But the American plan you fixed at $1,600, the American plan, $1,600, plus $800 in food, makes $2,400; and $720 earnings without deduction, which everyone gets—these three are basic—that is, 1600 plus 800 plus 720. So it starts making sense.

You say that the answer to all the problems is “jobs”, believe me, everyone around this table thinks the same as you do. But for ten years we have had jobs in this country, jobs galore, of every kind. We have had the greatest prosperity we have ever had, and we have had the poverty, the people on poverty have continued to increase in numbers.

Mr. MacKenzie: I am not saying it is “either or”. That is not my point. What I am saying is that it is a combination of employment and an adequate assistance plan based on needs, and we have already the mechanism in the Canada Assistance Plan to utilize to achieve those ends.

For example, if we say the Canada Assistance Plan is based on needs, why do we not define needs in terms of the Economic Council of Canada poverty level and provide assistance through the Canada Assistance Plan at those levels?

The Chairman: What makes you think that we would or that we would not, or that we are not thinking of that? I indicated to you when we started our discussion what our thinking is. It seems to me elementary that, having the Economic Council report on our hands, that we pay attention to it, because that is how we came into existence as a Committee. Certainly, that has to be considered.

Let me just see if you agree with these figures. I admit they are slightly rough, but they are DBS figures. The Atlantic provinces, with a two million population, have a poverty population of 240,000, or 15 per cent approximately. Quebec with 5.8 million has a poverty population of 30 per cent; Ontario, with 7.1 million, has 25 per cent; the prairies provinces, with 3.3 million, have 20 per cent, and the Pacific coast, with a population of 1.9 million, has 10 per cent.

You don't fair badly in that comparison of DBS figures for 1967. Bearing in mind that these are rough figures which could be out a couple of per cent one way or the other, how do you reconcile the figures I have just given you?

Mr. MacKenzie: Are those figures uniform across the country? Are they standard?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Are those figures giving a standard of poverty as determined by the Economic Council?

The Chairman: It is the standard they used. The standard came from the DBS, you know, and they defined it.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: How did they define it and was it uniform?

The Chairman: I gather the figures are uniform, yes. I bring these to your attention not to say that you are rich—I wouldn't suggest that—but to see how you reconcile them.

Senator Urquhart: I should like to direct the attention of the witnesses to appendix B, Table 4, which comes in line with an argument Dr. MacKinnon posed about five minutes ago. This table shows the number of welfare cases by province. In 1960 Nova Scotia had 12,554 cases. In 1968 they had 12,652 cases. They pretty well held the line in an eight-year period.

Ontario went up 50 per cent from 78,954 cases in 1960 to 122,842 in 1968. New Brunswick went up from 10,513 in 1960 to 15,469 in 1968.

Now those two provinces went up 50 per cent in welfare payments whereas Nova Scotia held the line. What is the reason for that?

Dr. MacKinnon: Why has it held the line? There are two answers. One answer is that Old Age Assistance has been dropping off. It is true, in fact, that it has been dropping off in all provinces. It is relatively the same. That is one part of it. The second part is the answer I gave a little while ago that I don't think there is any doubt, although I cannot prove it, that we are very frugal and parsimonious in our eligibility approaches, and in my view I don't think there are too many people.

Senator Carter: Then you must be getting more parsimonious every year. If you are not keeping pace with the others you must be getting more parsimonious.

Senator Urquhart: This is not a true comparison at all, then, is it?

Dr. MacKinnon: No, I would not say it is at all accurate.

Mr. MacKenzie: No, it only gives the number of cases but not the reason why the case load is what it is.

Dr. MacKinnon: Such a table is of value only if you go behind the figures and understand where they come from. You have to understand the meaning of the figures. If you take the figures and look at our eligibility provisions and the manner in which we have administered those provisions, then the figures become meaningful. But they are only meaningful in that context.

The Chairman: It is not really the poverty line.

Senator Carter: A little while ago Senator Sparrow asked how much your budget had increased since the Canada Assistance Plan came in. I don't think you gave a precise answer to that question.

Dr. MacKinnon: I cannot give you the figures off the top of my head, but I can tell you that I have personally watched every dollar that we got from the federal Government, and I can give you my personal assurance that, for example, as we gained approximately $800,000 each year on Old Age Assistance dropping off—because for the past five years, as you know, Old Age Assistance has been dropping off year by year—that $800,000 was, year by year, ploughed back into improvements in the program. Similarly, under child care institutions, when we received increased sharing from the federal Government that money was ploughed back as well. So since 1967 we have ploughed back every dollar we got from the federal Government, and I would estimate that we have had an increase, apart from that, of somewhere between 6 and 10 per cent at least.

Senator Carter: Before the Canada Assistance Plan came into effect you were spending money on welfare, on child welfare, on unemployment assistance and on various services. But, as you have told us, after the inception of the Canada Assistance Plan, there was sharing. That was part of your bargain. You undertook to take 50 per cent of what you spent on welfare and the federal Government agreed to give a little bonus by sharing the unemployment assistance and these other things. What I should like to know now is your net increase, which is what I thought Senator Sparrow had directed his question to.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The figures that I gave to Senator Sparrow, and which Dr. MacKinnon is mentioning, are net figures. They are actual provincial expenditures.

Senator Carter: Yes, what I wanted was the actual figures, leaving out the federal share; I wanted what the province spent before the Canada Assistance Plan and what it has spent out of its own funds, apart from the federal Government, after the Canada Assistance Plan came in.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We don't have those figures, but what we are saying is that the provincial expenditures have not decreased. They have increased every year. There has been no decrease in provincial expenditures because of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Dr. MacKinnon: You see, Mr. Chairman, the old Canada Unemployment Assistance Act was not as broad as the Canada Assistance Plan, and it did not allow many of the things that the Canada Assistance Plan allows; but there was a 50 per cent sharing in assistance costs. So in 1967 when we changed from the old Canada Unemployment Assistance Act of 1956 to the new Canada Assistance Plan of 1967, so far as Nova Scotia was concerned the change was not all that great, because there had already been a 50 per cent sharing under the old act and there was still a 50 per cent sharing under the new act. The things the new act permitted us to do in 1967, which we had not been able to do before under the old Canada Unemployment Assistance Act, were largely in the field of services but were not largely in the financial sharing of money payment programs. The Canada Assistance Plan enabled us to move into new services of all kinds and enabled us to get sharing as well.

To answer your question as specifically as I can, we maintained the level of expenditure that we had had and we ploughed back every new dollar we got from the federal Government and added a new dollar of our own to the tune of between 5 and 10 per cent each year. So, to use your expression, our net expenditure has increased every year. Forgetting federal expenditures, our net provincial expenditure has increased every year by at least 5 to 10 per cent.

Senator Carter: All right. That is what I was getting at. I should now like to clarify an answer you gave to the Chairman. I think he asked you what your position was with respect to the federal Government's providing income maintenance and the provincial government's providing services. Are you in full agreement with that?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes. That was the answer I gave.

Senator Carter: And if we had a guaranteed annual income then, and there still was a need for services, the province would take care of 100 per cent of the services?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: The answer to some degree would depend on the question we raised, the basic question in respect to the guaranteed annual income. What would the extent of the supplementation be? I have not heard an answer to that. I suppose at this date it is impossible to know what the answer would be, but if you had a guaranteed annual income, and we have raised this question over and over again in the first part of our brief, then what would the extent of the supplementation be? If you are saying the province would continue to bear at least 50 per cent of that supplementation, then the answer depends on how many dollars would be involved. If we were still stuck with a large amount of supplementation, then the answer is evident.

Senator Carter: I would like now to clarify some of your recommendations. In your recommendation at the bottom of page 15, you say:

We recommend that the Income Tax Act be amended to increase the personal exemption of mentally and physically disabled persons so that continuing incentive may be provided for their employment.

I cannot see how that would provide an incentive. If a disabled person were given a greater exemption, how would that be an incentive to have him employed?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Of course the main incentive would be that every dollar they earned they could keep up to a certain level without paying tax.

Senator Carter: Yes, they would be better off as anybody else would be if they had greater exemptions, but how would that put them in a better position to get the jobs? How would they become more employable?

Dr. MacKinnon: They would become more employable per se.

Senator Carter: You mean it would be a greater incentive for themselves directly or for people to employ them. That is the point that is bothering me.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It would be an incentive for them directly, but in developing that argument perhaps Dr. MacKinnon has something to add.

Dr. MacKinnon: Let us take the example of a person confined to a wheelchair or a person who is blind—and I am taking extreme cases here to make the point—then such a person goes out into the labour market under extreme difficulties. So, what we are saying is that if we believe that it is desirable to have them in the labour market, and we are postulating that it is, although it may be arguable or debatable, then it seems to us that such a person would need a little more incentive than you or I would need to go out and compete. In the first place, they have more expenses. For example, we have a wheelchair case who has to pay for a taxi to get to work each morning and to get home each evening.

Senator Carter: I am not arguing against greater incentives, but what I cannot see is how it would make it easier for them to get employment.

Dr. MacKinnon: Well, the man in our office who has to use a wheelchair has roughly $6,500 a year as a clerk. Now if his exemptions were increased by $500 or $1,000 a year, or whatever it would be, then that would be an added incentive for him to fight the battle every morning of getting out into the employment field and working, particularly in view of the fact that these people are frequently on marginal incomes. Say, for example, such a person is on $4,000 or $5,000 a year then it is perhaps comme si, comme ça whether they are going to get out and fight the battle.

Senator Carter: But I read a different meaning into the recommendation.

Mr. MacKenzie: You see, senator, it would make them more employable to give them this incentive, particularly in a situation where they could not take a job paying $2,500 or $3,500 a year because the expenses would be so high, and where it would probably be better for them to go on assistance because they would be better off in the long run. But would it not be still better to increase the exemptions so that they could cover their costs?

Senator Carter: I agree with that, but I was looking at it from the other angle of approach. I was looking at it from the employer's angle because it seems to me that the emphasis here is on the providing of additional incentives for their employment. If you had said it would provide greater initiative for them to go out and get employment, then I would have understood.

Dr. MacKinnon: We apologize for the construction, senator. It is probably a poor construction.

Senator Carter: Now, coming to recommendation 7 on page 18, you say:

We recommend that much greater flexibility and imagination be introduced into the provision of tax incentives and that tax incentives and subsidies be provided to private industry to enlist this sector in a war on poverty so that job opportunities may be created, training opportunities provided, and the skill and expertise of industry fully utilized.

You have not given any examples of what kind of imagination you have in mind or what flexibility you have in mind. We have tried all sorts of things like ARDA and ADA and industrial incentives under the Industries Act. We still have industrial incentives and now we have DREE. So what else do you have in mind?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: What we are saying is if you are going to enlist—and this goes partly to answer the question asked by Senator Fergusson as to how you are going to enlist the resources of industry to do anything—but if you are going to enlist the resources of industry, you could do so by giving them tax exemptions for programs they are carrying out or other things they are doing which are regarded as being part of the war on poverty. If, for example, they were to provide day-care centres for their working women, the cost of doing so could be a tax exemption.

The Chairman: Possibly like golf club dues.

Senator Carter: Then you talk about the rehabilitation program which was started in 1951 and which you say has become static and you want to revitalize it. In what way?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: We have made some suggestions as to how this could be done. Dr. MacKinnon has been very active in the field of rehabilitation for many years, and I would ask him to comment on this.

Dr. MacKinnon: Well, in 1952 or 1954 the Minister of Labour and the Minister of National Health and Welfare in the federal Government called a national conference in Toronto, I believe, on the subject of rehabilitation. An advisory council was set up on rehabilitation nationally, and a national co-ordinator on rehabilitation was appointed, and provincial co-ordinators were also appointed. For five or six years they had tremendous impetus and a great deal was done. But what we are saying here is that something that had great promise and accomplished many very good things in those early years has somehow or other lost its stimulus. We are not being critical in saying this, we are simply stating what seems to be a fact. It is not being pushed very much. The Vocational Rehabilitation Agreement has been pretty shaky for the past three or four years. We still have it, but it has been on shaky ground.

The only thing that has saved the day is the Canada Assistance Plan. In 1967 it came in, in the Department of National Health and Welfare, and we have been able to do a great many things in the area of rehabilitation through the Canada Assistance Plan. But what we are saying here is that what was started in 1954 or '52, or whatever the year was, was a tremendously good thing, and that one small way of assisting the poverty problem would be for the federal Government to put more eggs into the rehabilitation basket.

Senator Carter: In paragraph (c) of Recommendation No. 8, you sort of hint that there is room for greater co-operation between various provincial departments and federal departments. Is that a correct interpretation of that section? If so, can you give us some examples?

Dr. MacKinnon: We are not stating that in a negative way, and we do not want to imply it is a negative, critical statement. We are saying that both at the provincial and federal-provincial levels the problem of working out solutions for the things we have been talking about here this morning are extremely difficult. It is not possible for a Department of Public Welfare at the provincial level to work in isolation from Manpower, for example, at the federal level. The same is true at the provincial level. It is not possible for a Department of Welfare to work out solutions apart from, say, a Department of Education, which is tremendously involved in the whole question of finding solutions to poverty. With regard to the upgrading of manpower, Departments of Manpower at the provincial level must work in the closest co-operation with the federal department, and more attention will have to be given—and in this respect it is a new ballgame—in the next three years to working out new models of co-operation between federal departments like Manpower, Unemployment Insurance, and so on, and provincial departments like Health, Welfare, Labour and Education, that are in this business at the provincial level, because we are all tied up in it together and if one fellow does not do his job right we are all going to suffer. That is basically the question.

Senator Carter: Supposing the federal Government found $1 billion it could make available for the war against poverty or an improved welfare system, what would be your preference: a guaranteed annual income, an improved Canada Assistance Plan, or better family allowances?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I think what we have said is that we would prefer to use the system we have now, and if this money were available then, certainly, we could satisfy the question Senator Croll raised that there should be a uniform definition of "need" that we would very gladly meet.

Senator Carter: But the system we have now has not worked. How are you going to make it work?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: What we are in fact saying is that we do not know whether it will work or not, because we have not had the resources to put into this type of system to develop programs which would attack the problems of poverty and bring up our levels of assistance to an adequate level.

Senator Carter: In a country with a small population like Canada's, with only 20 million people, we are spending somewhere around $5 billion or $6 billion, and probably more, on various forms of welfare, and yet we have 25 per cent of our people below the poverty level. How can you say that system has worked or is working?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: How can you say a guaranteed annual income would work?

Senator Carter: I am not saying it would. I am saying the system we have now does not work.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Senator Croll mentioned something that has bothered me, and that is that it is quite obvious we are economically pretty well off in this country and have certainly increased the Gross National Product tremendously over recent years, but we still have pockets of poverty. What is happening is that the gap is widening, so there is something wrong. In all urban areas there are pockets of extreme poverty, whether in Halifax, Toronto, Montreal or Vancouver.

Personally, I feel this is a situation that has to be attacked at the level of dealing with people and developing programs and working with people, and you have to de-alienate these people. This involves programs and working with these people, as well as providing things for them.

Senator Carter: But if I understood you correctly, you still attack it with the same old system, is that correct?

Dr. MacKinnon: Certainly, in the field of social development we have just started with programs in our social development division which I think have great promise and have shown results in the short time we have been operating. I would very much like to have unlimited resources to put into that division to expand this work.

Senator Carter: You do not feel there is a more efficient way of attacking the problem than we have been using over the last 20 or 30 years?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, this new way, that has not been utilized before, in these programs of social development.

Senator Carter: What, the Canada Assistance Plan? What is the new way?

Dr. MacKinnon: I am talking about social development and actually working with these people.

The Chairman: You say you do not know whether our system of a guaranteed annual income would work. We are the only country in the world today that has a guaranteed annual income for a minority of our people, the Old Age Security. Does anybody suggest it is not working? Never mind its adequacy, that has nothing to do with the question at the moment and we are agreed it is inadequate. Furthermore, have you read Willard's report in which he spends 20 pages of the report telling us they have been working on it and they know how to put it into effect on a larger scale?

Mr. MacKenzie: I think we are sort of getting tied up in semantics. The basic problem of providing adequate income is going to be within the social system we have, and I cannot see much difference between a guaranteed income and the Canada Assistance Plan as originally designed. You are still going to be faced with a problem, which is the very real one of monies. I do not see what your great concern is about the present philosophy of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Carter: I can give you mine, if you want it. The Canada Assistance Plan at the present time allows the provincial governments to set their own priorities, and welfare comes rather low down on the list.

Mr. MacKenzie: But we have already suggested, and have agreed here, that under a revised Canada Assistance Plan the federal Government would be responsible for the provision of an adequate income through the mechanism of the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: But, Mr. MacKenzie, we started out here by saying that we are going to live with the constitution first; that the income would come from the federal Government, the services from the provincial government, and the method of delivering the services would be by the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. MacKenzie: That is it.

The Chairman: On page 10 you say:

We believe there should be a major amendment to the Canada Assistance Plan, permitting the provinces to introduce a program that guarantees a stable income for all of those considered by the province to be in the category of long term recipients of assistance.

You agree with this, but somewhere along the way there is a blank. Somewhere we vary. During our discussion this morning there was some talk with Senator Carter about cost. If you have seen the preliminary report of the New Jersey experiment you will remember that they said that where under the assistance acts it would cost $300 per capita, under the guaranteed income act it would cost $90. There was a very interesting article in this week's Sunday Times of New York by a competent journalist. He made the same points all over again that many others have made. Cost is important, but if those people over there are spending millions and millions of dollars in conducting this experiment, which just comes in handy so far as we are concerned—we are looking over their shoulders—do we have to keep saying: "You are wrong here, but you are right there", or can we live by their experiment up to a point?

Mr. MacKenzie: I think we can. This is what we are saying. The New Jersey program, as I understand it, is a three-year one, and it is not completed yet. We are waiting for their final document.

The Chairman: We do not often get people up here as knowledgeable as you three, and this is important. You say it may be on a preliminary basis. I come back to you and say that the only experiment in the western world today is the one taking place in Canada. We are doing it well, and our way is a cheap way of doing it.

Dr. MacKinnon: This is the old age security program?

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, but there is one point in respect of old age security which has to be considered and that is the guaranteed income supplement. The GIS factor is built upon $75 across the board. I know there is a great variety of views about that program that was introduced in 1952, but my own personal view is that it was an excellent program.

If we did not have that basic minimum and we were starting with a GIS at scratch, then it would be a different ball game.

The Chairman: That is right, but this is the kind of ball game we are in. We are talking about something that is there and that is real. It came in 1953, and we have it now. We all agree that it is inadequate, and we make no bones about it, but that is not most important. The important thing is that we have the benefit of the American experiment working. They are giving us some preliminary reports, and every comment I have seen on it is favourable. The Americans at the Presidential level and the Congressional level are favourable to adopting it. We have had actual experience in carrying it out in this country, and it has been a good experience. Dr. Willard, the Deputy Minister of National Health and Welfare, devoted a large portion of his brief to saying: "We have administered the groined income. We are experienced. We know how to do it, and it has to be done we are the people to do it." In the light of that, how much more evidence do we really need in order to know what to do.

Dr. MacKinnon: I suppose our position is contained completely in paragraph 17 on page 7, and paragraphs 21 and 24 on page 9. If those questions are answered then the whole question is answered.

In paragraph 17 we say:

The idea and concept is so right that no one who is concerned about poverty and the rationalization of the social welfare system could be against it in principle if it would achieve what on the face of things it would seem to achieve.

That is a very important statement.

Senator Carter: But at the end of paragraph 17 you also say:

Having regard to the information available to us in respect to the guaranteed annual income, we are not convinced that such a program would be practical.

Dr. MacKinnon: That is right. This is a matter of opinion, sir. In paragraph 21 we say:

Of the two choices open to us we would opine that if Canada introduces a guaranteed income it would be at such a minimum level that large segments of the poor would continue to require extensive supplementation through public assistance.

We could be completely wrong. This is purely a matter of opinion. Perhaps it would be at an adequate level, but what we are saying is that we are very fearful that it would be at a minimum level; that Treasury Boards and financial considerations would enter into it and affect it very materially, and we would end up with something that is not socially adequate, but inadequate.

The Chairman: But what is the purpose of the exercise if you end up with an inadequate amount? We would be just fanning the air. If we do not provide an adequate amount then we have just wasted our time, and insulted the people of Canada.

Dr. MacKinnon: Perhaps our whole argument is there.

The Chairman: I will put to you another argument. You have been in social welfare for a great number of years. You have an excellent reputation. I know about you. My association with the subject extend over a period of 40 years, I will ask you: Have we not been devoting ourselves to welfare and creating poverty? Have we not lost sight of poverty?

Dr. MacKinnon: I do not think there is any question about the fact that the assistance programs that we have now—if that is what you mean—are creating poverty, but I think the Minister has answered that by saying that we have been creating it because so far as we are concerned those programs have been woefully inadequate. They have been inadequate in terms of the number of people we serve; they have been inadequate in terms of the amounts we pay to the people we serve; and they have been inadequate in terms of the services we provide.

The Chairman: You could not have said it better, and that is exactly the matter to which we are directing our efforts. If you have a guaranteed income plan that covers everybody and it is adequate then we are attacking poverty and not welfare. That is the name of the game.

Senator Sparrow: The definition of "need" seems to be different in each province. Do the needs vary greatly as between provinces? Provincial ministers meet together occasionally, and I presume they discuss this. In your province there is one area of need which is different, and there you refer to the working poor. Apart from that is there any other area where your definition of "need" is different?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I do not know whether there is a comparative table here showing the budget levels for the various provinces.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I have that, but I do not think it is complete in respect of what is paid by individual provinces.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Need is determined upon the cost of shelter, the cost of food, the cost of clothing, and then in our province we have an additional item of special needs. I think those are the four categories in which there are basic amounts set out. Need includes just four items.

Senator Sparrow: Is there not the other need for which some provinces at least pay? That is personal needs, such as shaving cream.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It is included under special needs which is a very small amount.

Senator Sparrow: Would the telephone and so on be under special needs?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Anything would be under special needs, but the amount is low. It would not cover too many special needs.

Mr. MacKenzie: We also must bear in mind that benefit levels, the fact that we establish maximums, are one thing, but what we actually pay is another. The best picture is not seen by considering only benefit levels. The actual payments have to be taken into account when establishing ceilings in connection with 65 municipal units of varying degrees of poverty or affluence.

Dr. MacKinnon: The differences would not be so much on the provincial level. However, they exist in cases of short term need, so-called, at the municipal level, which forms about half of the welfare in Nova Scotia in terms of volume. I am not referring to dollars costs, but about half of it is at the municipal level. That is a very rough approximation.

Although I might be very needy, at town A at the municipal level I just would not be given assistance. This is where I get back to the phrase I use, parsimonious and frugal. There are various descriptions, but that happens to be one way of describing it.

Senator Carter: Are rural needs considered to be different from urban? You have a maximum of $175. Would the same type of family with the same type of needs in a rural area receive the same assistance as one in an urban area?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, because it is determined on the cost of shelter, which is the actual amount paid by the recipient. Of course, in an urban area this would be much greater than that in a rural area. Therefore the urban recipient would receive a greater amount because of that factor.

Senator Carter: Does a person who owns and has to maintain his home receive an allowance or is he penalized?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Not enough. This is under discussion now. It is just in relation to someone who is paying a set amount of rental. I do not think the cost of keeping up his own home is taken into consideration sufficiently.

Senator Sparrow: I gather from your discussion that it is your opinion that the province should handle all the social assistance, rather than spreading it around through municipalities in some cases?

The Chairman: It is a little difficult question from a neighbour next door you know who. You have to be a little careful there. Would you pass that?

Senator Sparrow: No, I do not want to pass it, because we are discussing efficiency.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Certainly there are some municipal units that do not define need as we would like to see it done. We have a unique situation in Nova Scotia in that there are three levels of government involved in the field of welfare, the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The province is responsible for long term assistance and the municipal unit for the most part for short term assistance. Some municipal units do not meet needs to the extent that we consider they should. However, they have the same problem as we really, because their ability to pay would be very low in relation to other municipal units. They would have the same argument that we have been making here, that our ability to pay is not as great as other provinces. Therefore, we would like to supplement them more than we do now.

I am not so sure that we would like to take away completely the involvement of the municipal unit, which would mean doing away with municipal units handling social assistance and the province taking it over. They should be involved in the process, as we are at federal-provincial levels.

Senator Sparrow: Could you ever foresee municipal standards of the type to which you refer? We are always concerned with equal standards in each province of Canada with respect to federal participation. Then in turn a province would be worried about equity on a municipal basis. Until you can control it all as a province you will not have that equity. Is that right?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, but we are working in that direction by other means. Over the last five years tremendous strides have been made in the area of trying to equalize assistance levels in the various municipalities. We still have a way to go, but a start has been made and we have made studies.

Dr. MacKinnon: There are two strong arguments to support the municipal system. I know there are arguments against it and you inferred some of them.

The management of public assistance, not with these long term recipients we are referring to, which is a relatively easy job, but with the short term, hard core group it is a very difficult business, it requires knowledge and management skills of a very high order. I do not think that this is recognized throughout Canada, how difficult, involved and complicated it is and what technical skill it requires to centralize this in a system with the know-how as limited as it is in Canada at the moment. There are people who would argue with me on that, but I still maintain that the management know-how and expertise is very limited in this field. To centralize it in a bureaucracy in a province—perhaps this would be more marked in Ontario than in Nova Scotia which is a smaller province—to centralize it, it seems to me, with the lack of knowledge and expertise, creates all sorts of openings for abuse and public criticism. Basically I guess what I am saying is that I question whether we have reached a degree of sophistication and expertise—there are some others across the country that I put in the same boat—where we can afford to set up a centralized system. The local system is about the only bulwark you have to handle it—local involvement of local councillors, local elected political officials and so on.

Senator Fergusson: The local people do not have as much expertise to handle this problem.

Dr. MacKinnon: They are closer politically.

Senator Fergusson: I know what I am talking about, because I have been the chairman of one of these municipal groups.

Dr. MacKinnon: I think we have to be very conscious of the dichotomy that there is in Canada. The minister referred to it earlier. We talk out of both sides of our mouths. On one side we talk about the worthy poor who should be helped; on the other side we criticize the welfare system, we criticize social workers and the welfare structures; we talk about lazy people who are getting assistance when they should not be getting it and so on. I guess what I am saying is that I question whether we are sophisticated enough yet to centralize the system, that it has to be close to the political structure locally; that certain aspects of it—not all aspects of it, but the short term aspects of it—have to be close to the political system locally if there is to be political acceptance of what we are doing, and political understanding of what we are doing. I know this is a debatable point.

Senator Sparrow: In other words, there should be local participation, either by advisory groups or some other group.

Dr. MacKinnon: This is basically what I am saying, at this stage of lack of sophistication in handling it.

Senator Sparrow: In the Province of Nova Scotia do you have so-called able bodied men on social assistance 12 months of the year?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I would think we do.

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, we have; sure we have. But then you get into this 10 per cent. The minister quoted 90 per cent of persons who are unemployable, or in this category of relatively long term recipients. What is the 10 per cent made up of? Undoubtedly it is made up of a number of persons in the category you are talking about, borderline persons, borderline recipients of assistance, who with rehabilitation could get out into the labour market. For instance, there may be a man who had a heavy weight fall on his foot in 1964 or 1965; he gets workmen's compensation for a couple of years then goes back to the job for a month; he lays off; they apply for municipal assistance and get it; he goes back again and is laid off again after two or three months; he cannot manage; yet all that is wrong with him is perhaps some minor damage to his foot; he has lost the will to get back to work, lost the desire to get back into the labour market. This particular man I am thinking of has been getting assistance for the last 18 months. He is right on the borderline, which you define as able to work, 45 years of age, able bodied, grade 10 education, a candidate for rehabilitation, but he has lost the will to get back into the labour market.

Senator Sparrow: Provincially or municipally, say on April 1, a so-called able bodied man can have assistance. Can you make that as a blanket statement?

Dr. MacKinnon: No.

The Chairman: That used to be the rule in some places, but it is no longer.

Senator Sparrow: It is in some places.

The Chairman: Is it?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

The Chairman: I did not know.

Senator Sparrow: What is the black population in Nova Scotia at the moment?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Our 1961 census was 11,600, I believe. That is the latest D.B.S. figure available. I would think it is something of the order of 20,000 odd at the present time.

The Chairman: Out of how many?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Out of 760,000.

Senator Sparrow: You say 20,000. That is about three per cent of the population roughly. On page 56 of the brief, in paragraph 97 you say:

According to official census data, the Black population of Nova Scotia increased from 6,212 in 1971. . .

so that figure must be wrong?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: "... to 11,900 in 1961". What is reversed in there?

The Chairman: It should be 1961 and 1971, I suppose.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: No, I think it is 1951 to 1961 actually. If you read further. . .

Senator Sparrow: Now it has increased to roughly 20,000 in the next 10 years. What percentage of your provincial government employees would be blacks using the figure of roughly three per cent as the black population?

Dr. MacKinnon: I think we have seven or eight blacks on our staff. I cannot speak for the civil service generally. We have eight blacks on our staff.

Senator Sparrow: In your department. What percentage would that represent? What is your staff?

Dr. MacKinnon: About 800.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Six hundred. I think the last count was 601 or 602.

Senator Sparrow: That would be one-half of one per cent in your department. Is any effort being made in your province to encourage the employment of disadvantaged people as such? Is there a program to employ these people in government services and so on, or recommendations for contractors with the government to employ certain underprivileged people or under-employed people? Is there any such effort?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: There have been various programs in the past, some summer programs, to encourage the employment of black people. Perhaps Dr. MacKinnon could give the specifics of some of these programs. I am thinking of the last summer program in particular.

Dr. MacKinnon: There have been two things. There has been a summer program, which we have sponsored for the past three years, I guess, in co-operation with the black community, the Nova Scotia Association for Improving the Condition of Coloured People, and latterly the Black United Front, the BUF, in which the City of Halifax and the province have jointly set up a program for the employment of black students during the summer months. This has been quite successful in going out and beating the bushes with industry for jobs, and also getting opportunities for black students in high school and college.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: In addition—although this is not in the labour field—we have in the province an education fund for negroes, which provides incentive for negroes to receive education. The grants are based on achievement within the class, and there are lower grants available for simply going from one grade to another grade. This is something that has grown. The cost of this program has grown proportionately very greatly over the last few years.

Dr. MacKinnon: When we started it cost $25,000, and we spent $125,000 on it last year. It has grown from 1964, when we set it up, from $25,000 to approximately $125,000. I should also mention here in this context that in 1961 we set up an interdepartmental committee concerned primarily with the problems of blacks. There are other disadvantaged groups, such as Indians, and so on; the blacks are not the only disadvantaged group. However, that was the focal point of an interdepartmental committee, which consisted of seven or eight deputy ministers. The premier sat on it, and I may say attended regularly from 1961 right up until 1964. From 1961 up to 1964 the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Welfare and the Premier sat on the interdepartmental committee. We met six, seven or eight times a year, concerning ourselves solely with the problems you have raised about the employment of blacks and the recruiting of blacks to the Government service. The education fund that the minister referred to was a brain child of that interdepartmental committee and there were a number of things that came out of that committee.

In our own department we bent over backwards to do all kinds of things in terms of recruiting blacks into the Government service. In the City of Halifax they have done the same thing. The present mayor has been very concerned in the public service about recruiting blacks and creating employment opportunities for blacks. They are very conscious of the problem.

Senator Sparrow: That is the program Dr. Oliver was involved in?

Dr. MacKinnon: Yes, the educational funds for negroes.

Senator Inman: In Appendix B, page 6, in looking at your figures I see that in the year 1966-67 Prince Edward Island had a total of 14,980 cases. Our population is less than 110,000.

The Chairman: It could have been a typographical error.

Senator Inman: I was wondering if it was a computer mistake.

Senator Carter: I have two short questions. The first one is clarification of the reply you gave to Senator Sparrow. Did I understand you to say that each municipality has its own definition of needs?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes, to a degree. There is a basic level which is set by the province and most municipal units are above that.

Senator Carter: They have no uniformity even within the Province of Nova Scotia.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: It is true as it relates to short term assistance.

Senator Carter: Is it fair to say that what you call a needs test, as applied by the Province of Nova Scotia, is really the old means test in another form?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I am not sure that I understand what you mean by the term "old means test".

Senator Carter: The old means test was made up the same way you enumerated.

Dr. MacKinnon: There may be a similarity between the two.

Senator Carter: What is the difference? I am not talking about the need, but how you assess the need. Do you assess the need now the same way as when you had a means test? You use a different form, but does it amount to the same thing?

Dr. MacKinnon: It may amount to the same thing on your short term need, yes. When I go into Town X and apply for assistance, the director or manager in charge may say that under the needs test I might be eligible, and qualify for $20, $30, $40 or $60 of assistance. They would then say that if I was able to go to work they would not pay assistance. In that sense he is applying a test of means. It is a subjective judgment which he is applying. The individuals only resource is an appeal. He has got that under our law.

Senator Carter: How many appeals have you had?

Dr. MacKinnon: We have had, since the first of March, about 50 requests for appeals from the province and a similar amount at the municipal level. They are increasing because we have opened up the appeals section.

When the manager says that I am not eligible and that he will not pay assistance I suspect he is applying a test of means. He may say that I have too much of this, or that, or something else. If he did pay the assistance, he would pay it, not under a test of means, but a test of needs. This is a formula set out in our act and regulations.

Senator Carter: Doesn't he determine the amount he is going to get in the same way?

Dr. MacKinnon: No. Once you get down to the determination of the amount there is an objective measurement for it. You must comply with the regulations.

The Chairman: What we have had before us is this: We find time and again that people are coming before us and saying, sure we have changed the word "need". It means to need, but the same people who have applied the means test are applying the needs test in the very same way.

Dr. MacKinnon: They apply it, Mr. Chairman, in the sense that when the person comes in and applies for assistance they say, "I do not think you are eligible or I do not think you should get assistance."

The Chairman: The act has changed, but I am saying that the people have not changed who are administering the act.

Senator Carter: How would you change the Canada Assistance Act to avoid that? You are talking about improving the Canada Assistance Act.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: I think we answered that earlier. If the resources were available the levels of assistance could be raised to meet the actual need.

The Chairman: Senator Carter, in answer to your question, your very vital question disappears with the guaranteed income, doesn't it?

Senator Carter: That is the point of it. The point of my question was that these people are saying no. We choose this Canada Assistance Act and we give our money under it. How would you get rid of this problem and the lack of uniformity even within one municipality and another? How would you change the act to get rid of these problems?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: You would change the amount of revenue that would be available for assistance. I am sure that we would very much like to raise our benefit levels, if we are able to do it, if we had the resources to do it.

Senator Carter: I am afraid I am not convinced by that particular answer.

The Chairman: Are you doing anything in subsidizing to the working poor?

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Yes.

The Chairman: To any great extent?

Mr. MacKenzie: Not to any great extent. But I would like to reply to this. If you establish the programs that we are envisaging here, through the Canada Assistance Plan, with the federal Government providing the moneys, then you would utilize the Canada Assistance Plan mechanism, you would take the Economic Council of Canada standards, and provide it directly from the federal level.

The Chairman: It does not let you out. You are still providing services.

Mr. MacKenzie: That is right.

The Chairman: That was the formula we were talking about. Are there any other questions? If not, Mr. Minister, it has been a pleasure to have you here before us. We know you are concerned with a very difficult problem. You made a fine impression on us, as a man devoted and knowledgeable on this problem. You have added to our knowledge. Moreover, you have brought along with you two very eminent persons in this field of work. Dr. MacKinnon is long known and highly esteemed in this field of work. Mr. MacKenzie is new to me but not so new to some people who know his background. You have given us a better understanding of your problem and perhaps we have got a better understanding of our problem. All in all, it has been a very useful morning to us and we hope that in the end it will mean something worthwhile to the people of Canada, and the Province of Nova Scotia and to all of us.

Hon. Mr. Tidman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. May I say to you and to the members of the committee that we are very pleased to have come here and we appreciate the questions you have had to ask.

As I am sure you realize we both have the same ends in mind, in spite of the fact that we were having a lot of argument, from which one might think we were not trying to do the same job at all.

We certainly are very much concerned, as I am sure you know, with this problem.

As far as guaranteed income is concerned, we would like very much to be convinced that these problems we have raised are not problems that can be overcome. For example, Mr. Chairman, you mentioned old age security, which does not answer the question of the inflationary process and the question of incentive, which we feel should be answered before launching such a scheme, but we do in fact believe in the principle. We hope that you can solve all these questions we have raised and we thank you very much for your attention to us this morning.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Whereupon the committee adjourned.

MINISTER OF PUBLIC WELFARE
NOVA SCOTIA

January 7, 1970

Senator David A. Croll
Chairman
Special Senate Committee on Poverty
140 Wellington Street
Ottawa 4, Ontario.

Dear Senator Croll:

Thank you very much for your invitation to present a brief to your Special Committee.

I will be most pleased to present a brief, and would be prepared to do so on the 5th day of May at a time convenient to your Committee.

I would ask that you kindly confirm the date, and also kindly suggest a time.

Yours sincerely

Gordon A. Tidman

The Honourable Gordon Tidman,
Minister of Public Welfare,
P.O. Box 696,
HALIFAX, Nova Scotia.

My dear Minister:

I write to invite you to make a presentation, on behalf of your province, to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

The Committee has set aside the month of May to hear all the provinces. We have also reserved space on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of each week during that month for the hearings.

Poverty in its totality is our area of concern, and we are reaching out for expertise. Moreover there is a cry for action for the poverty-stricken of the land.

The brief is yours to prepare and yours to present. Whatever you feel needs saying should be said. We hope you will speak out on all aspects of poverty.

I am attaching a copy of the guide for submission of briefs which contains some useful information and may be of interest to you.

I anticipate your acceptance with the hope that you will suggest a date convenient to yourself.

Yours sincerely,
David A. Croll.

Abstract of Recommendations

1. We recommend that the Canada Assistance Plan be amended to provide a more stable and adequate income for long term recipients of social assistance.

2. We recommend that increased federal sharing beyond 50 per cent be provided to the Atlantic Provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan and that this increased cost sharing be related to the special social welfare needs of each province.

3. We recommend that a massive imaginative and creative effort be made in the field of housing to encourage low cost housing, public housing and indeed all types of housing for the poor and marginal income groups.

4. We recommend that the Federal Government, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, pay a subsidy for a five year period to provide homes for families earning $5,000 or less, and based upon family need.

5. We recommend that the income tax act be amended to increase the personal exemption of mentally and physically disabled persons so that continuing incentive may be provided for their employment.

6. We recommend that development programs for areas such as the Atlantic Provinces place as much emphasis on human resources as on the physical side. The Federal Government should involve industry, labour, consumers of services, the Universities and Government at all levels in a program of regional development to upgrade education, improve housing, create employment opportunities and prevent poverty at its source.

7. We recommend that much greater flexibility and imagination be introduced into the provision of tax incentives and that tax incentives and subsidies be provided to private industry to enlist this sector in a war on poverty so that job opportunities may be created, training opportunities provided, and the skill and expertise of industry fully utilized.

8. We recommend that the Federal Government revitalize the rehabilitation program it started in 1951, which is now almost static, and that through increased Federal sharing from 50 to at least 75 per cent and other similar devices:

(a) Additional assistance be provided for sheltered workshops and activity centres for the disabled and handicapped;

(b) Additional grants and resources be made available to rehabilitation centres;

(c) New models of federal-provincial cooperation and coordination be encouraged between the departments of Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, and provincial departments of Public Welfare and Public Health so that greater impetus may be given to job training, upgrading, counselling, and placement of marginal workers, under-developed minority groups, and recipients of assistance.

(d) Day care programs, head start activities and Homemaker Services receive increased federal assistance and encouragement.

9. We recommend the development of a social insurance program to provide for loss of income due to sickness and disability, coordinated if possible with the unemployment insurance program and earnings related.

10. We recommend that the Federal Government Act immediately on the recommendation contained in the fifth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada and substantially strengthen the Social Science Research capabilities in Canada; and we further recommend that special attention be given to the practical application of research knowledge and techniques to the social problems confronting us.

11. We recommend that a Social Science Council of Canada be created with the highest level of representation from the Social Sciences and from those involved in the practical application of the Social Sciences to Social Welfare Programming and Policy Making; and we further recommend that this Council be the counterpart of the Economic Council of Canada and that these two bodies make continuing recommendations regarding the elimination of poverty in Canada.

12. We recommend the establishment of a select representative body advisory to the Minister of National Health and Welfare composed of representatives from the fields of finance, business, industry, labour, the professions, the media, the universities and government at all levels to consider the problem of poverty in Canada and to make recommendations how poverty may be eradicated.

Mr. Chairman
Honourable Senators—

Introduction

13. We wish to express our appreciation for this opportunity of presenting our submission to your Committee and thus stating our views in respect to the large number of families throughout Canada and particularly in the Province of Nova Scotia, who are living in poverty. We commend you, Mr. Chairman, the members of your Committee, and the Senate for your immediate response to the suggestion of the Economic Council of Canada, in its Fifth Annual Review¹, that the Senate "might consider the advisability of creating a committee to enquire into the problem of poverty in Canada".
14. In the summer of 1969, the Dalhousie Institute of Public Affairs, with financial assistance from our Department, prepared a brief which was submitted to the Senate Committee on Poverty in Halifax in November of that year. A large portion of the Dalhousie Brief was concerned with the nature and extent of poverty in Nova Scotia. It was understood with Dalhousie University from the beginning that this would form the background material for our presentation. Accordingly, we have included in Appendix "A" the profile material presented in the Dalhousie Brief. We have been careful to exclude all the specific recommendations which were contained in that Brief.

15. Your committee has been holding meetings for several months and we have much sympathy for the fact that you may have to listen to a repetition of what has been said many times before. However, the ideas we present here reflect our specific problems and concerns and in that respect they are unique.

The Guaranteed Annual Income

16. There are many criticisms of the social welfare program in Canada. The system is said to be confusing, duplicative and irrational and one of the arguments advanced to support a universal guaranteed income is that it will simplify this complicated system. Would we, for example, succeed in abolishing Family Allowances, universal Old Age Security payments and Public Assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan if we had a guaranteed income? If we have to continue every program we now have and superimpose another general support program, what have we achieved towards rationalization? If the simplification is nominal or minimal, what have we achieved? One of the major problems we face at all levels of government is the danger of a program being inadequate to meet the need for which it was designed. Two hypothetical examples will illustrate this point. Unemployment Insurance payments are not based on need. If they are designed in such a way that an excessively large number of families dependent on Unemployment Insurance have to be supplemented by Public Assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan, then we would state categorically that Unemployment Insurance payments should be increased. If Old Age Security payments become so inadequate in relation to actual need that an excessively large number of recipients have to be supplemented, then it follows that Old Age Security payments should be increased. Can we devise a guaranteed annual income which will truly meet the poverty situation across this Country? Can we individualize a guaranteed income to meet need without massive supplementation under the Canada Assistance Plan?
17. We have examined all the evidence we can find regarding a guaranteed annual income. The idea and concept is so right that no one who is concerned about poverty and the rationalization of the social welfare system could be against it in principle if it would achieve what on the face of things it would seem to achieve. We believe that direct payments should be made to the poor on the basis of their existing income levels. The "how" of achieving this is quite another matter. Having regard to the information available to us in respect to the guaranteed annual income, we are not convinced such a program would be practical.

18. The mechanism of a guaranteed annual income in its many forms as a possible instrument for combatting poverty has been receiving increased attention during the past ten years. All major political parties in Canada and the United States and many well known sociologists including Theobald and Friedman have been writing extensively on the various forms such a guaranteed annual income might take.
19. Theobald's Plan would eliminate poverty but only at an enormous cost if we were to pay guaranteed incomes to everyone in Canada. We have had some experience with this through universal Old Age Security payments which from 1952 to 1965 were hailed as the method of choice for income maintenance for the aged. In 1965, presumably because of costs, an extension of the universal feature of Old Age Security became unacceptable and the improvements made at that time were effected through the Guaranteed Income Supplement which is basically an income tested method and the Canada Pension Plan which is a Social Insurance method. Similarly, the universal Family Allowance payment which was greeted with enthusiasm in the beginning has now lost much of its significance and obviously there is some disenchantment with it on the part of the Federal Government or the Family Allowance payments would have been brought more in line with the escalating cost of living. It would seem then, if past experience teaches any lesson, that the demogrant system is unacceptable. It should also be noted that persons receiving a guaranteed income may choose not to work though capable of productive work. The whole question of incentive would have to be considered.
20. Friedman relates the guaranteed income to the income tax structure. Thus the system would provide a continuing incentive to work and earn. Unfortunately this plan poses two dilemmas. If we establish a guaranteed income at the American level of $1600 the payment would be so far below the subsistence level that there would have to be excessive supplementation under the Canada Assistance Plan. We would thus be adding another welfare program and compounding the confusion we now have. The other choice is to establish a guaranteed income at a level of adequacy for an average family of two adults and two or three children. Let us assume this would require a minimum guaranteed income of at least $4500 per year. If the required incentives were built into such a system the end result would not only upset the economic and wage structure but it is extremely doubtful whether such a program would be acceptable to the federal treasury. Certainly if past experience is any indication, financial considerations weigh so heavily in designing programs of this kind that social needs and demands take second place.
21. Of the two choices open to us we would opine that if Canada introduces a guaranteed income it would be at such a minimum level that large segments of the poor would continue to require extensive supplementation through public assistance. If that should happen, what have we really accomplished in the rationalization of our welfare structure?
22. We find it difficult to envision the introduction of a guaranteed annual income without serious inflationary pressures, especially in vulnerable areas such as housing. Price controls might or might not be beneficial but these are out of the question in a political system which views any kind of price control as abhorrent and impractical.
23. No guaranteed annual income plan devised to date adequately deals with need on the part of many people for immediate short term assistance and the regional differences in the cost of living.
24. We cannot emphasize too strongly that a welfare system or program in which there has to be a very large amount of supplementation cannot be considered effective. It is difficult to visualize a guaranteed income program being made effective in Canada without substantial supplementation from Public Assistance.
25. We suggest that a very close analysis of the results of the New Jersey experiment and other similar programs should be made. Hopefully this would give us some guidelines as to the importance of these issues and what is practical and possible in respect to this type of program.

AMENDMENT TO THE CANADA ASSISTANCE PLAN

COMMENT:

26. We believe there should be a major amendment to the Canada Assistance Plan, permitting the Provinces to introduce a program that guarantees a stable income for all those considered by the Province to be in the category of long term recipients of assistance. This revision would eliminate the needs test as a means of determining assistance payments for this group of recipients.

27. The needs test as a measure of how much assistance to grant is, we suggest, impractical for this group. Generally, the needs test makes provision for three categories of expenditure:

- (a) the maintenance of the individual or family, i.e. food, clothing and personal needs;
- (b) shelter, utilities and housekeeping operations;
- (c) innumerable special needs.

28. These expenses are subject to frequent change. This leads to a well founded feeling of insecurity on the part of the recipient, through now knowing, from one month to another, how much assistance will be received. These changes require a continuing review of eligibility and add to the administrative costs. Thus expenditures are made that could be used to better advantage in increasing assistance rates.

29. The amendment would enable the provinces to pay assistance rates based on the national poverty level (established by the Economic Council of Canada) and the personal income per person for Canada. The national poverty level would be adjusted for each Province by a percentage after comparing the personal income per person in Nova Scotia with the personal income per person for Canada.¹

- (a) Personal income per person for Canada — $3,000.00.
- (b) Personal income per person for Nova Scotia — $2,500.00, or 83% of the national average.
- (c) Poverty level for family of four as set by the Economic Council of Canada—$3,200.00 urban $2,700.00 rural.
- (d) Adjusted poverty level for this family of four in Nova Scotia would be—83% of the national average, i.e. $2,656.00 urban $2,231.00 rural.

30. Where the poverty level is based on an average size family, adjustments would be made for smaller or larger families.

31. A formula, simple and readily understood by recipients, would be developed for the calculation of earned income. This would enable recipients to be informed in advance, what effect earned income would have on their assistance.

32. Assistance rates would be reviewed annually, and related to the cost of living.

33. The method of determining eligibility and payments for long term recipients would be simplified, thus reducing administrative costs. This simplification of procedures would aid in maintaining the dignity of the recipient and would create a feeling of security on the part of recipients which has, heretofore, been almost non-existent.

RECOMMENDATION:

34. We recommend that the Canada Assistance Plan be amended to provide a more stable and adequate income for long term recipients of social assistance.

COMMENT:

35. The Atlantic Provinces presented a comprehensive brief on May 1st last to the Honourable John Munro, Minister of National Health and Welfare in respect to these matters. The substance of the argument and the supporting data from that brief are contained in Appendix "B".

36. We are satisfied that the fiscal subsidies provided by the Government of Canada to the Provinces cannot in their present form fully meet the special needs of the Atlantic Provinces for services over and above that required to provide a national average. We have made the point in Appendix "B" that the social and economic problems current in the Atlantic area have created, and are likely to continue to create, conditions which require expenditures on social welfare proportionately far greater than incurred by other Provinces.

RECOMMENDATION:

37. We recommend that increased federal sharing beyond 50 per cent be provided to the Atlantic provinces under the Canada Assistance Plan and that this increased cost sharing be related to the special social welfare needs of each province.

COMMENT:

38. One of the characteristics of poverty is poor housing. The largest group affected by lack of adequate housing is the working poor. In many areas of Canada the costs of housing are such that people who might otherwise get by, find themselves reduced to real poverty. A family of two adults and three children, for example, might get by on $4500 per year with a rental payment of $100 per month. If this family is forced to pay $150 to $175 per month the result can only be poverty and misery. The poverty induced in urban areas by high cost housing is commonplace and not at all exceptional.
39. We are mindful of the fact that improving housing or providing new housing without other services would be shortsighted. A family living in a shack and moving out of a poverty area to improved housing must be assisted to make the adjustment; for example, by the provision of counselling and homemaking services. A guaranteed income or public assistance program cannot cope with the problem of housing through money payments alone.
40. If we are concerned with developing creative and imaginative approaches to housing for low income groups, we should be making much greater use of the housing industry. There is much unused talent and knowledge available to us in the housing industry which, unfortunately, we are not using.
41. We also wish to emphasize the importance of priorities and we would put housing high on that list. We see no advantage or common sense in the Federal Government establishing a guaranteed income program while housing for the poor continues to be starved by all levels of government because of lack of funds and creative thinking.
42. The 1965 brief on poverty in Nova Scotia stated that 75 per cent of Nova Scotia families earning $3000 or less owned their own homes. Home ownership in Nova Scotia is a way of life for most of our people. Therefore, in order to eliminate the tragedy of families living in shacks with inadequate heat, light and sleeping accommodation we should be prepared to provide a type of housing in which subsidized home ownership is possible rather than build large public housing developments as we do now.
43. We believe that Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation should become involved in a new program of social housing for Nova Scotia. This program would provide adequate homes at minimum cost to persons under the $5000 income level. At the present time, under Section¹ 35(A) and 35(D) and to some extent, depending upon the interpretation, under Section 16 of the National Housing Act, public housing developments can be built. These call for the Federal, Provincial and Municipal Governments to share in the capital costs and to subsidize the subsequent rentals which in most cases in this Province average out at approximately $100 per unit per month. If this subsidy of $1200 per year were applied for five years against each low cost home averaging $8000 to $10,000 we could very quickly eliminate inferior housing for a large segment of our families. The subsidy might be discontinued after five years. Under such a system families could be integrated into communities where they prefer to live rather than become part of large housing developments that too often strip them of dignity.

RECOMMENDATION:

44. We recommend that a massive imaginative and creative effort be made in the field of housing to encourage low cost housing, public housing and indeed all types of housing for the poor and marginal income groups.

RECOMMENDATION:

45. We recommend that the Federal Government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, pay a subsidy for a five year period to provide homes for families earning $5000 or less, and based on family need.

COMMENT:

46. Mentally and physically disabled persons are in a very vulnerable position economically. In many cases they must fight an uphill battle to regain or maintain their position in the labour market. Their living and employment costs are high. Their income in many cases is minimal. There should be continuing incentives for this group to remain in the labour market whether fully or partially employed.

RECOMMENDATION:

47. We recommend that the Income Tax Act be amended to increase the personal exemption of mentally and physically disabled persons so that continuing incentive may be provided for their employment.

¹Department of Public Welfare. Papers prepared for Conference on Poverty: Housing and Poverty Section. (D.P.W., Halifax, 1965), p.11

DEVELOPMENT PROGRAMS

COMMENT:

48. The Dalhousie profile material in Appendix A makes very extensive reference to the Black population of Nova Scotia. Reference is also made in the profile to those communities, sometimes in isolated areas and sometimes on the edge of the towns and cities, in which poverty, alienation, poor housing and unemployment are the common lot. In most areas the problem is of long standing. This type of insular poverty has been repeated for generations. It is aggravated because too many of the brightest, the most creative and the most energetic persons leave these communities to seek their livelihood elsewhere. Because of this skimming process, there are only a few left with a capacity for leadership. What is the answer?
49. Our Department undertook a modest program of community development in 1964. Most of our efforts have been in Black communities but the program has by no means been so confined. We have achieved some success in generating self-help within these communities. Housing has been improved and the employment situation looks brighter.
50. There are problems. A Department of Public Welfare cannot work by itself. It must relate to Housing and Education and these programs are developed by other Departments. It must be concerned with Manpower problems which are the responsibility of another level of government. It is greatly dependent on economic development. We all tend to be compartmentalized in our thinking when we view poverty against this broad background of knowledge and responsibility.
51. It is obvious that a large number of the poor, certainly the working poor, i.e. the marginally employed, the employables receiving assistance and all those who can be retrained and rehabilitated need jobs paying a living wage. Unfortunately such jobs are lacking in many sections of the Atlantic community. The problem then becomes economic. For several years determined efforts have been made by industry and government at all levels to improve the economic climate in Nova Scotia and the Atlantic area as a whole. The task is extremely difficult and at best progress can only be made slowly. The federal government program of regional development is the latest federal effort to create social and economic opportunity in this field. We wish to express a word of caution. There is a regrettable tendency for the developers, economists and all of us who have encountered serious difficulties in providing economic opportunity to push the problem into welfare expecting a solution. The solution can then at best be assistance and at worst starvation. Neither is acceptable. If, as so often happens, the welfare authority grants assistance, the scapegoat becomes the Welfare Department and the recipient. Community development without the backing of a successful regional development program cannot achieve its full potential.

RECOMMENDATION:

52. We recommend that regional development programs designed for areas such as the Atlantic Provinces place as much emphasis on human resources as on the physical side. The Federal Government should involve industry, labour, consumers of services, the Universities and Government at all levels in a program of regional development to upgrade education, improve housing, create employment opportunities and prevent poverty at its source.

RECOMMENDATION:

53. We recommend that much greater flexibility and imagination be introduced into the provision of tax incentives and that tax incentives and subsidies be provided to private industry to enlist this sector in a war on poverty so that job opportunities may be created, training opportunities provided, and the skill and expertise of industry fully utilized.

REHABILITATION AND PREVENTION

COMMENT:

54. There has been much discussion about what truly constitutes a preventive program in the welfare field. Family Allowances are preventive if they reduce poverty due to family size. Counseling may be preventive in a Family Court. Day Care services may be preventive in respect to poverty if these services enable a skilled mother, otherwise dependent on public assistance, to be employed and self-supporting. The range of preventive services is indeed great.
55. We believe that financial aid programs, in most cases, need to be either supplemented by or accompanied by service programs if they are to be truly effective, rehabilitative and preventive.

56. The Canada Assistance Plan has done very much to encourage the development of both government and voluntary services. Unfortunately, we have only made a beginning in the field of prevention and rehabilitation. We believe that no program will be effective in reducing poverty without these supplementary services.

RECOMMENDATION:

57. We recommend that the federal government revitalize the rehabilitation program it started in 1951, which is now almost static, and that through increased federal sharing from 50 to at least 75 per cent and other similar devices:

- (a) Additional assistance be given to sheltered workshops and activity centres for the disabled and handicapped;
- (b) Additional grants and resources be made available to rehabilitation centres;
- (c) New models of federal-provincial cooperation and coordination be encouraged between the departments of Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, and provincial departments of Public Welfare and Public Health so that greater impetus may be given to job training, upgrading, counselling and placement of marginal workers, under-developed minority groups, and recipients of assistance;
- (d) Day care programs, head start activities and homemaker services receive increased federal assistance and encouragement.

SICKNESS AND TEMPORARY DISABILITY

COMMENT:

58. A considerable number of Canadians are adversely affected by interruption of income resulting from sickness and temporary disability including childbirth. The ill effects of such layoffs, temporary or prolonged, on the working poor are very great. Undoubtedly many Canadian families, because of such layoffs, are driven from independence and self-reliance into a continuing dependence on the welfare system. Much of industry is still lacking in sick benefits of any duration for illness or disability not compensable under Workmen's Compensation. We believe a large part of the poverty problem would be alleviated by the development of a broadly based program in this area under federal government auspices.

RECOMMENDATION:

59. We recommend the development of a social insurance program to provide for loss of income due to sickness and disability, coordinated if possible with the unemployment insurance program and earnings related.

RESEARCH

COMMENT:

60. The social sciences are relatively new disciplines. Far too many of the conclusions accepted, published and used as far are little more than subjective opinions based on limited observation, fact finding and research. The measurements are crude and tentative to a far greater degree than prevails in respect to the economic system, although sometimes we feel that system too, is lacking in precision. We are concerned on all sides with social values but how do we measure these objectively and precisely? We might for example, ask what seems to be a simple and basic question. What is the real purpose of life and living for human beings? The welfare model which we devise should be related to and dependent on the answer we give to that question. But the truth is there would be many answers and that being so, there must of necessity be many welfare models, each having its validity, grounded in what our basic philosophy is about life and people. The oft quoted stock answer that our values are based on the Judean-Christian ethic tells us very little of a useful, practical nature. Social psychologist Raymond Bauer of Harvard says, "Our hang-up is that we don't have a model for the social system anywhere as precise as the economists have for the economic system."

61. The Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada¹ states:

"... the social sciences... remain relatively underdeveloped in Canada. The support given to research in the social sciences in Canada has been totally inadequate. It represents only a small fraction of the support for the natural sciences; it is smaller in relation to population and total income in Canada than in the United States and various other modern societies; and it is miniscule in relation to the social problems that now confront us.

We therefore recommend that there should be a substantial strengthening of social science research capabilities in Canada..."

¹Economic Council of Canada, Fifth Annual Review (Queen's Printer and Controller of Stationery, 1968: Ottawa), p.53.

62. We shall have to go farther than getting the research done. Much research has been done in the Social Sciences, but only a very tiny part of that research has been made practical in its application to public policy and social programming. In short, there is a wasteful gap between research and its application.

RECOMMENDATION:

63. We recommend that the federal government act immediately on the recommendation contained in the fifth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada and substantially strengthen the social science research capabilities in Canada: and we further recommend that special attention be given to the practical application of research knowledge and techniques to the social problems confronting us.

CITIZEN INVOLVEMENT AND PARTICIPATION

COMMENT:

64. It is our considered view that the problem of finding a solution to poverty is no less difficult than finding a cure for cancer or making a landing on the moon. Only naive persons see the answer as simple and easy and the greatest danger to Canadians lies in the nostrums and short term expedients recommended by such individuals.
65. We are convinced that government working alone will not find a satisfactory answer to the widespread problems of poverty confronting Canadians today. If we are really sincere in our attempt to find positive, constructive solutions for poverty, then nothing short of a total mobilization of resources will provide the answer. The fragmented attempts of government, even if coordinated at all levels, cannot go far enough to make a real dent in the problem. We have to ask ourselves, are we waging a war or a mock battle? The war effort of 1939-45 teaches valuable lessons in mobilizing total community effort. The air space program in the United States provides innumerable insights as to what is required to solve what seems to be an insoluble problem. The inputs of the taxpayer and the programs of government will not be enough. What is desperately needed is the mobilization of the expertise, of industry, business, labour, the media, the professions, the universities and the voluntary associations, with government in a coordinated attack on this age old enemy of mankind. Perhaps the best word to describe this is "involvement".
66. Apart from citizen involvement on boards of voluntary agencies, there has been very limited citizen or consumer involvement in welfare programs. Citizen involvement implies that there are citizens in the community whose special knowledge and expertise might if mobilized, be useful in developing good welfare programs. By consumer, we mean those who are receiving or benefitting from welfare services. During the past year or two, much has been written and some beginnings have been made towards involving clients and users of service on planning committees, councils, boards, etc. We believe there is much to commend this trend.

67. The phrase "participatory democracy" is being used on all sides. Presumably it implies the meaningful involvement of people in the decision making process; that is, in making the decisions that may affect them. If this kind of involvement serves a useful purpose as far as clients and consumers are concerned, the same logic dictates that the process should be even more meaningful and useful when applied to other interest groups within the community.
68. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is to be commended on the establishment of a National Advisory Council on Welfare in which we understand half of the membership is drawn from organizations of consumers of welfare services. The Federal Government in reviewing the function of this National Council for your Committee stated that with its special mandate to seek out the views of the poor, it could provide a vehicle through which the poor can make their views known to Government, and a forum in which these views can be considered by a body on which the poor will have substantial representation.
69. One must assume the Federal Government intends to fully utilize the knowledge, skill and expertise available from this group of consumers as they serve on this National Advisory Council. We believe this action of the Federal Government could be of immense significance. However, we would emphasize that there are other vast resources of technical knowledge and expertise in the community which have been overlooked completely. It is our view that having regard to the magnitude of the problems we face in eradicating poverty, we have to utilize the capabilities of all Canadians. It will not be enough to depend entirely on the solutions suggested by the public servants, social scientists, social workers, etc., devoted and skilled as these may be. Moreover, it is unlikely that the raison d'être for what we do will be either fully understood or accepted by all Canadians unless there is total involvement and mobilization of resources and capabilities. This argument has been used repeatedly to justify the involvement of the consumer. It has just as much validity when applied to the taxpayer, business, finance, industry, labour, the professions, the universities, etc. By all means we should involve consumers, but why should we stop there? What is the rationale for assuming that all wisdom in respect to this most difficult problem is to be found either in the public service or in the consumers of that service?

70. We believe that the polarization of Canadian thinking in respect to social welfare issues could be largely resolved if the issues were squarely faced by the total Canadian community. Poverty in Canada should be and is just as much the concern of finance, business, industry and labour as it is of a selected group of politicians, public servants, social workers and others who happen to be directly concerned with it. We believe this polarization will continue unless steps are taken to mobilize all these resources in a coordinated, combined attack on the problem of poverty. There has been ample evidence in the United States that finance, business, industry and labour can become concerned and involved and thus provide helpful inputs in finding solutions. We are skeptical and indeed pessimistic that any long term solution to the problem of poverty will be found, or if found can be made effective and practical, by government alone or even by government with the help of consumers. What we are recommending here is the mobilization of all our resources, not just a selected few.

RECOMMENDATION:

71. We recommend that a social science council of Canada be created with the highest level of representation from the social sciences and from those involved in the practical application of the social sciences to social welfare programming and policy making; and we further recommend that this council be the counterpart of the economic council of Canada and that these two bodies make continuing recommendations regarding the elimination of poverty in Canada.

RECOMMENDATION:

72. We recommend the establishment of a select representative body advisory to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and composed of representatives from the fields of finance, business, industry, labour, the professions, the media, the universities and Government at all levels to consider the problem of poverty in Canada and to make recommendations how poverty may be eradicated.

Abstract from the Brief presented by the Atlantic Ministers of Public Welfare to
The Honourable John Munro
May 1, 1970

This Appendix contains selected portions of a submission made by the Atlantic Ministers of Public Welfare to The Honourable John Munro, Minister of National Health and Welfare on May 1, 1970.

The portions contained herein relate specifically to those social and economic factors affecting the Province of Nova Scotia which create conditions requiring excessively large expenditures on social welfare.

The Social and Economic Situation in Nova Scotia

1. A program for the alleviation or elimination of poverty in Nova Scotia must begin with a consideration of the special economic and social problems in this area, which have resulted in a higher degree of deprivation and dependency than elsewhere in Canada. The Dalhousie profile is a most valuable compilation of source material on this subject. The Second Annual Review of the Economic

Council of Canada has summarized the factors underlying these problems.¹

2. As pointed out by the Economic Council, we have a relatively low proportion of our population engaged in productive activity. Table 1 shows that we have a relatively small proportion of the total population in the working age group 15 - 65 years. Table 2 shows our lower rates of participation in the labour force. Our rates of unemployment and that of the other Atlantic Provinces are consistently higher than in other areas of Canada (Table 3) and the seasonal employment fluctuations are much more severe (Chart 1). In addition, experience has shown that the Federal Government's anti-inflationary policies will result in a greater increase in unemployment in the Atlantic Provinces than in the rest of Canada.

MONTHLY UNEMPLOYMENT RATES FOR CANADA AND THE PROVINCES (1966-68)

3. These factors, as indicated in the foregoing Tables, have resulted in a disproportionate percentage of our population being dependent on social welfare programs.

A. The proportion of persons and families receiving public assistance in Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic Provinces is greater than for any other part of Canada. In addition, our actual payment levels are low and this, of necessity, rules out assistance payments for a large portion of our population who should be receiving help. These low payments also perpetuate conditions of poverty which public assistance is designed to alleviate.

Tables 4, 5, 6, 7 and Chart 2 point out the gravity of this problem.

NUMBER OF WELFARE CASES PER THOUSAND OF POPULATION BY PROVINCE

B. Notwithstanding the fact that our monthly per capita costs for public assistance continue to be high, our monthly family and individual budget levels were no higher in 1968 than for the rest of Canada, according to a study completed by the Research and Statistics Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare. However, our monthly payments are comparatively low. This is due to the imposition of a ceiling on payments which, in fact, denies the budget principle. For example, if Nova Scotia removed the maximum payment of $175.00 per month to a family and updated its benefit levels for items of family need which are now based on 1965 cost of living figures, the 1970 total cost increase would be $2,477,408.00. This figure does not take into account the increase in caseload which would result from the additional number of persons who would qualify because of higher assistance payments.

6. Includes the supplementary grant of $8 per child in the family unit which may be paid in addition to the basic amounts.

7. Covers also fuel, operating and sundries.

* Because Nova Scotia has a maximum payment of $175.00 per month under the Provincial Social Assistance Program, regardless of family size, this figure leaves a total of $27.00 per month for shelter.

C. Although our expenditures per public assistance case are low in relation to the other Canadian Provinces, the cost of living in Nova Scotia and the Atlantic Provinces generally is as high or higher than the Canadian average.

Personal income (Tables 13 and 14) and wages and salaries (Tables 15 and 16) show that even those who are employed receive incomes below those in the remainder of Canada with the exception of the other of Canada.¹ The statistics in these studies give an indication of the area's greater need for "catch up" expenditures, at a time when provincial government expenditures on what the Economic Council calls "growth related functions", are lagging behind.² Recent studies have shown that programs designed to improve the physical resource base have not made any significant impact on the problem. It is now generally accepted that much more comprehensive programs involving improvement of human as well as physical resources are needed.³ Programs that emphasize education, health, housing and labour mobility must be developed as part of a total coordinated program of labour force adjustment. The Comprehensive Rural Development Agreements now in effect in New Brunswick are an attempt to develop such an approach.

Atlantic Provinces. Generally this is a reflection of the educational level of the population (Table 17) and the higher proportion of persons living in rural areas (Table 18).

5. Provincial expenditures are limited by the tax base and consequently those areas with the greatest need for social services have the choice of increasing the burden of taxation or spending less per capita than the most affluent provinces. In fact, the Province of Nova Scotia has spent less as shown by the Economic Council's Report and the tax burden still tends to be greater. This is clearly a very inequitable position. To improve this situation, it is necessary to remove the constraints on the provincial tax base by means of grants from the Federal Government. This is only partially achieved through the cost-sharing and equalization grants. These grants should make it possible to spend an equal amount per capita on required services in each of the provinces throughout Canada. There is no need to emphasize that this point has not been reached. At the same time it is necessary to recognize that low income areas create a greater need per capita than the national average. Therefore, a second step in creating equity among all provinces must be to increase per capita spending in the poorer areas of Canada. This would be aimed at creating an equal standard of services for all provinces, notwithstanding a greater demand on the social and welfare services in some. Frequently we find that these depressed areas experience higher costs in providing services. This is attributable to their smaller and more dispersed population and the higher salaries necessary to attract qualified staff. This, in turn, creates an additional requirement in allocating funds to the depressed areas in order to compensate for the higher costs of providing services. Consequently, we believe a strong case can be made for improving the standard of services in poorer areas over and above the level for the rest of the country. We believe that present Federal Cost Sharing Formulae do not take into account these additional needs in the Province of Nova Scotia.

6. In short, we believe that present federal assistance programs for Nova Scotia are lacking in three important respects:

A. Insufficient assistance has been provided for major human resource development programs which are the responsibility of the province. Although considerable assistance is received from the Federal Government through shared cost programs and equalization grants, with the exception of medicare, these grants do not fully take into account the higher per capita need in Nova Scotia and the lower tax capacity available to meet that need. In addition, federal programs such as Housing and Manpower do not appear to be reaching the persons with the greatest need. Programs for development of human resources must have a high priority in any attempt to eliminate poverty.

B. The federal assistance programs have not recognized the special and important role of income maintenance programs in combatting poverty. While the Canada Assistance Plan has contributed much in this area, the sharp increase in costs has put a heavy drain on our provincial budget and has thus made it difficult to find the money required to develop effective preventive and rehabilitative services. With the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan, this province is being put in the position where it must spend a much larger sum of money on welfare programs. In fact, the implementation of the Canada Assistance Program is forcing us to "catch up" and we do not have the money. Therefore, the government of Nova Scotia has no choice but to look at the possibility of a reduction in other government programs and/or welfare programs. A reduction in welfare programs can only be accomplished by severely limiting the definition of need. Our present needs test results in a payment which is no higher than that for the rest of Canada even if we were able to truly pay according to need.

C. Present federal programs have tended to single out particular areas of the Province of Nova Scotia for special assistance, when in fact, the problems and therefore the need for special assistance is province-wide.

7. As a result of our long history of chronic dependency, we, in the Province of Nova Scotia, have large numbers of persons who are hard-core welfare cases. Consequently, massive programs or rehabilitation, community development and prevention are required to ensure that whole communities do not go on public assistance for long periods of time. We recognize that anything done in this area is not going to reap significant benefits for some time, but we believe we must get started. The program envisioned would ensure that all persons in Nova Scotia are able to take advantage of improved educational opportunities, both for themselves and their children; that housing is improved, and that conditions which contribute to poor health do not continue to be a factor in limiting ability to benefit from educational and employment opportunities. We believe that such a program is a necessary complement to and an integral part of any successful program of industrial development. Future programs, we contend, must aim at improving "the sour atmosphere of poor health and bad housing—the accumulated defeat, alienation and despair which often so tragically are inherited by the next and succeeding generations."¹

ORDERS OF REFERENCE

Extract from the Minutes of Proceedings of the Senate of Tuesday, October 28, 1969:

"The Honourable Senator Croll moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Roebuck:

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses, and to report from time to time;

That the Committee be authorized to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee, to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate, and to adjourn from place to place;

That the evidence taken on the subject during the preceding session be referred to the Committee; and

That the Committee be composed of the Honourable Senators Bélisle, Carter, Cook, Croll, Eudes, Everett, Fergusson, Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche), Hastings, Inman, Lefrançois, McGrand, Pearson, Quart, Roebuck and Sparrow.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, May 7, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order. Before us today is the Honourable Stephen A. Neary, Minister of Social Services and Rehabilitation, Province of Newfoundland. He is here to present his brief.

Honourable Stephen A. Neary, Minister of Social Services and Rehabilitation, Newfoundland: Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I think there is no need, in my submission, to dwell on the seriousness of poverty in Canada's newest province, Newfoundland is perennially distinguished by the lowest per capita income, the largest families and greatest birth-rate, the highest index of unemployment, the lowest average level of education, the greatest per capita provincial indebtedness both at the beginning of and now at the end of 20 years of Confederation in comparison with other provinces.

Despite the plans and measures that have been taken in Newfoundland since Confederation to cope with the realities of poverty, poverty is still with us in the philosophy or the lack of philosophy of life which goes on with unearned income.

We are putting forth a new concept. We think we should experiment. We think that we should change our thinking on poverty. We must be flexible because we do not believe that the current social assistance programs are sufficient to do the job that they should be doing. All they are doing at the moment is entrapping people, not only second generations but, in some cases, third generation people, in perpetuating poverty.

Mr. Chairman, no doubt in your committee hearings you have had many definitions of poverty and many instances of the degradations and actual tortures that it imposes on the human spirit. There is no need for me to dwell on the hopelessness and despair, the sense of entrapment, that erodes the souls of those citizens and their children who, once they fall into the quicksand of dependence on social assistance, sink deeper and deeper into it. To be robbed of the sense of fulfillment that comes from earning one's own way and providing for one's own family leads to the greatest poverty of all—poverty of morale, of soul, of spirit, of attitude.

Mr. Chairman and members of this committee, as we say in our brief, "Thank God the day of the workhouse is gone." No government that is worth its salt, in our opinion, would uphold the principle of compulsory labour for those for whom technological change or personal misfortune has robbed them of the opportunity to earn a livelihood in today's highly selective and competitive labour market. We must face up to the fact, sir, that those very technological advances which produce such a cornucopia of material products tend to rule out hands as a factor in such production to the point that we have sincere prophets, in Canada and the United States, who forecast that by the year 2000 three-quarters of Canadians will be paid not to work as we understand work today.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, in the three decades ahead we will have discovered how to educate people to cope with the circumstance of unlimited leisure. In the meantime, however, we have to deal with at least two generations who have not been exposed to any such conditioning.

The opportunities for economically justifiable employment are shrinking, but there is no lack of work to be done on this continent. I think this could be borne out by the Economic Council of Canada who, a year and a half or two years ago, reported that in the last 15 years in Canada there has not been one additional job created. There have been new jobs created by expansion of old industry and creation of new industry, but in that 15-year period not an additional job was created. There were new jobs but we have not been able to keep ahead. We have not been able to take care of the students who are coming out of the vocational schools, the trades and technology colleges, and the universities. Even with old industry expanding and new industry being created, not one additional job has been created.

In my province alone there is a whole list of projects that can benefit people, but which cannot be justified as projects for the private business sector of our economy, projects that are non-competitive with private business but which could employ great numbers of citizens without any complex training in skills.

We have untrained and semi-illiterate people who are on so-called welfare or social assistance, a more sophisticated name that we give it. These form the hard-core of that close to one-fifth of our province's population which is on either long- or short-term social assistance. In our opinion, these could be employed upgrading by hand the perimeters of the 564 miles of the Trans-Canada Highway that crosses our province. The unemployed miners of my own district of Bell Island could be occupied for another 10 years in hewing out a tunnel from their island to the local mainland, which would protect the provincial and private investment in this community that was not so very long ago, as Senator Carter will recall, the second largest community in the province. We feel that this would protect the investment by making it an adequate dormitory town for those commuting to employment and who are at present heavily handicapped by the need to pay for a ferry trip twice daily to their jobs. Reforestation, provincial parks improvements, community and beach clean-ups, all of these could be given a tremendous boost without interfering in any way with the private sector of business except to provide it with customers.

My suggestion is simply that the cost-sharing aid of the Canada Assistance Plan be extended to assisting provincial treasuries to finance Crown corporations charged with hiring from among social assistance recipients applicants for work on a selected list of projects which would be reviewed from time to time.

No recipient of assistance would be pressured into accepting such employment, but the opportunity would be there for him to earn well over and above his welfare entitlement at a type of work suited to whatever skills and training he has had, or a type of work where his lack of training would not handicap him from its performance.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, our people want work, and want work that they can perform with some sense of competency and self-fulfilment. Today and tomorrow technological advance in practically every area of business is eliminating the need for those who lack specialized training. Only government can afford to employ such citizens, to create a pay for the kind of work they can do. But my government, that of the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, cannot go it alone on such a project. The burden on the provincial taxpayer is already at the limit. We desperately need help, and if we are to cope with the worst kind of poverty of all—the poverty of opportunity, the poorness that prevents a man or woman from soul-saving, face-saving employment—we must have help from a treasury other than our own.

In our brief we are soliciting your support in a broadening of the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan to include cost-sharing aid, not just in maintaining some 20 per cent of our province's population in unproductive idleness, but in financing their way to paid employment that will make unique and presently neglected contributions towards improving life for all in your newest province and one which is struggling desperately to escape Cinderella status in our great Canadian family.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that pretty well sums up what is in the brief.

Senator Carter: Mr. Neary, in Newfoundland we have two problems, as you said, money and jobs. Let us start with money.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Work.

Senator Carter: Jobs, work. Can you tell me how much we spent in the last year on welfare?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Long-term and short-term social assistance?

Senator Carter: Total expenditure on welfare?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Approximately $22 million.

Senator Carter: That was for 1969-70?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: Same as the year before? Practically the same?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Practically the same, yes. And, we spent around the same year.

Senator Carter: So our expenditures are more or less frozen for the last 3 years around $22 million?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right, sir.

Senator Carter: Had we budgeted that? Is that what we budgeted for or is that less?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is what we budgeted for Treasury Board. Of course, we would like to have more because we know that for our people on short-term assistance, the people who are unemployed through no fault of their own, the rates are really low and we would like to have more money to spend to increase the rates.

Senator Carter: What percentage of the total budget is that? Can you give us some idea? Would it be 10 per cent or would it be more?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, we spend more than that on welfare. The total budget of my department is around $42 million.

Senator Carter: I mean the total budget that we spent for everything. Our total spending for the province.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Roughly 9 per cent or 10 per cent.

The Chairman: No. Much higher. Our own figures would indicate that they spend 17 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, but that is the total budget of my department. The total budget of my department runs around $42 million or $43 million. One-fifth of that is spent on short-term assistance.

Senator Carter: I was thinking of how much we spent in terms of priorities.

Senator Sparrow: May I interject a moment? You used the figure of $22 million.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is long-term and short-term assistance. The total budget of my department was around $43 million or $44 million.

Senator Sparrow: What is the difference?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Because we have homes for the aged, blind children, schools for the deaf, homes for juvenile delinquents, widows, orphans. Right at this moment there are 2,100 children under the care of my department. These would be illegitimate children, children from broken homes and this sort of thing. I would say that is a king-size family. This sort of thing makes up the difference between the $22 million that I quoted for looking after people who are handicapped—sick, widows, orphans—and people who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

Senator Sparrow: The total provincial budget is how much, then, $220 million?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No. The total provincial budget this year will be over $300 million.

Senator Carter: Just slightly over $300 million?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: Of the $22 million you spend you get $11 million back.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: From the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: How much of the rest of your budget, the $44 million, would you get back?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I would make a guess of between 40 and 45 per cent, because some of the programs that we carry out in my department are not sharable under the Canada Assistance Plan. Most of the programs are sharable and we recover 50 per cent from the Canada Assistance Plan.

Senator Carter: The one thing new in your presentation that you advocate is use of the Canada Assistance Plan in some sort of make-work project. We have had things like that before in the Winter Works Program, as you may remember, and we had a special arrangement for housing to encourage housing in the wintertime. Are you aware that the Canada Assistance Act can now be used to supplement what we would call "working poor," if they were working? Does your province spend any money under that section, or do you have that in your agreement with the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Neary: We do supplement now people who are earning below subsistence income with large families, but only to a limited scale because our rates are not all that good.

Senator Carter: What are your rates? What is your maximum rate? Take a family of four.

Hon. Mr. Neary: For a family of four the rate would be $70 a month for food. A man and his wife would get $25 each a month for food, and each child would get $10. That would be $70 for food. If it was in an area, as we say in Newfoundland, that is not a wooded area, then we would allow him fuel, which would probably amount to $15 or $20, depending upon the price of fuel in that area.

Senator Fergusson: If it was a wooded area he would have to get his own fuel?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Carter: But you are talking about able-bodied people now.

Hon. Mr. Neary: The rates are more generous for those who are on long-term assistance or, as they say, turned down by the doctor.

Senator Carter: What are your maximum rates for a family of four in those circumstances?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Roughly $230 a month.

Senator Carter: You are more generous than Nova Scotia. They have a cut-off at $175 a month, no matter how large the family is.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Carter: Do you have a cut-off figure, a maximum ceiling?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No. It depends on the size of the family.

Senator Carter: Can you tell us how you work out your definition of need under the Canada Assistance Act? How do you define need as compared with the old means test we had before the Canada Assistance Act?

Hon. Mr. Neary: We still have the needs test.

Senator Carter: How do you define need?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I would say that 99.9 per cent of the people on long-term assistance have been certified by a doctor as being unfit for work. The others, on the short-term assistance, are those who are unemployed through no fault of their own.

Senator Carter: When you talk about short-term assistance, have people been on short-term assistance as long as a year?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Some have been on as long as 20 years, since Confederation.

Senator Carter: On short-term assistance?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: What is long-term assistance?

Hon. Mr. Neary: In order to qualify for long-term assistance you have to be considered unemployable; in other words, you have to be certified as being unfit for work by a doctor.

Senator Fournier: It is a "rubber" assistance. You can stretch it as long as you want.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Providing the doctor will certify that he is unfit for work for longer than a period of six months. Actually, and I think you would agree with me, this is wrong because for people who have been on short-term assistance for a long time, the ultimate in life for them is to try to get on long-term assistance because they get more generous rates. This is morally wrong. They have a tendency then to try and chisel, and then the doctor becomes a faker because they hound and pester him to try to get on long-term assistance. He will give in eventually because he wants to get the fellow out of his office. He is becoming a proper nuisance.

Senator Carter: You have no special definition for need, apparently. You just assess it as so much he needs? You do not have a definition on which these assessments are made?

Hon. Mr. Neary: You mean is it based on the cost of living and that sort of thing?

Senator Carter: How do you define a needs test as different from a means test?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is rather difficult because, I think they are practically the same thing.

Senator Carter: In practice there is no difference?

Hon. Mr. Neary: In practice I would say very little difference. People on long-term assistance, and I hate to be repeating myself, are considered to be unemployable.. Whether they are all unemployable or not, there is some question in my mind about that because I think a lot of them have gotten on long-term assistance because the rates are more generous and the doctor probably stretched a point. That is only my opinion. I am not a professional. The rates are set for people on short-term assistance. We have fixed rates for them. The people on short-term assistance are unemployed but are considered to be employable. They are probably untrained, unskilled. By the way, we are now getting some skilled people coming to us since there has been a cut-back in construction in Newfoundland and we are under an austerity program. Office employees and master mechanics and this sort of person are now becoming unemployed. When his unemployment insurance runs out he does not have any choice but to come to us between job opportunities.

Senator Carter: Then he gets $25 for himself and $25 for his wife?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Carter: How can he live on that?

Hon. Mr. Neary: This is why the ministers of welfare of the Atlantic Provinces have just presented a brief to Mr. Munro. The Newfoundland people are taxed to the hilt now, as you know, and the only way that we can get more money to better look after our needy people is from another treasury.

Senator Carter: Let us come back to this work concept. Could that not be better done under some other arrangement than under the Canada Assistance Act? Do you think the Canada Assistance Act lends itself to that type of project? Is this not something to be worked out with the federal Department of Labour, or Manpower and Immigration, or Regional Economic Expansion, because the Canada Assistance Act is a welfare act. It is not a make-work act, as I understand it. It can be used to subsidize working poor. Can you use that section of that to do what you want to do?

Hon. Mr. Neary: We either change the ground rules of the Canada Assistance Plan or we develop a completely new concept and, personally, I do not care how it is done. Even with a guaranteed annual income that we seem to be headed towards, and I mentioned it in my brief rather casually, you are still going to pay people to remain in idleness, and I think this is morally wrong. I think it would be far better to take the money and create work for these people where they would be paid the equivalent of union wages, but not compete with members of trade unions or business or industry. I think we have enough work in this country, even cleaning up the beaches across Canada trying to clear up pollution. You could employ a tremendous number of people to do this.

Senator Carter: Would you restrict this only to welfare people? In other words, people would have to be on welfare before they could get a job like this?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I have not given much thought to that. You might run into a bit of a problem there. People earning below a subsistence income might say, "I would be better off if I go to work in one of these projects". The details would have to be worked out if the principle was accepted. I think if you take any businessman who wants to introduce a new product, he first tests the market before he introduces that product. I think Newfoundland would be a good testing ground for this new concept that we proposed here.

Senator Carter: Sort of an experimental area. You mentioned a guaranteed annual income. I take it from what you said that you are not too fussy about the guaranteed annual income? It is too demoralizing?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No sir, far from it. I do not think we have any choice in Canada.

Senator Carter: If you had a preference of, say, a guaranteed annual income or a different Canada Assistance Plan or some other scheme, what would your choice be?

Hon. Mr. Neary: If I had a choice it would be the one proposed in our brief.

Senator Carter: We are thinking in terms of poverty. Do you really think that is going to take care of poverty? We have places like Toronto and Hamilton where there is no shortage of jobs, yet we have terrific pockets of poverty there, worse even than in Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Neary: If the experts and economists and statisticians are right, by the year 2000, 25 per cent of the people in Canada will be producing all the goods and products we need in Canada. It is going to get progressively worse unless we are prepared to create work. As I said in the brief, jobs—work as we know it today—are disappearing. Machines are replacing hands. Therefore, we have to create work or train people how to spend their leisure time. The emphasis for the future is not on dispensing charity. That day is over. What we have to do, and I think the Government has to do this because private enterprise obviously cannot do it and has failed miserably—we have to create work to replace these jobs that are being wiped out.

Senator Carter: If you wanted so many people working on roads cleaning up the edges, as you say, and doing minor repairs, would this scheme be better done under a Crown Corporation or by subsidizing a road contractor.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Not under a contractor, because he would bring in his machinery. He does not create any jobs. All he is interested in is making a dollar.

Senator Carter: He would not be subsidized if he did not employ people; that is the whole point.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I will use the example of my own district, which is an island three miles from the mainland with a population of 6,000 people. We have been mining on Bell Island since 1895, and then Dosco moved out and left us without an industry. We were stranded there, economically marooned. I claim that instead of paying these people welfare or social assistance that we should dig a tunnel from the island to the local mainland, and they would know that every foot of that tunnel they dug would be for their own benefit. It might take them 10 years to do it, but at least they would be doing something productive. You would not just be handing your money out.

The Chairman: We have heard from the Vanier Institute and others that the Government should be the employer of last resort. That is the effect of what you are saying, is it?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, pretty well.

The Chairman: Well, is it or is it not?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: We have had that concept before us it has been presented by others.

Senator Carter: The present cost sharing is 50-50.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: The Act itself does not say that; the 50-50 business came out in an agreement between the province and the federal Government.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Carter: Why did you sign up for this 50-50 if it is not satisfactory? Have you got a better concept of sharing than 50-50 or is the 50-50 that you get now together with other fringe benefits satisfactory?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not know the history behind the Canada Assistance Plan, and I was not a member of our government when the contracts were signed, I have been Minister of Social Services and Rehabilitation less than a year, and I was only there a few weeks when I reached the opinion, that the Canada Assistance Plan is very unfair. The formula is wrong because it is 50 per cent right across the board for all 10 provinces, which means that wealthy Ontario and rich British Columbia can better look after their needy people than we can in Newfoundland. Under the Canada Assistance Plan they are only allowed to pay each of the 10 provinces a maximum of 50 per cent of the cost of their welfare programs. This is not fair in my opinion. It took us a year to develop this brief, by the way, and I think we have made a strong case. We are asking the Government of Canada, through the Honourable John Munro, Minister of National Health and Welfare, to change the formula so that the Canada Assistance Plan can pay more than 50 per cent to the have-not provinces. Then we will be better able to look after our needy people.

Senator Carter: What is your formula for Newfoundland in your proposal?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The formula for Newfoundland, instead of dollar for dollar it would work out $1.41 for every $1.00 that we spend. It could mean another $8 million for Newfoundland. There would be a ceiling.

Senator Carter: It looks, from what you have said that the federal Government, while working out these agreements, imposed this 50-50 formula. The Act itself does not require it.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not know who imposed it, but it is there. It is 50 per cent right across the board for all provinces. I think it is very unfair to the poorer provinces.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Neary, we are very glad to have you as a witness, and I have found your brief extremely interesting. Some of your suggestions regarding the operation of the Canada Assistance Plan are quite unusual and we certainly will consider them. Amongst the projects you mentioned, I was particularly taken with a suggestion of constructing a tunnel to Bell Island. What would be the advantage of the tunnel after it was built, other than creating work for 10 years or whatever the time was?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Then the island would become a large dormitory community. People could go back and work on the local mainland, whereas now they have to contend with a ferry service and its high rates. They are discouraged. For instance, three miles away where the ferry docks at Portugal Cove, if a man can afford to drive a car he can work in St. John's or he can work in Come-By-Chance or in Holyrood. But a man who lives on Bell Island, even if he owns a car, has to pay the additional expense of the ferry service to get across to get on the road to get to work.

Senator Carter: The ferry service is cut off at midnight.

Hon. Mr. Neary: The ferry service is cut off at 7 o'clock, sir, and this is another sore spot.

Senator Fergusson: Is there a charge for ferry service?

Hon. Mr. Neary: There is a charge. A man who brings his car is charged $2 a day return $2 a day for 3 miles to get to work, return.

Senator Fournier: Who operates the ferry.

Hon. Mr. Neary: It is operated by a private company. The ferry is owned by the Department of Transport.

Senator Fergusson: In New Brunswick we do not pay for ferry service across rivers. I am not sure about all of them.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You have had that advantage in New Brunswick for 35 years. I checked that out, too.

Senator Fergusson: It was a nuisance to pay and it amounted to quite a lot of money at one time.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Fergusson: In the first paragraph of your brief you say: "Newfoundland is perennially distinguished by the lowest per capita income, the largest families and the greatest birth rate, the highest index of unemployment . . . both at the beginning of and now at the end of 20 years of Confederation in comparison with other provinces."

I realize that Newfoundland has not moved ahead at the same rate as the other provinces.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Do you know what the average per capita income in Newfoundland is? According to the latest D.B.S. statistics it is $1,467.00.

Senator Fergusson: The average?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is the average as reflected in the 1968 statistics, which are the latest we have.

Senator Carter: Does that take into account transfer payments from the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, I would not think so.

Senator Fergusson: Even though, in comparison with the rest of the provinces, you still are the lowest.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. These are the facts.

Senator Fergusson: Has there been an improvement in the situation in Newfoundland since Confederation?

Hon. Mr. Neary: There has been an improvement. The gap between the working class people and the wealthy is narrowing but very, very slightly. Here we are with the lowest per capita income of any province in Canada, $1,467.00, and yet we have more millionaires per capita than any other province. You have poverty right in the midst of plenty.

Senator Fergusson: That is like some of the underdeveloped countries of which we complain they should be helping their poor people.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I agree with you.

Senator Fergusson: I also note that on page 2 you say that "poverty will still be with us in the philosophy—or the lack of philosophy of life which goes with unearned income."

From that statement it would seem you are arguing that there is some sanctity in the works ethic.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: You believe in this?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Very much so. I think to pay people just to remain in idleness merely erodes their morale.

Senator Fergusson: What is going to happen if the technicological advances are so great that there just is not work for people to do?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, this is what we are saying. The Government should create the work. There is so much to be done in this country.

Senator Fergusson: They must be working, according to your philology.

Hon. Mr. Neary: They have a choice. They either can go to work or live on social assistance, but I do not think the assistance should be the same.

The Chairman: What do you mean by the word "work"?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, as I have defined it here, by landscaping Trans Canada Highways, cleaning up the beaches of this country, by eliminating pollution, by reforestation, by doing all sorts of projects that are not competitive with labour or business or industry. I could think of hundreds myself, and I am sure the members of this committee could think of dozens and dozens that need to be done in their own towns and communities.

Senator Sparrow: Would this stand true in the future with your figure of three-quarters of the population without work, as such, because of changes? Would you extend that program so that you would have, in fact, three-quarters of the population at that time doing this type of work?

Hon. Mr. Neary: It is either that or we have to educate the next generation of people how to spend their leisure time. This is a big problem for the future. In the United States the economic experts and statisticians tell us that by 1985 only two per cent of the American population will be required to produce all the goods needed in that country. This is a frightening thing when you think about it, but these are the facts. I have not made them up.

Senator Fergusson: Do you think that in the United States you would be able to get the "non-employed" to work on the type of projects you have referred to such as cleaning up beaches, and so on?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, President Roosevelt was successful in doing this back in the thirties. It was practically the same thing we are talking about here. It is either that or another system. I am sure that none of us wants another system of government in this country.

The Chairman: Well, while we are at it, can you think what another system could do to improve the situation?

Hon Mr. Neary: No. I think that young people today are very disappointed and discontented. They are anti-establishment and disenchanted, but I think they would be more discontented and more disenchanted with another system. Therefore, we have to get somewhere in between. As I said in the beginning, we have to be flexible, we have to have fresh new ideas, we have to develop new concepts and make a new approach. If we do not, then we might fall into the other way of life which none of us wants.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, two questions I was going to ask have been answered. I was interested to hear from the witness how they arrived at this 50-50 agreement. This has been thrashed out. Senator Fergusson just asked a question about income. Poverty will be with us because of the inadequacy of life with the unearned income. I think we got a satisfactory answer on that. This is quite general across Canada.

Now, I would like to ask some questions about the island itself. Do people employed in paper mills receive a minimum salary? How are they treated?

Hon. Mr. Neary: People employed in paper mills and the mining industry in the province are probably the highest paid. They are paid at the same rate as employees in similar industries across Canada.

Senator Fournier: Do you have many employees working on the Churchill Falls project in Newfoundland?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right at this moment I would say—this would have to be a guess—3,000. Here again, most of these 3,000 are semi-skilled or unskilled. When the project is completed a year from now then what happens? This is not a continuing thing. When the construction stage is over, then they become unemployed. When their unemployment insurance benefits terminate, they are thrown back on provincial welfare.

Senator Fournier: How many people would be employed in or live off the fishing industry.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Roughly 12,000 or 13,000, roughly.

The Chairman: Out of a total population of how many?

Senator Carter: Your work force?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not know. I could not make a guess on it right now. The information is in here if I had time to dig it out.

Senator Fournier: What has been the result of the CNR doing away with passenger service and replacing it with bus service? Are the people satisfied with that type of service or was it a setback to the economy?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not think it was a set back to the economy. I think that any province would give its right arm to have the bus service that we have in Newfoundland today. There was some unemployment created as a result of the discontinuance of the train service, but the impact has not been all that great. The buses are doing the job, if that is what you mean. There are more people travelling by CN bus than travel by train.

Senator Fournier: Is there a time reduction from one point to another?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. It is a speedier method of transportation. There was a lot of sentiment and nostalgia expressed over the train service, but ultimately it had to go.

Senator Fournier: You mentioned several times in your statement that your people were taxed to the limit.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator Fournier: So are the people of my province, New Brunswick, and the rest of the Atlantic Provinces.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Fournier: Then you say that the only people who can do anything are the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Fournier: People across Canada are saying the same thing. They feel they too are taxed to the limit. How are we going to work this out?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, sir, I do not know. I am not a tax expert or an economist, but it will have to be worked out somehow. I do not feel we should just give people more and more handouts. I think we should put money in their pockets so that they can become consumers, and in this way more money flows back into the treasury. Right now all money being spent on social assistance programs across this country is non-productive. I think we should turn that into productive dollars. Then these people, apart from having their morale improved, become consumers. If we are going to keep increasing the number of products coming off our assembly lines, then people will just have to be provided with the hard cold cash to buy these products, otherwise the whole economy will collapse. I do not know if that makes sense to you, sir?

Senator Fournier: It does. I hesitated to say it myself, but I am pleased, you said it because that is the way I feel. We are not going to build this country by paying people to stay home.

Let us talk about your training schools. When people graduate as electricians, plumbers or motor mechanics—I am not talking about university graduates; I am not worried about them—I suppose they have to leave Newfoundland to find work?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I will say this to you, sir, in my opinion training and retraining programs do not create any new jobs. In today's changing society and changing world, by the time you get people trained in a specific trade, the job you trained them for is obsolete. This is another beef I have, with the Canada Manpower Training Program. They have some good men running the show, but I do not think they are training people for the right type of work. They are sticking to the traditional jobs and they are not going out and researching the employment market.

Senator Fournier: The need.

Hon. Mr. Neary: To see what the needs of employers are. I will give you one example. The vocational schools and technical colleges right across Canada are training welders by the thousands, and they are saturating the market. They should be training people for jobs where there is a shortage of skilled workers.

Senator Sparrow: What jobs are you suggesting are obsolete now? They may be overtraining, but I cannot see where jobs for electricians or welders are obsolete. Those jobs are not disappearing. Can you give me some examples.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You just mentioned two yourself, sir. I would venture a guess that right across this nation today there are plumbers and electricians, master mechanics and welders on social assistance rolls.

Senator Sparrow: Are the jobs diminishing or are they training too many people for particular jobs?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The jobs are diminishing. It is a combination of two things. The jobs are diminishing because of technological advances—machines replacing hands—and there is overtraining in certain categories. This is my opinion.

Senator Fournier: You are right, sir. I agree with you. I think I will pass to somebody else.

Senator Inman: I was interested in this statement on page 1:

A program of consumer education is under preparation by our department's field staff with the purpose of helping clients to secure better value for their allowances.

I think that is a good idea. Would you mind enlarging on that?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. As a matter of fact, this is something I am very proud of because if we cannot get more money to put in the hands of needy people, then the only other alternative is to try to educate these people as to how to stretch their dollar. Right at this moment a booklet that was prepared in my office is being printed in the Confederation building. This booklet gives people tips on consumer buying, subsistence farming, subsistence fishing, hunting, how to make preserves, sewing, mending, cooking, and so on. It was put together rather hurriedly because I only developed the idea a few weeks ago, but I think it is going to be of tremendous value to people on social assistance. As a matter of fact, I have had inquiries about this booklet from people on low incomes.

People are under tremendous pressure. The advertising campaigns and so forth that are put on today really suck people in. So this is just a common-sense approach of how people can stretch their dollars, because obviously we cannot increase pay rates at this time.

Senator Inman: I was very interested in this because I have always advocated this sort of thing, a consumers' association. I was an official of this in my own province.

In paragraph 2 you say "poverty will still be with us in the philosophy—or the lack of philosophy—of life which goes with unearned income." You appear to be arguing the sincerity of the work ethic.

Is this not the time in the evolution of Canadian society, in the face of dynamic technological advancement, that the validity of work has to be challenged?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I did not follow that?

Senator Inman: That the validity of the work ethic be challenged? Do you think we should go on with that? In a way I think you answered that in reply to a question by Senator Fergusson.

The Chairman: Well, the question was whether the work ethic, as we normally understand it, is applicable today in the sense that we originally understood the work ethic? The workers starve.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I think I answered that by saying that in 20 or 25 years from now works will be completely different.

Senator Inman: Yes. What efforts has Newfoundland made to retrain individuals on social assistance in an attempt to break this self-perpetuating aspect of poverty? What are you doing?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Up to less than a year ago our field staff had been so busy dispensing social assistance and was so bogged down in paper work that they really did not have time to get out and do the counselling they were supposed to do. Since I became minister of my department I have been trying to shift the emphasis to rehabilitation. That is why we just changed the name. We just took this new name, "Department of Social Services and Rehabilitation". The bill changing the name went through the Legislature just a few days ago. What I am trying to do, and you might notice I mention it in the first page, is to phase in the cheque system. The food order and voucher system is on the way out and is being replaced by the cheque system. I hope to get the whole thing into a computer so that I can get the field staff out into the homes and lay the emphasis on rehabilitation rather than just dispensing social assistance with no advice, no counseling and no way to try and rehabilitate people. Does that answer the question?

Senator Inman: Yes, thank you. You say that there is no lack of work to be done. In your province, apart from this tunnel you speak of, what work do you think could be created?

Mr. Neary: Landscaping the 564 miles of Trans Canada Highway, reforestation, cleaning up beaches, dozens and dozens of things.

Senator Inman: I have travelled through your province by train. You have a lot of difficult terrain. Do you think any of that land could be reclaimed?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Sure. The bog land. As a matter of fact, we do have a bog land reclamation program under way right now on an experimental basis. A lot of this land can be reclaimed. I agree with you. This could be another project. That is a very good idea. Maybe we should put you on our committee.

The Chairman: We cannot spare her from this committee.

Senator McGrand: She was on the Senate, Land Use Committee. We went over this subject 12 or 13 years ago.

Senator Inman: When travelling through Newfoundland I have often wondered whether the province could use a drainage system under a cultivation program.

Hon. Mr. Neary: We have been experimenting with it for years now, and I think it would be a good project. You create pasture land for cattle and for growing vegetables.

Senator McGrand: In 1957-58 during the sitting of the Land Use Committee a witness from Newfoundland outlined this thing at some length—the drainage of bogs to produce pasture and so on. I have never heard anything about it from that day to this. Do you know whether any progress was made with it?

Hon. Mr. Neary: In my opinion the experiment was 100 per cent successful, but for some reason or other the Department of Agriculture has not been able to sell the idea to our people. The program proposed here has to be sold to the people of Canada.

Senator McGrand: This brief this morning is something new. We have not heard anything like this before, as far as I can recall, in that it makes reference to the development of your natural resources and the development of the personal wealth of people.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right.

Senator McGrand: Now, poverty and prosperity do not come quickly nor do they disappear quickly. At least in two of our Atlantic Provinces a lot of the poverty and low income has been due to the inadequate development of natural resources.

Let us think about that in the interests of small people. If we are going to fight poverty in the future, these natural resources must be developed properly. We must start now if we are going to fight poverty in the next generation.

Getting back to this tunnel idea, when I read about it I thought it was a rather ridiculous suggestion. I thought you were planning only to give work to idle hands, but I presume you have done some research about the benefits of spending money now to build a tunnel in order that people would be able to get cheaper transportation. On balance you think it is worth it, is that right?

Hon. Mr. Neary: There is going to be a fair-sized population on that island for a good many years to come. All we will be doing for the next 10, 15 or 20 years is giving these people social assistance to remain in idleness. The next generation will be the same, and the first thing you know it will be the same for a third generation. I have researched this very, very carefully because it happens to be my own district. I think it would be far better if these people were paid a living wage to build a tunnel instead of giving them handouts—social assistance. Besides, the Government has a big investment in that community, sir. There is a big vocational school there, and a hospital that cost $1 1/4 million. There are also some beautiful churches, schools and homes there. So, there is a public investment and a private investment which could go down the drain.

Senator McGrand: I would like to discuss your forest, fishing, and mining wealth. All down the years we have regarded the fishing industry of Newfoundland as the mainstay of the economy, but there are fewer and fewer hands employed in that industry all the time. Apart from that, I understand your Bell Island iron ore is practically useless to you, today.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. The industry has been closed down since 1966.

Senator McGrand: You have two other areas. You have the mines at Buchans?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: And the mines at Kelp Cove.

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, Kelp Cove is closed.

Senator McGrand: How many men were employed there?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Around 230 or 240.

Senator McGrand: Buchans is still operating?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, Buchans is still operating.

Senator McGrand: How many men are employed there?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I think they employ 450 to 500 men. Perhaps it is a little higher in the summer time.

Senator McGrand: As to the future of mining of the mainland of Newfoundland—I am not speaking about Labrador—there is not very good prospects of it providing a major source of income is there?

Hon. Mr. Neary: While I agree with you, sir, we must forge ahead and develop our natural resources. When you are talking today about creating a new industry, you are really talking about machines and not hands. I agree that technology has moved into the fishing industry, but only on a limited scale. If there is an industry left on the North American continent today that is a great potential employer, it is the fishing industry in Newfoundland, because people can still do things with their hands.

Senator McGrand: You can do the same about forestry too.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator McGrand: You are our first witness who has mentioned the development of forestry. I am not familiar with the forest wealth of Newfoundland, but there must be areas there that are as productive as areas in New Brunswick.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Of course.

Senator McGrand: I am going back to your comments about the new-job concept. Your approach is new; no one ever mentioned this before.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, Joey Smallwood mentioned it three years ago.

Senator McGrand: I mean, by people who have come before our committee.

Hon. Mr. Neary: It is not an original idea, sir. Our premier mentioned it at a Federal-Provincial Conference about three years ago.

Senator McGrand: I am going to go back further than that. I heard it mentioned at the Federal-Provincial Conference in 1950.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You are probably right.

Senator McGrand: I was at that conference. I was Minister of Health and Welfare for New Brunswick at that time. You mentioned something new in this approach, the development of people.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator McGrand: The day is not far away when only 25 per cent of the people will not use machinery.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator McGrand: Do you consider this enforced idleness should be met with a program to develop people socially, culturally and emotionally so that they can live in this environment?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Sure.

Senator McGrand: People will have to be employed to do this, is that not so?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is well put, sir.

Senator McGrand: Research should be done in this very field today.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I tell you, the next generation will never forgive us if we do not face this problem now.

Senator McGrand: One hundred years ago most of people in the world spoke only one language. By the end of the next century, a person who can speak only one language will be as illiterate as those at the beginning of this century, who only knew their three Rs. Is that not right?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator McGrand: They have got to learn to live with the situation that is going to develop. We cannot stop it. Would you just go ahead and tell us what you have in mind and outline this new concept a little more?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not know that I can add anything to what is in the brief and what you have already said. I think you have raised a very important point because 99 per cent of the trouble in the world today is lack of communication. The trouble between labour and management is a breakdown in communications. The trouble on university campuses right across North America results from a breakdown in communications. Because television brings news of world happenings and developments right into your living room, we seem to be getting a little closer together. If we are going to eliminate poverty in the world, and I think this is what you are getting at, then my concept, which is to take a fair share of Canada's gross national product and distribute it among our needy people—that concept can apply to the whole world eventually. The only way to solve the problem of poverty right across the world is to take the gross globular product and divide the world population into it. Of course, as you say, people will be speaking the same language. This ultimately has to happen. Anyone who does not think along these lines is stupid. He is just a fool. We always have to be thinking of new ideas, and we have to train people how to spend their leisure time in the future. This is a big problem.

Senator McGrand: How to live with each other.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator McGrand: Our problem is not outer space; our problem is inner space among people.

Senator Fournier: Sir, you have mentioned a lack of and a breakdown of communication. Do you see a difference between the lack of communication and the breakdown? Is that the same thing?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I suppose it is practically the same thing. A lack of communication could mean there may be partial communication. A complete breakdown is what causes wars and trouble on university campuses, strikes and labour disputes, and so on. You have to have continuous dialogue. People have to keep talking around the conference table. People have to keep communicating with one another.

Senator Fournier: It seems to me the facilities of communication are pretty well established.

Hon. Mr. Neary: The facilities, if we use them properly.

Senator Fournier: It is the breakdown that causes the trouble.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You are quite right, sir. Prime Minister Trudeau has praised radio, newspaper and television as a means for presenting good ideas to Canadians, and he has repeatedly said that communication through these media can come close to the ideal of direct democracy, as long as the Government—and this is the important thing—gears itself to handle the feedback from these people.

This hearing here today is just a forum—the press will put the idea across to the public. If you believe in this idea, you have to sell it to Canadians and you have to get their reaction to it. This is the only way it can be successful. In other words, the nation is just a theatre, a forum, and the news media have to disseminate the information. We also have to recognize the feedback.

Senator Fournier: Is your sale of fish products increasing every year?

Hon. Mr. Neary: In my opinion, sir, the problem with the fishing industry in Newfoundland for 400 years has been a failure to market the product. Now, the Government of Canada, as you know, has set up the Saltfish Marketing Board, which is a good thing. It will help the fishing industry of Newfoundland, but it is just an infant step. The next move would be to set up a fresh fish marketing board to sell fresh fish.

We have to improve the quality of the Newfoundland product. That is all part of the marketing mix. Then we have to go out and sell it, which is what the fish merchants of Newfoundland have never done. They have waited for traditional buyers to beat a path to their door instead of trying to sell the product and trying to make fish a prestigious food. In my opinion, this has been the weakness in the fishing industry in Newfoundland for 400 years, and it is only now that they are beginning to recognize this.

Senator Fournier: You said you had approximately 12,000 people employed in the fishing industry.

Hon. Mr. Neary: There are probably more. There are probably 20,000 part-time and full-time fishermen.

Senator Fournier: How do you think that number could be increased with a proper organized sales market? Would you reach 30,000?

Hon. Mr. Neary: In my opinion, yes. That figure could be easily reached. All they have to do is go out and get the markets and sell the product. We have the fish right at our doorstep, and we have the people. Even if they do not have a long liner or big schooner, at least they can take a little boat and go out and catch some fish and supplement their social assistance. At least, they would be producing something. If they catch one fish they would be adding to the gross provincial product. You have to change people's attitude in order to get them to do this.

Senator Fournier: Are the draggers hurting the small fishermen?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir, they are. Again, I must congratulate the Government of Canada for the gigantic step they took recently to try and force the 12-mile limit. I do not know that are going to be 100 per cent successful because I understand that the officials in Washington are not at all pleased with it. The Government of Canada should stand firm on this issue, because they are absolutely right. I agree that the draggers are killing the small fishermen in Newfoundland. They are tearing up their gear and nets and destroying their property.

Senator Fournier: Do they come within the 3-mile limit, quite close to shore?

Hon. Mr. Neary: We have had reports of draggers coming inside the 3-mile limit. As a matter of fact, we have had a couple of prosecutions in recent years of foreign draggers operating inside the 3-mile limit.

Senator McGrand: Are there any Newfoundland draggers there or are these Russian and Norwegian and other foreign draggers?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Most of the draggers we are talking about are foreign draggers or Canadian draggers, but not Newfoundland based.

Senator McGrand: When you say Canadian draggers, you mean operated out of Halifax?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir, that is right. Some are Canadian draggers, unfortunately, and Canadian skippers should have better sense.

Senator Fournier: One last question, sir. Is your island invaded by credit cards?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

Senator Fournier: What is your opinion of credit cards in the hands of the average person?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I think it is very dangerous. Although some people may disagree with me, I think Newfoundland is contributing to inflation. People who commit themselves financially and who tie themselves up—bind themselves for years—are contributing to inflation whether they are in Newfoundland or British Columbia or here in Ontario. This is my opinion. I think the credit card system is the greatest curse that has ever been invented and used on mankind.

Senator Fournier: You would agree that they are handed out too freely?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir. I do not know if the system would work if limitations were imposed, but as it is now I think it is a great curse. Credit and credit cards should be legislated out of business.

Senator McGrand: Going back to saltfish, I had the impression that the saltfish industry was going down, that people did not buy saltfish.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, you are absolutely right.

Senator McGrand: You depended on the Latin countries to take the saltfish and that market was lost. I think I am right that in the old days Newfoundland saltfish, whether in good shape or poor, went to the West Indies to feed the slaves. That was part of the Newfoundland saltfish industry.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That was probably when I was in knee pants, but you are absolutely right.

Senator McGrand: You were not in knee pants; you were not born in the days of slavery in the West Indies.

I have the impression that the people who operate the saltfish industry never met the challenge of producing a saltfish product that overcame and created a new market for it.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I am in complete agreement with you. In the West Indies today they have supermarkets. They are getting a more sophisticated way of doing business. The fish merchants in Newfoundland who have controlled the fish industry for 400 years dumped everything they could get into the West Indies and into the foreign market, and they killed the market. Today you have to make a nice attractive package with a label on it to sell in the supermarkets.

I have read reports about Newfoundland fish being dumped in old rundown warehouses in the West Indies, where people have walked on it. They are getting more sophisticated and educated in the West Indies, so can you imagine walking into a supermarket and seeing a piece of Newfoundland saltfish lying on the floor? This is all part of the marketing mix.

Senator McGrand: Is there not a future for sun-dried cod? I think there is still a future for that product if it is properly marketed.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You are absolutely right, sir.

Senator McGrand: Are the fishermen from Europe, the Russians, the Portuguese, the Poles and Norwegians, overfishing your waters?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: The Portuguese have been fishing the Grand Banks for 300 years. Are they creating as big a problem as are the Norwegians and Russians, and son on? They operate a different type of fishing, do they not?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The Portuguese have been very friendly. We have been very friendly with the Portuguese down through the years.

Senator McGrand: They are not a problem to you, like the others?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The Portuguese have been most co-operative. If any group of foreigners have been cooperative, it is the Portuguese. We have extremely good relations with the Portuguese. They bend over backwards not to upset the fishing industry of Newfoundland. I do not think it is the Portuguese who destroy the gear and the nets.

Senator McGrand: There is a depletion of fish along the Labrador coast and Newfoundland, is that not correct?

Hon. Mr. Neary: We are told that by the experts, sir, but I cannot verify it. It is not my field, to be honest with you.

Senator McGrand: Getting back to your welfare expenditure of $22,400,000, this includes your share and the federal Government's share?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator McGrand: We talked about homes for children, homes for old people, and so on. That is not included in that figure?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No.

Senator McGrand: This is the money you pay out in what you call welfare to needy families.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right—handicapped people, widows . . .

Senator McGrand: Newfoundland has a population of about 450,000, I believe?

Hon. Mr. Neary: 500,000, sir.

Senator McGrand: They will spend at least $23 million this year, maybe more?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

Senator McGrand: In the United States, with 200 million people, they spend up to $32 billion for welfare. I am not very good in mental arithmetic.

Hon. Mr. Neary: One of my weaker subjects, too, sir.

The Chairman: You are going to ask the percentage?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

The Chairman: What he is telling you now is that 8 or 9 per cent of your total budget goes to welfare. You said that your total budget was $300 million, of which $22 million goes to welfare.

Hon. Mr. Neary: My department's budget is $44 million. What is the proper percentage of that?

The Chairman: Ten or 12 per cent.

Senator McGrand: If the Americans are spending that proportion of money on welfare, what would it cost them? It would cost them more than $32 billion; would it not?

The Chairman: I do not know about billions, but the percentages are these: the British is about 11 per cent, the Canadian 9 to 10 per cent, and the American percentage is just about the same as the Canadian.

Senator McGrand: There is a little distortion there. The Americans are spending their money on moon shots. What I would like to know is if United States was spending on welfare in the same proportion to what Newfoundland is spending on welfare, would not their total amount spent on welfare be more than it is today?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir, I think you are probably right.

The Chairman: No, you cannot be right. Canada spends about 10 per cent.

Senator McGrand: Of its budget.

The Chairman: For all welfare purposes.

Senator McGrand: But we do not have any moon shots and all this expense in Vietnam?

The Chairman: They are separate and apart. The Americans on a national level spend about the same as we do. The British spend a little more.

Senator McGrand: The Americans spend a lot of their budget on Vietnam and on their space program.

Senator Inman: I would like to speak about the removal of people from the outports. Would that help the poor to a better way of life. Are they adapting well to change and are they costing the province more in welfare or less?

Hon. Mr. Neary: They are costing the province less in welfare. We just finished researching these figures, by the way, because there have been charges and counter charges made that we are just moving people into communities where they become non-productive. They are moved from fishing communities into non-productive communities. The figures reveal, surprisingly enough to our opponents, that the number of people on short-term assistance has decreased since they moved and resettled.

Senator Inman: Has decreased?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Has decreased in the short-term category.

Senator Inman: In those little outports people lived on fish they caught and sold themselves. By removing them have they lost that way of making some money.

Hon. Mr. Neary: In some cases they have. One example is Arnold's Cove, which has been the subject of controversy on national television. There is no place or community that I know of in North America that has been more photographed than Arnold's Cove. We made the statement that the number of welfare recipients on short-term assistance had decreased under the resettlement program, and the C.B.C., who does not believe anybody . . .

The Chairman: Nobody believes them either, so it does not make any difference.

Hon. Mr. Neary: They sent a man to Arnold's Cove to confirm or deny this fact, and they had to admit that we were correct, that the number of short-term recipients in Arnold's Cove had decreased. That was rather a shock for the C.B.C. because they were hoping to make a national issue out of it.

Senator Inman: There are some small industries there. I remember buying a handbag in a Gold Sail place. Somebody told me that it has been closed.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, it has. You are talking about a subject now that is very dear to my heart, because Newfoundlanders have a natural talent for doing things with their hands. A lot of these people on social assistance who are unemployed or getting unemployment insurance during the winter, who have a natural talent with their hands, should be making souvenirs for the thousands and thousands of tourists that come to Newfoundland in the summertime. Instead of that—and you find this right across Canada—you go into a store and you buy a souvenir that is made in Japan or Taiwan. I have been trying to encourage my own constituents on Bell Island to do this. I have to be a little patriotic when I talk about my own district, but I have been trying to encourage this right across the province. There is no reason in the world why those Newfoundland people who have time on their hands could not supply enough souvenirs to take care of the tourists.

Senator Inman: The Gold Sail people were making a beautiful product.

The Chairman: Why is it not being done Mr. Neary? That is the next question?

Hon. Mr. Neary: This is one of the self-help projects I am trying to cultivate right now. Again, you have to do a selling job. Senator McGrand was talking about our fishermen. They are businessmen in their own right, although they have never realized it. A fisherman has always felt that he was a slave to the merchant. When you look at him he is a businessman, but he has never been trained to think businesswise. He has never had any training in business. He has never had any training in bargaining.

I know several people who really have a talent for making things with their hands. I have said to them, "Why don't you sit down all winter and fill up your basement with souvenirs and then sell them to Bowrings or some big business firm to be resold to our tourists?" You know what their answer to me was? "I'll make the souvenirs, but who is going to sell them for me?" Immediately a mental barrier goes up because their minds are not market-oriented. They say, "I can make all kinds of souvenirs, but I can't market them."

Senator Inman: Do they not have a shoe factory at Holyrood?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The shoe factory is in Harbour Grace. That is only operating part-time right now. You have to educate people and change their attitude.

Senator Inman: I was just wondering if those things were going and why they were not going.

Senator McGrand: I have read a lot about industries being set up in Newfoundland and then failing. You hear a lot about that.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: I still hear about these massive injections of capital that are necessary to lift up the Atlantic economy. How many failures did you have when you were developing a natural resource?

Hon. Mr. Neary: To my knowledge we have not had any failures in developing a natural resource. You never hear of our successes, only of the failures. We have had some really dramatic successes in Newfoundland—Iron Ore Company of Canada, Labrador City, the Wabush Mining Company in Wabush, Churchill Falls, the Baie Verte Asbestos enterprise, and the oil refinery at Holyrood. I could name dozens and dozens, but you always hear of the ones that fail, never the ones that are successful. Just like in Nova Scotia, all you hear about is the heavy water plant.

Senator McGrand: You would not call the oil refinery a development of a natural resource. You brought the oil in. I mean where you are developing a natural Newfoundland resource you have had very few failures.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is correct, sir.

Senator McGrand: That is what I am talking about when I say that the development of a natural resource is the first priority if we are going to fight poverty.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, in answering Senator Inman you talked about souvenirs.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: You said the work could be made available and could be done by these people. Are you not asking a little too much when you ask these people to do the marketing? Is that not a function today of government? Marketing requires specialization. These people are quite right in saying, "I can make it but I can't market it." Do we not market eggs, butter and all sorts of products under marketing boards? Why do they not have marketing facilities under some department of government?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Senator, you are absolutely correct. I could not agree with you more. It is a good point. I do not think you would need to set up a specific marketing board like the Saltfish Marketing Board, but at least somebody in the Department of Community and Social Development could undertake to do the marketing for them. As a matter of fact, I offered to do the marketing for these people whom I know. I offered to do the marketing myself.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, even the business of marketing fish, particularly in the West Indies and other parts of the world, has been going on for a great number of years.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: We have been told time and time again—and from what I have seen there is a great deal to it—that we are now packaging, labelling and marketing our fish in a most attractive fashion.

Hon. Mr. Neary: We are now, yes. We finally came to the realization that this had to be done. We are starting to do it, now. The Saltfish Marketing Board which was set up recently by Ottawa will help Newfoundland. I have high hopes for it.

Senator McGrand: With respect to the depopulation of the outports and taking people off the island—Arnold's Cove is an example, and I am not just familiar with all of them—I am interested in that northern peninsula that runs up to St. Anthony. Now, that peninsula would be scarce in natural resources. You would not have much lumber on that, would you?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, we have a big lumber industry starting right now at Hawkes Bay.

Senator McGrand: That is pretty far up?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Half way up the coast, roughly. They have a good lobster fishery there, and a good salmon fishery and cod fishery. My colleague, the Minister of Mines, Agriculture and Resources, just presented a white paper in our House of Assembly on that whole coast developing a national park in the Bonne Bay Gros Morne area, and developing the historic sights. He put this all together in a package, which is one of the most significant documents that has been produced in Newfoundland since Confederation. It deals with this coast you are talking about.

Senator McGrand: I had an idea they were losing their young population more than any other part of Newfoundland.

Hon. Mr. Neary: They are losing their young people, there is no question about that. This happens in all the smaller communities. The young people move out. They are not going to stay there.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, am I right in suggesting that the work force in Newfoundland is about a quarter of a million, two hundred and a quarter to 250,000?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I do not think it is that high, senator.

The Chairman: It would be 200 anyway?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, it is only a little over 100,000.

The Chairman: A working force of a little over 100,000?

Hon. Mr. Neary: I believe so, I would have to check that.

The Chairman: According to page 14 of the paper you presented to the Minister of Health and Welfare, of the four Atlantic Provinces—Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and Nova Scotia,—Newfoundland had the highest weekly wages and salaries in the years 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: How do you reconcile that with a comparative percentage of welfare cases per thousand population in your province and the other provinces? It is somewhat difficult to understand this.

Hon. Mr. Neary: This probably relates to the question asked by Senator McGrand. In our mining industry and pulp and paper industry, and let me see what other industries I could mention . . .

The Chairman: Here they are.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. I would say this figure is based solely on these categories.

The Chairman: But, they include every category that is available in any part of Canada.

Hon. Mr. Neary: The mining industry in Newfoundland would be extremely high. They pay good wages. So do the paper mills.

The Chairman: The number of welfare cases per thousand population in your province is higher than it is in any other province in Canada.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. This gets back to what I said earlier, you have extreme wealth and in the middle of it you have extreme poverty.

The Chairman: But, your wealth is really extreme at the very top.

Hon. Mr. Neary: During the construction at Churchill Falls an ordinary labourer can earn take-home pay of $1,000 a month.

The Chairman: Will it last?

Hon. Mr. Neary: It will only last while the construction period is on. This is what drives the figures sky high.

The Chairman: Do not forget that these figures are for four years, 1965 to 1968. Has this been going on for four years?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, for two years.

The Chairman: You were the highest each year. There is another problem I thought I would discuss with you. You said that a family of four on welfare would receive about $230 a month.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Long-term.

The Chairman: To meet the needs.

Hon. Mr. Neary: It is much less for short term.

The Chairman: Put the head of a family of four to work for eight hours a day at $1.10 an hour, which is your minimum. That comes to $44, a week, does it not?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: Multiply that by four and we get $176.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: So we are $54 short?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right.

The Chairman: He can get $54 more on welfare.

Hon. Mr. Neary: On long-term assistance.

The Chairman: Yes. Short-term is only emergency?

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

Senator Fournier: A 20-year emergency.

The Chairman: No. He stretched it a bit.

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, sir. There may only be a handful of people, but this handful have been on short-term for 20 years. I would say we have a handful in Newfoundland who are third generation.

The Chairman: Don't be ashamed of it. You are not unique. We have them right in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Neary: But it is one reason we should be concerned.

The Chairman: We are concerned. I am indicating to you here that here is a man who could work and yet be $54 short of what he could get on welfare.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right.

The Chairman: That is a working poor man. I am asking you whether you are doing anything to keep the man employed, rather than let him stop his work and go on welfare? What I am saying to you, in effect, is this: if he is earning $176, you could assist him to the extent of $54.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: If he is not working, it costs you $230.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Right.

The Chairman: So it pays you to keep the man employed. Are you doing much of that?

Hon. Mr. Neary: Well, in my opinion, what we are doing to people on short-term assistance, is morally wrong. We are not allowing them any income. They cannot earn any income. Whatever they earn is 100 per cent deducted from their entitlement.

I have made a new innovation, recently, and I am now allowing them legitimate expenses such as transportation, uniforms, eating out, and that sort of thing. I am allowing legitimate expenses in earning that income. We are now basing their entitlement on their net income instead of on gross income as was previously the case. I agree with you that this is still not right. A man should be allowed to earn so much and still qualify for his social assistance.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, they will give you a deduction, in the circumstances, of at least $40 to $50 in most provinces.

Hon. Mr. Neary: That is right.

The Chairman: And earnings above that on a 50 per cent basis.

Hon. Mr. Neary: We do not do it yet.

The Chairman: Do it. It is about time. It has to be done.

Hon. Mr. Neary: I have only been Minister of this Department for eleven months, sir.

The Chairman: Well, it looks as though you are doing very well. You have a welfare system, and of the people who have come before us not one group from any province has had anything to say for the welfare system at all. They say it is not working, that it is a mess.

Hon. Mr. Neary: If you want my personal opinion senator, it is just a clumsy way at the moment to look after those who are handicapped and unemployed through no fault of their own. We need something in place of it.

The Chairman: You have given us the impression this morning, and I am delighted that you have, of thinking about this thing and presenting fresh ideas. In damning the welfare system people have said that it breaks up homes, that the amount is inadequate, that it penalizes people who work, and that it robs the recipients of dignity.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes.

The Chairman: What new thoughts do you have as to how we can get away from this, aside from building a tunnel, and so on? You said earlier that President Roosevelt introduced a public works program in the thirties and it worked very well. Whether we are at the same stage or not I do not know, but in view of the failures that have been experienced what new thinking have you had? How can you help us?

Hon. Mr. Neary: The only thing that I can say is that at the moment it is the only machinery we have to deal with the handicapped and people who are unemployed through no fault of their own. It is a clumsy way of doing it, mind you, but it is the only machinery we have. We have to start developing fresh new ideas. We have to be flexible and willing to experiment with the type of proposal that is in our brief. I do not know what else I can say about it.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, for the people who are disadvantaged and no longer in the labour market, is it not possible to make a new approach to them by way of income?

Hon. Mr. Neary: People who are?

The Chairman: Disadvantaged—the sick, crippled, old, maimed, those no longer in the labour market.

Hon. Mr. Neary: Yes. I would say you are right. Both government and private agencies have been carrying on rehabilitation programs for years. I do not know whether these programs have been sufficient, whether we have been doing enough to rehabilitate people. I do not see why a man sitting in a wheel chair, for instance, could not work if there was work available for him. He could push buttons, answer a phone, write—there are all types of things he could do. You raised a good point. Perhaps we need to do more for these types of people. What it is we have to do, I would have to think about it more.

The Chairman: I suppose you could say that that is our job, to come up with something.

Are there any other senators who have questions?
Mr. Minister, is there anything else you would like to say?

Hon. Mr. Neary: No, except I would like to thank you and the committee for allowing us to make this presentation.

I may say that the observations made in this brief come from my field staff all over the province. They have seen the destruction of the souls of whole families through this legislative enforced idleness and this comes with the entitlement for social assistance.

I hope, sir, through your committee you will be able to change the ground rules of this sorry game and indicate to the people of Canada that we have to be prepared to be flexible and experimental. We have to change things. The people of Canada will then have to feed back their views on the ideas and proposals that you put forward.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, I think that I can say to you that change will certainly be one of the things we will recommend in some form or another.

Your brief today has been interesting and informative. It has a "grass roots" approach. It is thoughtful and helpful. We are delighted to see a man of your calibre take an interest in and show a concern about this very perplexing problem.

Hon. Mr. Neary: You will have noticed that I did not throw in much statistical data, for I feel that by now the minds of the committee members must be completely boggled by statistics and by repetition. Let us get down to brass tacks and talk common sense.

The Chairman: I said that you used a "grass roots" approach. We appreciate your presentation.

Mr. Minister, on behalf of the committee I thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

BRIEF to the
SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY
submitted by the
DEPARTMENT OF SOCIAL SERVICES AND REHABILITATION of the PROVINCE OF NEWFOUNDLAND
by STEPHEN A. NEARY, MINISTER

Ottawa, Ontario

May 7, 1970

There is no need in this submission to dwell on the seriousness of poverty in Canada's newest province. Newfoundland is perennially distinguished by the lowest per capita income, the largest families and greatest birth-rate, the highest index of unemployment, the lowest average level of education, the greatest per capita provincial indebtedness both at the beginning of and now at the end of twenty years of Confederation in comparison with other provinces.

True, the material standard of living even for recipients of social assistance has improved tremendously since the thirties when provincial help was limited to six cents a day. The payment of short term assistance by discriminatory vouchers will be completely phased out during the months just ahead in favour of cash payments. A program of consumer education is under preparation by our department's field staff with the purpose of helping clients to secure better value for their allowances. The current session of our House of Assembly has unanimously approved an amendment to the provincial Social Assistance Act establishing an independent Appeals Board comprising a representative of the business community, a recipient of social assistance, and a chairman skilled in procedure, knowledgeable of regulations and experienced in human relations. Following up experiments with "self-help" plans—home gardening, subsistence fishing, cottage industry—in my own Bell Island

District to help social assistance recipients extend their welfare dollar, the department's field workers will be educating citizens of other communities in self-help projects through the months ahead.

Despite these plans and measures, Mr. Chairman, attempted in what is perhaps the best laboratory in our country for confronting and attempting to cope with the realities of poverty, despite our national progress towards the inevitable goal of guaranteed annual income, poverty will still be with us in the philosophy or the lack of philosophy—of life which goes with unearned income.

For, not only is the current social assistance program self-perpetuating in that it entraps and contains generation after generation in the same family or in the same community, but because of the stiff penalties it visits upon those who attempt to break through into such occasional employment as is open to them, it saps the morale and destroys the desire even to think about work not only among those already on welfare but even among the employed poor who often by simple arithmetic can prove that they are dollars ahead in receipt of our present relatively meagre social assistance as compared with inadequate wage scales.

Mr. Chairman and members of this committee: you will undoubtedly in your hearings have had many definitions of poverty and many instances of the degradations and actual tortures that it imposes on the human spirit. There is no need for me to dwell on the hopelessness and despair, the sense of entrapment that erodes the souls of those citizens and their children who once fall into, and then sink deeper and deeper into the quicksand of dependence on social assistance. To be robbed of the sense of fulfilment that comes from earning one's own way and providing for one's own family leads to the greatest poverty of all—poverty of morale, of soul, of spirit, of attitude.

History, again and again, has shown what has happened to nations which permitted large numbers of their citizens to become viewers instead of doers. Rome was not far from its Fall when it distributed free bread to its citizens and provided them with pacifying entertainment in the Colosseum. Is not today's recipient of state assistance for his material needs sitting hour after hour in front of his television a perfect parallel? It is not a matter of top priority for Canada to open its eyes to this problem, to this erosion of the very basis for good citizenship in a democracy if the word democracy is to mean anything?

Mr. Chairman and members of this committee: the day of the workhouse is, thank heavens, gone. No government that is worth its salt would uphold the principle of compulsory labour for those whom technological change or personal misfortune has robbed of the opportunity to earn a livelihood in today's highly selective and competitive labour market. And we must face up to the fact that those very technological advances which produce such a cornucopia of material products tend to rule out hands as a factor in such production to the point that we have sincere prophets who forecast that by the end of this millenium three-quarters of Canadians will be paid not to work as we understand work today.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, in the three decades ahead we will have discovered how to educate people to cope with the circumstance of unlimited leisure. In the meantime, however, we have to deal with at least two generations who have not been exposed to any such conditioning.

Mr. Chairman: the opportunities for economically justifiable employment are shrinking—but there is no lack of work to be done!

In my province alone there is a whole list of projects that can benefit people, but which cannot be justified as projects for the private business sector of our economy . . . projects that are non-competitive with private business but which could employ great numbers of citizens without any complex training in skills.

Examples? Untrained and semi-illiterate people—and these form the hard-core of that close of one-fifth of our province's population which is on either long- or short-term social assistance—can be employed upgrading by hand the perimeters of the 564 miles of the Trans Canada Highway that crosses our province. The unemployed miners of my own Bell Island could be occupied for another ten years in hewing out a tunnel from their island to the local mainland that would protect the provincial and private investment in this community that was not so very long ago the second largest municipality in the province—protect it by making it an adequate dormitory for those commuting to employment who are at present heavily handicapped by the need to pay for a ferry trip twice daily to their jobs. Reforestation, provincial parks improvements, community and beach clean-ups—all of these could be given a tremendous boost without interfering in any way with the private sector of business except to provide it with customers.

My suggestion, Mr. Chairman, is simply this: that the cost-sharing aid of the Canada Assistance Plan be extended to assisting provincial treasuries to finance crown corporations charged with hiring from among social assistance recipients applicants for work on a selected list of projects which would be reviewed from time to time.

No recipient of assistance would be pressured into accepting such employment, but the opportunity would be there for him to earn well over and above his welfare entitlement at a type of work suited to whatever skills and training he has had, or a type of work where his lack of training would not handicap him from its performance.

Mr. Chairman: our people want work, and want work that they can perform with some sense of competency and self-fulfillment. Today and tomorrow, technological advance in practically every area of business is eliminating the need for those who lack specialized training. Only government can afford to employ such citizens, to create and pay for the kind of work they can do. But my government, that of the Province of Newfoundland, cannot go it alone on such a project. The burden on the provincial taxpayer is already at the limit. We desperately need help, and if we are to cope with the worst kind of poverty of all—the poverty of opportunity, the poorness that prevents a man or woman from soul-saving, face-saving employment—we must have help from a treasury other than our own.

Mr. Chairman and members of this committee: may I solicit your support in a broadening of the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan to include cost-sharing aid not just in maintaining some 20 per cent of our province's population in unproductive idleness but in financing their way to paid employment that will make unique and presently neglected contributions towards improving life for all in your newest province and one which is struggling desperately to escape Cinderella status in our great Canadian family.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, May 12, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we have a quorum and I will call the meeting to order. We have with us today a delegation of the Bar Association of the Province of Quebec and I shall introduce the members to you in a few moments.

On Wednesday we shall have a delegation from the Province of Prince Edward Island. I do not know how they arranged the celebration so quickly, but they will be here. These dates were picked well in advance.

On Thursday we shall hear from one of the oldest missions in Montreal, the Old Brewery Mission. Father McCarthy will be here with them.

Next week we will have the Provinces of British Columbia and Saskatchewan. In the following week—honourable senators might keep this in mind—we will have Ontario on Monday, New Brunswick on Tuesday, Alberta on Wednesday and Manitoba on Thursday. The Thursday meeting may not take place as Manitoba has a new deputy minister. These dates were not ours; they were chosen by the Provincial departments and there was not much we could do about it.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, did you say there will be a meeting tomorrow?

The Chairman: Yes, there will be a meeting tomorrow, to hear the delegation from Prince Edward Island. It will be in Room 256-S.

Honourable senators, the delegation this morning is from the Bar Association of the Province of Quebec. On my right is Mr. Claude Gagnon, Q.C., President of the Bar Association of the province. Next to him is Mr. Michel Robert, member of the Bar, and next to him is Mr. Philip Vineberg, Q.C., the former president.

Mr. Gagnon will speak to you first.

Mr. Claude Gagnon, Q.C., President, Bar Association of the Province of Quebec: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, I would like first of all to express our thanks for your allowing us to appear before you today. As you know, we are not economists or sociologists and we realize fully that we cannot contribute expert knowledge backed by adequate research to most of the questions set out in the guide for the submission of briefs.

Nevertheless, we have considered it our duty to make some contribution to the important work of your committee. We lawyers as ordinary citizens are concerned with the problem of poverty and we are particularly concerned with the plight of the disadvantaged before the courts of law. How can there be a just society if there is not equal justice for all.

Our submission, therefore, would fall under paragraph (m) of section 27 of the guide under the term of "Measures to Assist the Disadvantaged."

Before I ask Mr. Robert to present our brief to you, it would be fair to point out that most judges are just as concerned as we are, and that even when they have to render justice they take extreme care that the disadvantaged get fair treatment in their court.

I think we should also—and the time will come, I suppose—say something of the considerable effort made by the lawyers and members of our Bar in the field of legal aid. At the same time, while we feel that we have made some progress, we all realize that there still remains a lot to be done and the purpose of our coming here today is possibly to bring out some positive aspects of amendments to the Criminal Code, for example, which in our view would be helpful in achieving our goal.

I have with me today Mr. Philip Vineberg who, up to a few days ago, was Batonnier of the Bar of Montreal and who is the Vice-President of the Bar Association of the Province of Quebec. I also have with me Mr. Michel Robert, who is a younger member of the Bar of Montreal. I think it would be proper to say that the younger members of the profession are taking a more and more active part in the administration of our affairs and in the development of our thinking and action. We have welcomed this development wholeheartedly. This is the reason why today we have asked Mr. Robert to present our brief on our behalf. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Robert, Member of the Bar of the Province of Quebec: Mr. Chairman, the Honourable the Members of the Senate, Ladies: It gives me a great deal of pleasure to present this morning the brief of the Bar of the Province of Quebec to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty. Obviously, I do not intend to read this brief which you have studied, or will be studying in the upcoming days, but may I briefly indicate its main points.

First of all, we raise the principle, which is now recognized, of equal justice for all. But this theoretical principle is not being applied completely if the principle of equality of citizens before the administration of justice is not respected. By this I mean, more precisely, that if citizens are not equally represented before the administration of justice, and more particularly, before the courts, before the common law courts, the principle of equality before the law is being poorly applied. In fact, what is to be said of the following example: the Crown is represented by a Crown Attorney whose fees are paid by the state. The Crown Attorney obviously has a police organization at his disposal which enables him to submit the evidence and the person who appears before the court may be a disadvantaged citizen who is not represented by an attorney, who has not obtained the necessary technical advice, and I submit to you that under such circumstances, the principle of equality before the law is being poorly applied. That is why, since 1956, the Bar of the Province of Quebec, have been concerned with a person's right to be represented by an attorney before the courts, regardless of his financial resources and his economic situation.

We believe that it is absolutely vital and important that each citizen be represented by an attorney before the courts, regardless of his financial resources. This is why, in 1956, we inaugurated a legal aid system which has been developing extremely rapidly and which today renders thousands of services, if we may say so, to the people of Quebec. Obviously, we do not claim to have the best system, but we believe that the system we now have adequately meets present needs; however, we cannot say that there is no room for some improvement, and we plan to continue in this field.

Obviously, you will ask us in which areas the federal government can legislate with respect to legal aid. We have not, obviously, studied the constitutional question thoroughly but the Ouimet Report, or the Report of the Canadian Committee on Corrections, has already suggested that the federal government has jurisdiction to legislate with respect to legal aid, on condition that it was limited to the criminal field. Furthermore, the Ouimet Report suggests that it would be unrealistic to have two legal aid systems, one for criminal cases and the other for cases in the civil and other areas of law; I believe that we are in agreement with this observation of the Ouimet Report. However, the federal government can certainly adopt a number of useful measures concerning the second point that we raise in our brief.

The second part concerns criminal legislation. If I may, I will now speak in English.

[Text]

Many modifications could be made to the Criminal Code in order to improve it and to eliminate the principle of equality of citizens before the law and before the courts, particularly concerning the bail system which is now in force in Canada.

Our Criminal Code stipulates that a person being accused either of a crime or of an infraction can be freed if he deposits bail, either through a bond or through a deposit of a certain sum of money. We recommend that all monetary obligations be eliminated from the Criminal Code except for foreign citizens who are here only on a temporary stay and for whom, probably, a deposit of money could be a good measure to ensure such persons appearing again before the courts. We believe, however, that perhaps a stipulation in the Criminal Code permitting the judge to withdraw the passports from the foreign citizens would be more effective than a deposit of money.

We want to eliminate these forms of monetary obligations because we believe that they are discriminatory against the poor people and the disadvantaged. We believe that the system of bail should be modified in order to have two steps in the procedure. The first step would be that the accused would be considered by the judge as admissible or non-admissible to bail. Once that question had been determined, then the accused, if he were deemed admissible to bail, would be freed upon his own promise that he would come back before the court. We also suggest that failure to return before the court should be made an infraction under the Criminal Code punishable by fine or imprisonment. We suggest imprisonment for two years.

We believe that that form of bail would be fairer to all citizens and would not put the underprivileged citizen in the situation where he is kept in jail while waiting for his trial, whereas the person who has money can be freed upon giving bail either in money or by means of a bond.

The third point we stress in our brief is the question of the repression of the exploitation of the underprivileged citizen. It is very difficult to define the notion of exploitation of the underprivileged citizen, but we very well note that certain contracts—either contracts for the sale of real property or contracts of the type that are signed by people in the their homes when buying furniture or other home commodities—are not fair and that the methods used in respect of those contracts are not fair. It is probably impossible to create a crime in the Criminal Code called the exploitation of the underprivileged citizen, because it is too vague and would be unapplicable. But a series of measures could be adopted to take care of the situation. I would not attempt to enumerate all such measures, but I can give you a few examples. For instance, in certain provinces there is legislation called the "cooling-off period". In other words, with respect to a person signing a contract, after the signing there will be a delay of a specified number of hours, either 24 hours or longer, before the sale is considered complete. We would suggest the delay be 72 hours rather than 24 hours.

Also, concerning rates of interest, there is other legislation which we think should be implemented under the federal jurisdiction. Rates of interest should be divulged completely in any sort of transaction.

Furthermore, there is the question of notes being attached to conditional contracts of sale and afterwards being negotiated to a bona fide person.

With respect to such notes attached to conditional contracts of sale the legislation should be modified in order to make sure that the person who takes the note is well aware of the fact that it comes from a sale of merchandise for consumer purposes. I believe that a suggestion or proposition for legislation to that effect has been put forward by the honourable Mr. Basford.

The fourth point that we should like to discuss with you, which we think is very likely the most interesting point in our brief, is the creation of legal clinics in depressed urban areas. Usually poor people instead of going to see lawyers before their problems arise go to see them only after the problems have arisen and the situations have deteriorated to their detriment. Bearing that in mind the junior Bar of Montreal in co-operation with law students has envisaged the creation of a legal clinic in the St. Henri Ward in Montreal. Unfortunately, we do not have any experience on that so far and cannot give you any definite statistics. But, certainly, this formula is very advantageous because, through such clinics we could very likely perform an educational function as well as one in preventive law. In other words, we should try to solve the problems before they arise, because that is the time to solve them.

Moreover, it would also be possible to work in conjunction with other specialists in such fields as rehabilitation, sociology, psychology and social work, because very often along with a legal problem are found other aspects just as important as the legal aspect and requiring team work to solve the problem of the family or to solve the problem of the individual concerned.

Of course, the Bar of Montreal has no objection to this form of clinic, other than for a certain reserve in the sense that if law students are working in this law clinic, we believe they should work under the supervision of members of the Bar so as to ensure that any advice given is given by competent lawyers who are members of the Bar. Of course we do not know the results, but as I said before, we hope that in the near future this will produce what is expected.

So, Mr. Chairman, these are the four main points of the presentation or the brief that we have prepared. There are, of course, other matters which we do not discuss in our brief, and at this stage I would like to add a word on the payment of fines. It has been established by the Prevost Commission in the Province of Quebec that many persons are kept in jail for the simple reason that they do not have the necessary money to pay a fine imposed, whereas a person who has some money can be freed immediately because he has the money to pay the fine. We believe that the stipulations in the Criminal Code concerning the payment of fines are too rigid. We suggest that perhaps payment could be made by instalments. In other words, a person who earns only $68 a week could be given permission by the judge to pay his fine by instalments, and we even suggest that maybe he could give an authorization to his employer to deduct from his pay the amount of the fine in question. That is, of course, if he wishes to do so; if he does not wish to do so, then he is not bound to. The suggestion was also made by the Prevost Report that maybe this person who has no money could be given permission to work for the state for a certain number of days in order to replace the payment of the fine. While we believe that the suggestion is very interesting, it is not very practical for many reasons.

The Chairman: It is not worth a hoot.

Mr. Robert: First of all because of the presence of trade unions in the Civil Service, and I presume that the person being replaced for a few days would not like it, particularly if he loses overtime or other benefits. So, honourable senators, I think that changing the system and permitting the payment by instalments and also adjusting the amount of fines according to the means of the citizen would be a worthwhile measure.

Of course there are many other aspects, but I do not want to be too long, and so I shall stop here.

Thank you very much.

Mr. Philip F. Vineberg, Q.C., Vice-President, Bar Association of the Province of Quebec: Honourable senators, there is one subject I might perhaps mention that derives from the experience of the Bar of Montreal in reference to legal aid. This has grown since its introduction in 1956. Originally it involved on a gratuitous basis contributions on the part of the members of the Bar of Montreal. It is, of course, totally inadequate to meet our requirements. In the process of time we have developed a system of a permanent legal aid bureau. What I want to mention in relation to the federal jurisdiction is the fact that we now have in the Montreal Legal Aid Bureau 14 full-time employees who are lawyers, apart from those in other capacities. In practice, for two reasons, the lawyers who are full-time are predominantly concerned with criminal law. The two reasons are as follows; first of all criminal problems for the underprivileged usually denote urgency, and we are not able in the administration of legal aid to refer an urgent matter to a member of the Bar on the basis that he would have to appear the following morning or on that very day without any advance notice. Secondly, we found that the number of lawyers specializing in criminal law was relatively small by comparison with the needs and demands, and the result has been that the Montreal legal aid system has mostly all of its full-time employees handling criminal cases. The civil law cases are handled on the basis of services by members of the Bar which are spread out on the basis that when called upon to do so, the members must provide legal aid services free of charge.

Last year the Bar of Montreal handled some 3,300 cases on the civil side through the services of somewhat over 1,000 lawyers, none of whom was paid for his work. As Mr. Robert mentioned earlier, the one area of the legal aid that comes within the domain of the federal Government is that of criminal law. We are very much handicapped in the Province of Quebec by inadequate financing of our legal aid system. We want and we need much more legal aid, and we have been inhibited from growing by virtue of the fact that we work under a very limited budget, relatively speaking, in the Province of Quebec. The contribution of the Bar of Montreal was originally 100 per cent, but now except for very small amounts its contribution is in the form of services.

It seems to me that having regard to the federal Government's jurisdiction in criminal law, it might be possible to evolve a system—and I do not want to qualify it or categorize it by any terms such as grants in aid or otherwise—under which some financial contribution might emanate from the federal Government to make possible the needed growth of the legal aid system in the Province of Quebec, especially in the area of criminal law where we have found our greatest need for full-time personnel.

The situation in Ontario has evolved much better, and Ontario is now one of the model systems of legal aid in the world, and it is an ideal system from the Quebec viewpoint because there the situation is that the Government of Ontario is paying all the expenses, and all of the employees both on the civil and criminal side are relatively fully paid by the State. We are very far from that in Quebec, and in those areas of criminal law where legal aid is inadequate, as it is almost everywhere except in Ontario, some consideration might be given by the federal Government to making a contribution which I think might be worthwhile.

The Chairman: You are unique to this extent—you are the first one of the provinces which has ever suggested that the federal Government shall be contributing to the legal aid system in any one of the provinces. All other provinces are spending whatever they can, and they have spent it from their own.

Before starting the questioning, there are three things which I think you need not waste too much time on this morning. The Minister of Justice has a bill prepared dealing with the bail system which will probably be in the house today, tomorrow or the next day. It will also deal with the matter of the fine system as to payment and also the matter of exploitation.

Senator Carter: And promissory notes?

The Chairman: I think the subject of promissory notes will be dealt with in consumer legislation. Those areas need not be dealt with to too great an extent this morning, because we will have that bill before us in due course and there will be ample opportunity for studying it at that time. In any event, I know you are thinking of it but the Minister of Justice was thinking of it too.

Senator Inman: I found a lot of worthwhile information in this brief, and I would like to congratulate the gentlemen who prepared it. My first question is this; do you find it difficult to procure lawyers to give their services in defending these people, and if so, do you find any who give their services free? I believe at one of our hearings we had some young lawyers who said they were glad to do it for the sake of the experience.

The Chairman: That was the same clinic, that has been referred to here. We had Mr. Cooper of the Civil Liberties people here. That is the clinic I think you are referring to.

Mr. Vineberg: It is intended that Mr. Cooper shall have charge of that.

Mr. Gagnon: I think the honourable senator is asking us if we have trouble finding lawyers who will do the work gratuitously. I think our first reply to that is that under our code of ethics, it is derogatory to refuse a case of legal aid in our province. If the batonnier or the president of the legal aid bureau sends a case to a lawyer he is not allowed to refuse it unless, of course, he has some reason why he is disqualified to act in a particular case.

Our experience is that we have to ask our members to do that work because although we wish to have a system as comprehensive as the Ontario system, because of our financial limitations we must do this gratuitous work in order to give proper service. We know there are limitations to that, but so far this is how it has operated.

Senator Inman: On page 9, paragraph 37, you say:

It must be added that important improvements have been made by the Court of Sessions of the Peace, but much progress remains to be made.

Could you suggest any other improvements? You say some have been made, but others need to be made. What have you in mind?

Mr. Robert: The progress which has been made is the following. Instructions were given by the Chief Justice to proceed by way of summons in certain crimes and infractions, and then in these cases it was mandatory for the police authorities to proceed by way of summons, except in very special instances. We believe this does not go far enough. In other words, I think the police probably should proceed by way of summons each time the person has a domicile, has a family, has ties with the community, and then the possibility that he will not appear for his trial is very limited. Then they should proceed by way of summons, because if he does not appear on the summons they could always issue a warrant afterwards. Unless there is danger for the public as such—for example, the danger that the accused will commit another crime while he is being summoned—or unless he has no ties at all with the community, then they could always proceed by way of summons.

Senator Inman: He could leave the country or the province, for instance.

Mr. Robert: Yes, but the statistics show that if a person has certain ties with a community he will hesitate very much before leaving the country. Of course, I am not talking about a foreign citizen or a person having no domicile or no family and being only temporarily, let us say, in Montreal. Then we could proceed by way of warrant in that case.

Senator McGrand: You talk about the foreigner or the outsider, but there are people who commit a crime or do something in Montreal today and they are in Vancouver the next day. Those are transients. Could you apply this system to that type of person?

Mr. Robert: I think the Ouimet Report has suggested a very good modification that should be brought into the administration of justice in relation to this problem. It was found, for example, that a person being accused in the Province of Quebec could obtain bail before a judge there and be free. Then he could go to Vancouver, commit another crime, appear before another court and obtain bail again; and the judge in Vancouver would not be aware that he was already on bail in the Province of Quebec, because there is no central system of information concerning bail being granted or complaints being laid against a citizen.

What Mr. Ouimet has suggested in his report is that a central records bureau be kept somewhere in Ottawa, where all the bails and complaints could be registered so that a list could be established. Then, each time an accused appeared before a judge, the judge could consult the list and see if the accused was already on bail in another province. I think this is probably the measure which is necessary to deal with this specific problem you are mentioning.

Senator Inman: On page 11, section III, this has to do with the exploitation of the economically weak. I am sure we have a great many such people in each province. What efforts has the Quebec Bar made to improve the consumer protection legislation in view of its comments that Quebec seems to have less adequate legislation than other provinces? What has been done to improve this situation?

Mr. Robert: It is difficult to say that Quebec has less adequate legislation. In certain areas, yes; in other areas, no. Let us take, for example, Article 1040A, and following, of the Civil Code, which probably is a very new measure. These provisions give discretion to the judge to reduce the obligations following a loan. For example, if a loan is made at a rate of interest of 24 per cent, a judge in a suit could say, "I consider that this rate of interest is too high, and I reduce it to..." Usually he used to reduce it to 6 per cent, and now it would be to 10 or 11 per cent, but he could reduce it, so I think that this type of legislation is probably more advanced in the Province of Quebec than in other provinces.

The Chairman: How long has it been there?

Mr. Robert: For about two years.

The Chairman: What is it called?

Mr. Robert: It is part of the Civil Code.

The Chairman: Is there not a special name to the act?

Mr. Robert: No, it is not a special act, but is in the form of an amendment to the Civil Code. It requires 60 days' notice for mortgages. In other words, if you do not pay your mortgage in time, then the debtor is given 60 days' notice and he could not waive this notice by the terms of the contract. If he waives it, it is against public order and the stipulation becomes null and void.

In other areas, such as the cooling-off period, we do not have any legislation in the Province of Quebec. I think there is some in Saskatchewan. This measure is excellent and it should probably be adopted in the Province of Quebec.

Certain aspects of it fall under the federal authority and not under the provincial authority. The rate of interest, promissory notes and letters of exchange fall under the federal authority and should be dealt with by federal legislation.

Senator Inman: On page 14, sections 62 to 63, you say:

The Bar equally favours the creation of a group of specialized lawyers in "social law" who could render invaluable services within these legal clinics.

When does the Bar of Quebec expect to set up a group of specialized lawyers to render these services, or do they intend to set up one?

Mr. Robert: This question of specialization amongst lawyers is being debated now in the Province of Quebec, whether we should create a certain certificate of specialists, let us say, where a person is specializing in fiscal law, labour law or civil law. A decision has not been rendered on that aspect, and it will be one of the topics being discussed at the annual convention of the Bar being held on May 22 and 23 in Montreal. But before we decide to set up a system of specialization in law, we certainly want to favour and encourage the specialization de facto—in other words, in fact—of certain lawyers in social laws. Probably it will have to be done through the hiring of these lawyers by governmental agencies, because in private practice a lawyer cannot make his living if he is practising only social law.

Certain trade unions in the Province of Quebec, and more particularly the CNTU, have a few lawyers who have been doing this kind of law work for maybe the past five years, but they are very few. Unfortunately, the government of the Province of Quebec so far has not felt it necessary to hire lawyers to do this specific work, either before the Workmen's Compensation Board or under the Minimum Wage Act before the Minimum Wage Board, and other government agencies. We feel that this should be done in order to develop competence in this field because we must admit that most lawyers in the Province of Quebec, and probably everywhere in Canada, do not know the laws concerning social benefits. When a person inquires of us with regard to their entitlement to benefits from the federal, provincial or municipal authorities, we frequently cannot give advice, because we have not studied the whole matter.

The system is also so complex that it is very difficult for any person to know exactly to what a citizen is entitled, because there is federal legislation, municipal by-laws, and provincial legislation, the criteria for each differing. Old age pension is allowed on certain conditions. Social welfare aid from the City of Montreal has benefits at certain standards related to income. However, there could be disqualification from receiving aid from the Province of Quebec, because the standard is different.

Senator Quart: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say I am very proud of being from Quebec. These gentlemen have not only presented a brief but have made so many suggestions that it is practically impossible for us to question them.

To your knowledge, is the clinic established by the Junior Bar in Montreal the first in Canada?

Mr. Gagnon: I am not sure.

The Chairman: I can assure you that it is not. It is the first one in Quebec.

Senator Quart: I have known this young man since he was knee-high to a grasshopper; that is why it slipped out.

You mentioned that the Junior Bar in Montreal, with the collaboration of law students, would have equal difficulty in being ready to appear. The missing of classes would not matter so much. When this consultative legal clinic is set up in St. Henri, will its services be extended to others wards or restricted to St. Henri?

Mr. Gagnon: Most of the students are fourth year law students who have their law degree and are training at the Bar admission course stage.

A company known as Community Legal Services Incorporated has been formed under part III of the Quebec Companies Act. Its first venture will be at Point St. Charles, but eventually we hope it will develop into something more comprehensive. There is no reason why it should not move out of St. Henri. We are doing the same thing in Quebec City now, and actually discussing a clinic not only with the Bar but with the trade unions. The CSN and CNTU take part in the discussions of a committee which we have set up. We told them that Quebec is not that big and we should get together to ascertain the needs and consider how to proceed.

We hope that very soon we will set up such a clinic probably in the Limoilou or St. Roch area. Monsieur L'Abbé Lavoie is also involved and we consider that all people concerned with this problem should be brought together.

Mr. Vineberg: You made reference to students missing their lectures. As a matter of fact, this particular project is being organized in co-operation with the university, which is even contemplating within the law faculty offering course credits for work in the legal aid clinic. The students in the clinic will be under the surveillance of university professors specializing in this field of law. We anticipate that not only will they be allowed, but encouraged to attend and given credit for some part of their work.

While this is the first outdoor clinic, as it is known, for quite a number of years the legal aid bureau has had regular weekly evenings with services available to the public in Point St. Charles. In other words, it is not a permanent clinic, but every Wednesday night there is someone in attendance for people who do not have time to go downtown to offices.

Senator Quart: It has the blessing of the Bar Association and the universities. It is a wonderful co-operative effort. I am very happy to have such an explanation, because two or three weeks ago it was implied that it was not certain that some underprivileged persons would receive legal aid in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Gagnon: To illustrate the situation, three years ago the government grant to legal aid in Quebec was $50,000. Last year we reached $340,000. I will not refer to it as a budget, but the credits deposited before the last election amounted to $800,000 for legal aid. We feel that that is not sufficient.

Senator Hastings: Is that $800,000 a provincial grant?

Mr. Gagnon: It is provincial. The budget has not been voted yet, but this is the amount in the estimates for the coming year.

Senator Carter: Is this the provincial grant to the Quebec Bar, the Montreal Bar, or all?

Mr. Gagnon: No. The $800,000 is the amount set aside by the provincial government for legal aid throughout the province and will have to be divided.

As an example, Montreal last year received approximately $300,000. The Bar of Quebec on behalf of its sections has filed a budget for the current year. We have estimated the minimum requirements for legal aid as roughly $1,200,000. Even with that amount we know that legal aid in civil matters will continue to be on a gratuitous basis.

The budget for legal aid in Montreal this year was $746,000, which will provide for doubling the number of lawyers from 14 to 28. We realize that we might not achieve that goal this year, but it is an illustration of the direction of our efforts.

Mr. Vineberg: It is not the real, but the requested budget. To draw a comparison, Ontario spends over $7 million a year on legal aid.

The Chairman: Yes, but to draw a further comparison, the prairie provinces, with half the population, spent twice as much money as you did last year.

Mr. Vineberg: It is the same inadequacy to which we refer.

The Chairman: I know, but we have a poverty problem to deal with. The great Bar of Canada, that of the Province of Quebec, agrees the situation is such as not to be adequate.

Mr. Vineberg: No, but we have been complaining about it and we do not miss any opportunity of so doing. We have started on a gradual basis and by knocking on the doors of Quebec we have reached the stage at which we now are.

Mr. Gagnon: There is something that has to be said in all fairness. When one compares our system with the Ontario system, which last year cost $7,400,000, it should be remembered that in Ontario it is—how shall I call it?

The Chairman: The common law system?

Mr. Gagnon: No, it is the private enterprise system. Every lawyer in Ontario who takes a legal aid case is paid, and the tariff is quite adequate. The young lawyers can make more money with legal aid cases than they would if they were out on their own. In Quebec, our permanent lawyers are paid adequate salaries, but nothing in comparison. Therefore, when you compare $800,000 in Quebec with $7,400,000 in Ontario, we should be very careful not to confuse the two, because the Ontario system is much more expensive and pays the lawyers much more.

The Chairman: They have to pay a fair amount of money; it is half the fee or...

Mr. Vineberg: It is 75 per cent.

The Chairman: Three-quarters of the fee. But that is not really the problem. The comparison I made was not with Ontario. I referred to the prairie provinces—Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba—which with British Columbia are spending far more money than you are in your province. You are extending your assistance, as far as my record shows, to Montreal and Quebec, I often wonder what is happening to the other cities in your provinces.

Mr. Vineberg: We have started elsewhere.

The Chairman: When?

Mr. Vineberg: Within the past year. We have now developed certain legal aid operations in the Hull and Saguenay districts, and elsewhere.

Senator Fournier: Not being a lawyer I find it very difficult to accept everything in the brief. It leaves me thinking that all is not rosy in the judicial system of the Province of Quebec. The brief mentions many weaknesses, which apparently they are trying to correct, and for which I give them credit. The Prévost Commission reported three or four months ago, and it was not too well accepted by the Bar of Quebec. I remember reading some articles that appeared to prove what I said about the judicial system not being all rosy. There is lots of room for improvement.

I make this statement as someone who is not a lawyer but as someone who reads the papers and has to pay taxes for all these misfortunes that happen at times. It seems that in some cases our courts have become show places, where justice is eliminated, where 12 jurors, who are selected mostly for their ignorance rather than their ability, have to decide which party has the best lawyer. That is the only thing they can do, and that is why I say that sometimes the courts come to be show places. We read in the papers what is going on in the Province of Quebec and other places, with murder cases and long law suits lasting for years, with appeals, appeals against the appeals, all with the taxpayers' money. So far there has not been too much criticism of the system publicly, but there is a lot of thinking going on in the minds of the people, especially the young people. You, who are members of the Bar, will have read in the newspapers how not long ago in Ottawa a group of young people cursed justice, the lawyers and everything. When we reach that level, there is something wrong somewhere. I do not agree with these young hoodlums, they should not do that; we have to respect our judges and the whole democratic system, but when things reach that level there is something to worry about. That is all I say on that. I am sure you do not agree with me, but that is my personal opinion. I want you to think about it, because I sometimes think that "justice" is a word taken out of books. I make this last remark. I feel sometimes when reading about these things and seeing what is going on in courts, that too much emphasis is put on "my client" and not enough on justice. You have a client and you have some responsibility to defend your client. I understand that. But only up to a limit.

On page 2 of the brief, in paragraph 5, I read:

This principle of equality of citizens before the Law means that the legislator, in the making of its laws...

Would you explain that? To save time I have not read it all.

Mr. Robert: I think it means that when making the laws the legislator, provincial or federal, will not give advantages or privileges to any citizen over and above other citizens. In other words, everybody is equal before the law. In criminal matters especially, every citizen is entitled to the same kind of justice and fairness, whether he be a minister of the Crown or just an underprivileged citizen. This is the principle. Maybe you refer to certain permits or privileges given by the state; to take a classic example, a liquor permit. This is not part of the administration of normal justice in the sense that it is part of the administrative process, and for other reasons some permits are given to certain citizens that are not given to others.

Senator Fournier: You talk about permits. I am confused. I have been in politics long enough to use the word "patronage", of which you are all aware. One has from time to time a regard for one's supporters and gives them privileges. What has the law to do with that? This paragraph in the brief says:

...in the making of its laws, [it] must not afford to one citizen advantages or privileges as regards other citizens.

I would exclude patronage.

Mr. Robert: Certainly, I would exclude it also, because it is not part of the judicial process. It is part of the administration of the state, which is entirely different and separate.

Senator Fournier: When you were talking French you said "l'importance d'être représenté par un avocat"—"the importance of being represented by a lawyer". I go fifty-fifty with you on that. Sometimes there are things going on that I just cannot swallow. After all, justice must exist in our democratic system regardless of how much money you have to pay.

Mr. Gagnon: Perhaps the answer to that might be that we are not thinking specifically of money. Maybe a legal aid lawyer should be there, and then the demand would not pay for the service. Our experience is that, for example, too often in certain quarters the police have prevented someone held under guard from seeking legal advice until the police have completed their investigation. We think this is wrong. We think the liberty of the individual is in jeopardy there. It is not a question whether it is a lawyer or not; we do not think we should be everywhere all the time.

Senator Fournier: I agree. When you say "service free of charge", I maintain there is no such thing as free of charge, somebody is paying somewhere.

Mr. Gagnon: When 1,000 lawyers in the City of Montreal last year handled 3,300 cases, it was free of charge. We have evaluated the services at approximately $3 million, and nothing was paid by anybody.

Mr. Vineberg: It is free of charge to the public, but it is a charge to the lawyers. In other words, the lawyers are paying for it by rendering their services. Very often law firms are paying very heavy expenses and overheads, and they are paying the salaries of some of the men who are doing the work. There are some offices where a high proportion of the time of some of the lawyers is devoted to legal aid and all of the members of the firm are making a contribution by paying the salary and expenses of that particular lawyer. So it is not free of charge in the overall sense that you mean, but it is at the expense of the lawyers and associates who are rendering a service to the public.

Senator Fournier: I want to make that clear, because I think it is a very important point and it is one that should be known to the public. When I, as a member of the public, hear you people say "free of charge" I think that there is somebody in behind the scenes who is paying the bill, either the taxpayer or someone else. This is my feeling and this is a chance to give the right information.

Mr. Vineberg: The lawyers are paying the bill in this particular case. Some law firms have told me that they have figured that they have spent the equivalent of $60,000 a year in legal aid services rendered free of charge to the public and at the expense of the lawyers.

Senator Fournier: I hope that part gets some publicity, because it is not well understood.

The Chairman: What Mr. Vineberg is saying is so evidently true and has been true for a great number of years, except that no one believes this. It establishes one thing, that they need in the City of Montreal about $3 million to properly look after the people who need assistance. We will come to that a little later.

Senator Carter: I would like to follow on from where Senator Fournier finished. Paragraph 6 says that the principle of equality must be accompanied by a concrete possibility of enforcing these rights, and you ask: What use are rights if one is incapable of enforcing them before the tribunals on the same footing as one's neighbour? Would you explain that a little further?

Mr. Robert: We have experienced that where a person is not represented by a lawyer, while the other party is represented by a lawyer, and more particularly before the criminal jurisdiction.

Let us take the following example. The Crown, as I said earlier, is represented by a Crown Attorney. The Crown has also administrative measures to help him to make his case. The police authorities are there to make the case, interview the witnesses, obtain the necessary sworn statements, and send subpoenas to the necessary witnesses.

On the other side, you have another who is an under-privileged citizen. He does not know how to send a subpoena, he does not know how to interview witnesses, he does not know the law, he does not know which defences are admissible and which are not, and very often he is in jail and cannot be in touch with the witnesses in question, and he cannot be in touch with the lawyer. We do not see how the parties are equal before the court in that situation.

On the contrary, we feel that they are completely unequal, the Crown being very well prepared and the accused being in a state where he cannot plead his case and have a fair defense and a fair trial. So we feel that this person has a right to be represented by a lawyer and to be given competent technical advice. From this suggestion we believe that a legal aid system should be established in order to provide every person, independent of his means, with the legal and technical assistance necessary in order that this principle of equality before the two parties in front of the judge be respected fully.

Senator Carter: Are you maintaining that if you provide a poor person with legal services you are making him equal before the law?

Mr. Robert: Let us say that he will be more equal, and less unequal.

Senator Carter: You have enunciated a very firm and strong principle here of equality, "equal justice for all and equality before the law". Let us get right down to the nitty-gritty of it. It is more than just legal aid.

Mr. Robert: Oui.

Senator Carter: If you are going to make a person equal before the law...

Mr. Robert: We agree entirely on that and, of course, we deal with the legal aid aspect because we are concerned more with that aspect than other groups. Certainly, by solving the legal aspect of it we are not solving all the problems. As I said earlier, very often these clinics will reveal it more accurately. Very often when we receive people sent by the legal aid bureau, we realize at the first interview that there is a legal problem but that there is often a psychological problem which we cannot deal with. There is often a problem of administration, I mean financial administration, administration of his own personal budget, and very often we cannot deal with that or can only partially deal with that problem.

It has been my experience, and I think this experience will probably be confirmed by Mr. Vineberg and Mr. Gagnon, that very often after trying to solve their legal problems, we refer these persons to other professionals, either psychologists, marriage counselling centres, or other specialists, where they can have free services for other aspects of their problem.

Senator Carter: To be equal before the law, that should be done before he gets to the law, rather than afterwards. It should be done before he comes before the judge.

Mr. Robert: The legal aid system is only one of the measures to provide this kind of equality. It is not the only one and it certainly is not the most important one.

Senator Carter: You told us you had a budget of $1,200,000 for the whole Province of Quebec. That would be divided among how many legal aid branches or centres?

Mr. Gagnon: Roughly speaking, as matters stand now, twelve, because there are twelve sections of our Bar and normally this would be set up on the same basis.

Senator Carter: How far would that permeate out into the province?

Mr. Gagnon: It should cover the whole provinces.

Senator Carter: It should cover the whole province.

Mr. Gagnon: Mind you, outside Quebec and Montreal, they have just started to organize legal aid on a permanent basis. They have done legal aid. For example, I was in Chicoutimi three weeks ago and I met a lawyer who had spent the two previous days on legal aid, but there was no legal aid bureau which told him to do it. Yet he spent two whole days on legal aid.

This $1,200,000 is a start. I think even the Department of Justice in Quebec is quite sensitive to the problem and they feel that they should double the budget. Of course, I am talking off the record now, because this is not official policy, but this is what I have been told. They want to raise the amount of money put at the disposal of legal aid to something like $4 million. When we reach that level, something very important will be done.

Senator Carter: You told the committee that in Montreal about 1,000 lawyers handle 3,300 cases, worth about $3 million. These, I take it, were all civil cases.

Mr. Vineberg: I am sorry, senator, there should be a correction in those figures. Our estimate is not $3 million on the Montreal side; that would be closer to $1 million, and not $3 million. But we are dealing exclusively, or almost exclusively, with civil cases.

Senator Carter: Of these 3,300 civil cases how many have to do with litigation under the welfare acts or various social assistance acts?

Mr. Vineberg: I don't have the statistics in front of me. I would say that a large proportion of these cases have to do with domestic troubles, husband-wife difficulties, alimony, separation and related problems. Others have to do with landlord and tenant disputes, customer credit and so forth. The question you ask about is not so much a matter that is dealt with by lawyers in cases because very seldom is it necessary to make a legal intervention. When it comes to social welfare, that is resolved largely by communicating with administrative officials or making other representations rather than instituting proceedings.

When we speak of 3,000 odd cases we mean cases in court. In addition to those 3,000 cases there are literally tens of thousands of interviews where it suffices to see the people once and tell them that if they address themselves to this and that government department they will get their answer from them. We don't include that in our list of cases because that is not a law suit.

Senator Carter: Unless you have the litigation under the Social Assistance Act or whatever act you have for dealing with that, how do the rights of the individual become established? How are these interpreted?

Mr. Vineberg: When you come to what I believe you were discussing, the rights are incontestable. It is only when they have to be found and asserted that there is any problem. There would not be any contestation of their rights themselves. You only have to indicate what the rights are and they would get them. It is just that they are unaware of them and have to institute some proceedings, not of a legal nature, in order to make a claim. That is all that is required.

The Chairman: If you compare a man from Hull with a man from Ottawa, both having the same number of children of the same ages and, you will see that there is quite a difference. The man from Hull comes to us to complain. He receives $100 less a month by way of welfare than his counterpart in Ottawa. The man in Hull asserted his rights time after time but no one paid any attention. That is what Senator Carter is getting at. It is not enough merely to assert your rights; it is necessary to establish the rights. What have you people done about that?

Mr. Vineberg: It is necessary for you legislators to make the law under which the rights can be established. If the law were to provide a greater amount than the person was getting, he could institute a claim. If the legal redress is more limited in Hull than in Ottawa, that is another matter.

The Chairman: There is no question of legal redress. Authorities do not pay any attention to the law. The law says that under the Canada Assistance Act you must meet the needs. The definition of need on one power is one thing; the definition of need on the other power seems to be another thing entirely. Somebody should establish the need in a legal sense.

Mr. Vineberg: Yes.

The Chairman: Nothing much has been done either in Ontario or in Quebec about establishing that need. As a matter of fact, I don't think anything of consequence has been done in any other place in Canada. Ontario has had two cases in the courts on establishing the need, but nothing has been done in Quebec by any member of the Bar or in most of the other places with the exception of British Columbia which has had a few cases. That is what Senator Carter is getting at.

Mr. Gagnon: I don't know whether this is any answer to the problem, but there is an act in Quebec called the Social Assistance Act providing for an appeal to a commission. I am not sure whether that act has been passed by the House in Quebec.

The Chairman: That comes under the Canada Assistance Act which provides for appeal. The only province in Canada that has not invoked that is the province of Quebec. Every other province has the appeal procedure. Quebec told us they were too busy so that recently we have left them alone. Apparently they have had problems of their own. But it is the only province that has not got the appeal procedure. I don't think it is fair to say that these appeals are vital but at least they give the recipients the opportunity to go beyond the local people. That new proceeding is covered under the Canada Assistance Act.

Mr. Vineberg: I am not aware of any specific case dealing with this crucial question of the basic right as between the state and the individual that has been handled by legal aid within the past year.

Senator Carter: Then you don't have equality before the law.

Mr. Vineberg: The fact that there has been no case does not mean there is no right to have such a case. I do know that there has been discussion that if the occasion arises proceedings of this type will be instituted. I am not aware of any instance where it was felt that it was necessary to do so.

Senator Carter: In your brief you started out talking about certain rights, and I suggest that there is no use having those rights unless you can enforce them. I am suggesting that the poor man does not have equal rights before the law if there has been no legislation of the legislation which affects his rights and if there has been no interpretation of his rights under these laws. So this is all part of the equality of justice and the equality of citizens under the law. If that is missing, then your equality is lacking too.

Mr. Vineberg: I could give you an illustration which has arisen in the Montreal district. We received a number of requests for legal aid from persons who had been arrested in the far north. They were Eskimos. The legal aid bureau felt immediately that the process of dragging the Eskimos from the remote areas where they were located and bringing them to Montreal and subjecting them to trial in Montreal was very unfair. It would impose hardships on them because it would be impossible for them to prepare defence or to have witnesses or anything else. In two cases the legal aid representative invoked the argument that as a matter of principle people from the far north should not be subjected to this procedure and should not be tried in the Montreal courts, but that there should be some proper organization to deal with their jurisdictional problems in their own area. As a result of that there were two consecutive judgments by judges in Montreal affirming the proposition that it was a wrong procedure and that the Eskimos should not be so handled. The department thereupon announced that it would no longer continue that practice. So there is an example of a principle being compared with an actual dispute between individuals.

Mr. Gagnon: There is another excellent example. About six weeks ago there was a problem in Shawinigan concerning a number of people having signed contracts for correspondence courses. It was felt that these people had signed under tremendous, undue pressure, and a body called the ACEF got involved and asked the help of the Bar. They said they had about 100 of these cases and that they felt something should be done about it, that these people were not wealthy and that unless the Bar helped them they would not be able to go to court and fight it out. Well, the legal aid bureau of Montreal took over those cases and they will fight out their cases on their behalf on the basis of legal aid, which means, of course, that it will be free of charge to them.

The Chairman: What you have done is splendid, but why was it done by the Bar of Shawinigan instead of Montreal? Those people should have been able to have their problem dealt with in Shawinigan without having to Appeal to the Bar in Montreal.

Mr. Gagnon: I don't wish to say anything against Shawinigan, but there is a reason for it. So far as local problems are concerned, there are very few lawyers remaining in Shawinigan. There were very few practising there before, and now some of them have been appointed judges.

Mr. Vineberg: Mr. Chairman, they are practically all judges in Shawinigan.

Senator Sparrow: You would think with so many lawyers being appointed judges in Shawinigan that there would be a great influx of lawyers to that area.

Mr. Gagnon: At any rate, in order to get the proper assistance to these people we felt we should help out and we did so. The Department of Justice became involved and asked if the Bar could do something. In response to that we opted for the solution we thought was the proper one, the one that would get the best results. Perhaps if Shawinigan had had a permanent legal aid bureau set up they could have handled it themselves. However, they do not have one and so we did it for them. That may be only the second best solution, but it is the best one in the circumstances.

Now, one of the problems of the legal profession is trying to give good service to remote areas. Other professions have the same difficulty. Doctors have the same problems and so do many other professionals.

Mr. Robert: If I may add something on this question, there is a certain amount of litigation concerning social welfare, and the claim is being made by citizens addressed to different agencies. If I may take one example that I know of and that is concerning the Workmen's Compensation Board. The Workmen's Compensation Board will refuse or will agree to give certain assistance to a person according to the act. The legislation provides for a petition being sent to the Board asking for a review of the decision rendered by the civil servant who has refused a grant, or for an increase in the amount of money granted, or to get assistance when assistance has been refused. In certain cases, and I have experience in these matters, where people were dealt with in this fashion, assistance was given after a petition was made before the Board and evidence was presented before the Board. Unfortunately, the legislation, generally speaking, does not provide mechanisms to make an appeal from the decision of the civil servant or of the agency giving the aid, and I think we are ready to admit that the state of the administrative law as far as social welfare is concerned is not very well advanced, and many mechanisms should be set up within these agencies to provide the right for the citizen to make sure that his rights are recognized, and to permit lawyers acting for the citizen before these agencies to make sure that aid is properly given, because unfortunately the legislation does not provide too many mechanisms.

Senator Carter: In your brief you say that legal aid was established in Montreal in 1956. That is 15 years ago now. It seems to have had rather a slow growth, why is that?

Mr. Vineberg: It started off very slowly and was financed exclusively by the Bar of Montreal. In other words, 100 per cent of the costs of legal aid in 1956 was borne by the lawyers. We had no full-time lawyers at all; it was all done on a gratuitous basis. Now it is quite correct that it has moved slowly, but I might say that the pace of growth has accelerated in the last few years. We are pressing, we are anxious and we have importuned the Government to be allowed to double our operation in the next few years. So that, with a slow start, we are now moving more quickly at the present time.

Senator Carter: If I might project that into the future, do you have plans to expand if you get double your budget?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes, we certainly have.

The Chairman: If legal aid was established, as you say, in 1956, how do you explain the fact that in 1969 the Prevost Commission recommended that you establish legal aid? Would he not have known about this?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes. As a matter of fact one of the recommendations of the Montreal Legal Aid Bureau is reproduced in detail, word by word, in the Prevost Commission report where it refers to the evolution of the Montreal legal aid system. What he points out is that with the exceptions of Montreal and Quebec City, there was practically no legal aid throughout the rest of the province, and his report recommended that it be expanded throughout the province.

Senator McGrand: Going back to this equality before the law or before the courts, assume an offender is brought before the court in order that justice may be done either to him or to someone against whom he has committed a crime. Now the Crown prosecutor is not in the court to seek vengeance; he is there in the interests of justice. That is what our courts are for. Now, in the case of a man who is charged with an offence and cannot afford to provide himself with a lawyer, why is it not the responsibility of the Crown to see that this man does get justice rather than being hanged by the neck until dead, or something of that kind?

Mr. Robert: It is to a certain extent the responsibility of the Crown to see that justice be done because, as you said, the Crown prosecutor is not there to win a case. He is there to see that justice shall be done and of course it is also the responsibility of the judge to see that justice is done. Very often, at least in the Province of Quebec, the judge will be more careful when the accused is not represented by a lawyer to see that everything is properly done. On the other hand, the judge or the Crown prosecutor cannot gather the materials necessary for the defence of the person who is accused because this would be in conflict with their mandate as Crown prosecutor and judge respectively and furthermore if the judge were to participate in the preparation of the case for the accused, he would lose his impartiality. So, it is necessary that there should be a lawyer acting for the accused who could gather the material, the documents and the witnesses to give a full defence.

Senator McGrand: But the Crown prosecutor does not go around looking for evidence. That is done by the police, and while the police are gathering evidence for the Crown, they are also gathering evidence that could be used for the defence.

Mr. Robert: And often they do not give this evidence to the defence. This is our experience. It may not be the ideal situation, but is a fact of life.

Senator McGrand: While there is this principle of equality before the law, two faces of it are presented, is that correct?

Mr. Vineberg: Well, senator, I think we have all been brought up under the adversary system, and lawyers will do their best to make the best case they can for their clients anticipating that the opposition will do the same thing. It is not unlike the parliamentary system where those on the Government bench will put their best foot forward on behalf of the Government and will in every possible way support Government legislation, while the opposition will do its utmost to find fault and all the defects they can.

Senator Inman: Could I ask a supplementary question to that? In a criminal case, cannot the Crown appoint a lawyer for the defence?

Mr. Vineberg: The judge can.

Mr. Gagnon: The judge will do so. This is one way of going about it, but again the judge will say "this man has no lawyer. You there, come and defend him." That is not the best way, but it is one of the ways it is done.

The Chairman: I think in fairness we should say that in a serious criminal matter, the accused can almost name his lawyer and he will be asked to represent him. He can name the best lawyer in Montreal or Toronto for his defence. Mr. Martin, Mr. Sedgwick and Mr. Arnup are three of the top men in Toronto and they have all been called from time to time to defend persons on serious criminal charges. The same thing is true in Montreal and, indeed, across Canada.

Senator Fournier: What makes one good and another not good when they are working under the same legislation and have the same books?

The Chairman: Who knows? There are many influences.

Senator Fournier: That is what the public do not understand. If you have a good lawyer, you win your case and if you have a poor lawyer, you are lost.

Senator McGrand: Going back to the question of bail, I remember last year a prisoner escaped from Dorchester Penitentiary, and while they were beating around the bushes near Dorchester Penitentiary looking for him for 24 hours, he was arrested in Toronto on a drug charge. Apparently he had got into LSD and had got into trouble and when they arrested him, they found that this was the man who escaped. This is why I mention bail.

These people who are rather elusive characters can get across Canada in no time. That is why I brought that up. Do you want to say something about that?

Mr. Gagnon: I think this is quite true. Every case has to be looked at on its merits, and maybe you would say to me, "This is all right, but you people keep the man in jail for two or three weeks before making up your mind whether he should be allowed bail or not." I think the answer to that is that the courts should have at their disposal investigators and trained people who could easily advise the court as to the aspects which Mr. Robert has discussed—whether he has a family, whether he has a stable job, etcetera. If he is a known criminal, that is another problem too, but then the investigator would look up his record and tell the judge, "Well, you have got to be careful of this man. You might find this man in Toronto on LSD."

Senator Hastings: I would like to discuss section 14 on page 4, where you say:

It would be relatively simple for the State to retain the services of the aggregate of lawyers and to assign them to the defence of citizens before the courts. This structure however entails such disadvantages that the role of the attorney becomes impossible.

Why does it become impossible?

Mr. Robert: Because of the three reasons mentioned in paragraphs 15 and 16.

The first reason is that the attorney or the lawyer acting for a person must be completely independent. If he is working for the state or is an employee of the state and is defending a citizen against the state, there will be internal conflict of mandate which, in our opinion, will not produce the best result.

Secondly, the lawyer is receiving confidential information, and the relationship between lawyer and client must remain privileged. If he is working for the state this information will be in the state's files or in his office files. Again, we also believe that this principle of confidential information will not be respected.

The third aspect is freedom of choice. If the state hired all lawyers and assigned them to the people of the state, then it would become necessary for the state to organize the distribution of services. In other words, certain lawyers would be assigned to District "A" and other lawyers to District "B," etcetera.

Then it would become impossible for the citizen to choose freely his lawyer, and it would become impossible for the lawyer to choose freely his client. Again, we believe this third principle would not be respected and would not produce the best results. I think it is more or less a necessary implication of a real, democratic society.

Senator Hastings: When the Crown appoints the defence for a man charged with murder, you are saying it is impossible.

Mr. Robert: The appointment is not made by the Crown; the appointment is made by the judge.

Senator Hastings: Representing the Crown.

Mr. Robert: No.

Senator Hastings: Well, he is paid by the Crown.

The Chairman: By the state.

Mr. Robert: He has an independent status which is very special. He is appointed under an act which provides for a salary, and his appointment can only be revoked under the federal system by impeachment, which has never been done, to my knowledge. For provincial judges, their appointment is revoked by the Lieutenant-Governor in Council after inquiry and advice from the Court of Appeal, which has never been done in the past. So, they have a certain independent status which is not given to other civil servants. That is why I think their impartiality is guaranteed by their life appointment and by their status, and I think that is why they can make an independent decision.

Mr. Vineberg: In our province the judge does not usually name the lawyer, but refers this problem to legal aid, and the legal aid bureau makes the appointment. The judge does not usually ask Mr. "X" or a particular lawyer to handle a particular case, except very rarely where there are no legal aid personnel available.

Senator Hastings: Yes, but the defence attorney is paid by the Crown for defending the criminal.

Mr. Vineberg: Paid by the Crown?

The Chairman: Paid by the state.

Mr. Vineberg: You mean because there is legal aid?

Senator Hastings: No, I am saying that if I am charged with murder this morning and I need a lawyer, the judge will appoint my lawyer for me and the state will pay for my attorney.

Mr. Vineberg: In that system where the judge designates a lawyer, he is usually not paid at all.

The Chairman: No, Senator Hastings is perfectly right. Let us take what you call the ideal system in the Province of Ontario. It is the ideal system.

Mr. Vineberg: We do agree, and the Prevost Commission considered it the ideal system.

The Chairman: I did not read the Prevost Commission report, but I know it is the ideal system, knowing some other systems. In that case the legal system will say, "Who do you want?" And the individual says, "I want so-and-so." He is appointed and is paid in a serious matter. In that case, is not that the basis of equal justice?

Senator Hastings: That is the point I am making.

Mr. Vineberg: In the Ontario system he is not paid, at least in the first instance, by the state, but by a relatively autonomous organization administered by the Bar.

The Chairman: Except that the money comes from the state.

Mr. Vineberg: Yes.

Mr. Gagnon: Maybe, Mr. Chairman, there is a difference, and it might not only be a word, because, as Mr. Justice Bora Laskin said, "Let us not quarrel over words but look at the substance." I think there is a large difference between a lawyer who is an employee of the state and a lawyer who receives money from the state through the Bar which is subsidized by the Government.

Senator Hastings: Does it have to go through the Bar?

Mr. Gagnon: The lawyer retained is independent and the Bar will never interfere and has no interest in interfering with what lawyers legally do. They would not look into the file; this is confidential. As President of the Bar of Quebec, if I wanted to stick my nose in a legal aid file, the lawyer could say—Well, I will not put it the way I thought of it, but he would tell me to go somewhere else. I could not go and look at that file, even if I wanted to. At the present time the Bar receives money from the state for that particular purpose.

Senator Hastings: It seems to me the arguments you are using here are quite familiar and I have heard them before from physicians when we discussed Medicare.

Mr. Gagnon: Well, maybe.

Mr. Vineberg: Does it mean because they were alleged by physicians they were not good?

Mr. Gagnon: I had better consult my doctor!

Mr. Robert: I think the source will be always the state; I agree with that. But I think the form of the payment is very important. In other words, if you have a permanent employee of the state who is a lawyer and who could be promoted in the future, there is a difference between this lawyer and a lawyer in private practice receiving a sum of money predetermined by a tariff for doing a specific task, as in the legal aid system. Then I think that he remains completely free, but if he is a permanent employee, paid by the state on a salary basis, with all the implications that that system has, then he is no longer as free as he was, and I think the services rendered the population would not have the same force or quality.

Mr. Vineberg: Within that same area, senator, we have been asked a question, in the Bar of Montreal in relationship to the new court house being erected in Montreal, as to facilities for the legal aid bureau. They had projected that possibly the legal aid bureau could be installed in the new court house and, of course, the accommodation would be very superior in physical terms, but we took the position opposed to it, because we felt that to ask those people who would be obtaining legal aid to go to the court house would be to convey the motion to them of a duality of both the attack and the defence, and psychologically it would not be desirable to ask them to present themselves at the court house to look for a lawyer. We would be much better off having accommodation elsewhere, although undoubtedly it would be inferior.

Senator Hastings: You mentioned the figure of 3,300 civil cases handled by 1,000 lawyers.

Do the 14 in the legal aid bureau handle criminal cases?

Mr. Vineberg: Most of them, but not all, are criminal.

Senator Hastings: How many cases did those lawyers have last year?

Mr. Vineberg: It would be thousands. We have a report containing the figures, which we would be happy to forward to you.

Senator Hastings: Would you describe how the legal aid system operates in Montreal at the present time, with reference to the bureau and its 14 lawyers?

Mr. Vineberg: We have an office close to Place d'Armes, which is within three or four minutes walk of the courthouse. The 14 full time lawyers are there in addition to a staff of secretaries, switchboard operators, file clerks and other administrative personnel. We have tried to augment the staff with social workers, but we are in the very early stages.

Applicants address themselves to legal aid through a variety of channels. We have found that whenever there is publicity regarding legal aid, such as on television, the number of applicants invariably increases. Referrals to legal aid are made by the courts and other lawyers. Aid is made available through the clinic in Point St. Charles. In addition to this a large number of referrals are made by social agencies.

The applicant's case is reviewed and analysed to ascertain that it is a legal question and how it should be handled.

Criminal cases, in which the applicant may have to appear in court the next day, are matters of the greatest urgency.

In all instances an examination is made as to qualifications for legal aid with respect to financial circumstances. However, the criteria for this are not very exacting, nor do we have the opportunity to make a very detailed test. We consider it would be impracticable to do so. We cannot decide that a person earning X dollars is not entitled to legal aid. In some circumstances he may have a wife and seven children, or no family responsibilities whatsoever. Therefore we have general and not very precise provisions. An applicant for legal aid is very rarely disqualified.

If it is a matter that can be dealt with by a mere inquiry, it is handled on the spot by one of the local lawyers. If this cannot be done, in a civil case we will delegate a lawyer in town to deal with it. By means of a rotation system we call upon individual lawyers, of which there were over 1,000 last year. The lawyers will then institute or defend a lawsuit. They are not entitled to compensation except to the extent that they have incurred out-of-pocket expenses for court writs and so on. We have even provided that they are not entitled to taxi fare or incidental expenses of that type.

A case may last for a week, a year, or two or three years. They are of all types although, as I have indicated, a very large part has to do with matrimonial relations and troubles of that type. We have been criticized for not taking certain cases. However, we do not have the facilities to act for the plaintiff in a divorce proceeding. There is no moral judgment involved.

We do not normally take a case involving a claim in damages arising from an automobile accident, because our laws have now been relaxed to the point where lawyers are permitted to take a case where the compensation is partly determined by the results. If it is a valid case, the lawyer will take it and be able to charge depending on the results.

By exception, however, where an individual has no resources with which to retain a lawyer we will proceed. Also by exception, where a person has started a case, paid for it, exhausted his funds and perhaps lost the case, in exceptional cases we have taken appeals where matters of principle were involved or there appeared to be a grave injustice.

Appeals are very expensive. We sometimes have to spend as much as $3,000 just to print the record to go to appeal. Expenditures of that magnitude are not made as a matter of course.

Through the 14 full time staff and with the entire Bar in Montreal available to be called upon, we do the best we can, which I am the first to admit is far from adequate.

Senator Hastings: You have described three methods of referral. However, a man already in jail and appearing in court this morning has no contact with you first.

Mr. Vineberg: If he is already in jail he is interviewed there.

Senator Hastings: Before he appears this morning?

Mr. Vineberg: He is interviewed as soon as we are aware of the need for legal aid.

Senator Hastings: How does he get to you?

Mr. Vineberg: He is usually told by someone in the courthouse that he can call on legal aid and he usually does.

Senator Hastings: I find that they are not told that though.

Mr. Gagnon: There is a problem there, but in Quebec I know that every morning in social welfare court and the criminal court there is a legal aid lawyer present.

Mr. Vineberg: We do the same in Montreal.

Mr. Gagnon: The lawyer in attendance will appear for him, plead not guilty and inform the court that he will discuss the case with his client. In this event the case is remanded or bail given.

Mr. Robert: The judge will have the accused arraigned and ask him if he has a lawyer. If he has not the judge will have him returned to the cells where the legal aid lawyer interviews him.

Senator Hastings: We have had witness after witness from the poor maintain that their rights have been abrogated by the state with respect to their home by search without warrant, arrest and detention. Have any of the 3,300 cases and the others you have referred to been against the state with respect to the rights of the individual?

Mr. Robert: Not of the 3,300 cases, because they were civil. Certainly in our experience of criminal matters, very often the police will detain someone for what they call enquiries, without laying a charge against that person. The Bar of Quebec, when it made its submission to the Prévost Commission, said that we violently opposed any kind of measure called by the police "detention for enquiries". We certainly disagree with any actions taken by the police authorities in that respect. Either the man is guilty of something and should be arrested, accused and appear immediately, or as soon as possible, before a judge, and be given bail if he deserves it...

Senator Hastings: I agree, but have you instituted any proceedings on behalf of any individual against the state for unlawful detention?

Mr. Gagnon: On legal aid I do not know, but I know there are cases, not many, in Montreal.

Mr. Robert: Action in damages against the police authorities and against the state for illegal arrest.

Mr. Gagnon: Unjustified arrest.

Mr. Robert: Unjustified arrest and illegal detention, and many of these cases were won.

Senator Hastings: Have you instituted any under legal aid?

Mr. Robert: No.

Mr. Gagnon: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Robert: Let us say that the presence of legal aid lawyers has probably effected a change in the mentality, and also the fact that the Prévost report was submitted to the government has slightly changed the attitude towards the police authorities.

Senator Hastings: I appreciate that the attitude is changed, but I find it strange that in the last year your legal aid bureau has no instituted proceedings against the state in any cases.

Mr. Vineberg: We are defending the individual against the state when we appear in criminal courts. I cannot say I know of any cases in which we have taken other action against the state.

Mr. Gagnon: Maybe the Director of Legal Aid can tell you, but I say in all truth that I do not know of any personally. There may be cases.

The Chairman: That is the truth; there are no cases. We have made enquiries to ascertain. There were only three cases in the whole country, two in Ontario and one in British Columbia. Quebec just has not had any, to date.

There are two or three matters that have arisen before the committee. When we heard the evidence of the Legal Aid Clinic from Quebec, I got the impression from Mr. Cooper, the young lawyer, that they were just starting, that they had not really done anything at all, that it was in its embryonic stage.

Mr. Vineberg: That is true of Mr. Cooper's activities. He is actually a "stagiaire", a fourth year law student, hoping and expecting to pass his bar exams within a couple of months. It is he who has been engaged in taking charge of the Legal Aid Clinic in Pointe St. Charles, of which the Batonnier spoke a while ago. That is a special outdoor clinic in which he has been interested. It was perhaps that work that he was speaking of, or just beginning.

The Chairman: Not the legal aid system as it exists at the present time in Montreal?

Mr. Vineberg: Oh no.

The Chairman: Who is the head of that?

Mr. Vineberg: Emil Colas is the head of the Montreal Legal Aid Bureau.

The Chairman: Who is the head in Quebec?

Mr. Vineberg: Roger Thibodeau.

Mr. Gagnon: A former partner of Mr. Justice Pigeon.

The Chairman: When does he get appointed to the bench?

Mr. Vineberg: His name has been mentioned.

Mr. Gagnon: I am sure he would like to have the answer to the question!

The Chairman: You spoke of 3,300 cases. I know what you are talking about. The history of legal aid in the United States is that it costs them about $11 a case. That is the normal cost the state is put to in a given number of cases; that is the California result and the New York result. I do not know what the Ontario result is; I cannot tell you that offhand. In the light of that, 3,300 cases do not seem to be very many, do they?

Mr. Vineberg: I do not think you can draw a comparison from the statistics, for this reason. I have seen some of these estimates of so much a case and the like. When we speak of 3,300 cases, we mean the number of cases involving court proceedings. We do not mean that many legal aid problems. Only a relatively small percentage of legal aid consultations result in actual proceedings before the courts. That is for a number of reasons. In some instances it is found that there is no legal problem at all; it is rather a medical, psychological or social welfare problem, or somebody just wants to complain about the situation; but there is no problem of a legal nature. In other cases it is an administrative matter that must be referred to some government department.

In some other cases it is only a question of consultation, which can be handled on the spot. We do not cover any of these when speaking of 3,300 cases. We do not cover the situation when somebody comes in wanting advice about whether he must pay the landlord the rent, or whatever his problem is.

We are discussing the situation where there are court proceedings. I can assure you that the costs of these court proceedings are ever so much more than anything like $11 a case. Many legal aid cases involve perhaps appearances for relatively minor offences before municipal courts, and believe the $11 figure involves computations based on that. That is not handled by the civil section at all, and is not within their competence.

The Chairman: The $11 is the overall total cost.

Mr. Vineberg: The 3,300 cases we are dealing with involve a cost per unit—I have not the figure, but I am quite confident about it—of quite a few times $11.

The Chairman: Yes, I gather that.

Mr. Gagnon: The 3,300 cases farmed out are only a very small part of what legal aid is doing. There is consultation with all criminal work. With all deference to you, Mr. Chairman, I have checked the figures in the States; the Prévost Commission deals with that, and I find that the lowest overall cost in Los Angeles is $11.

The Chairman: That is right.

Mr. Gagnon: If you look at the whole American picture you will see that it goes as high as $32 and $40 per file. Boston is more expensive and so on. We dealt with that specific problem in December when we had a meeting with the Prévost Commission and the Department of Justice. $11 is the lowest figure in America.

The Chairman: Yes, that is quite so, but we are talking about poor people receiving assistance. We try to give it to them as cheaply as efficiently as possible.

Mr. Gagnon: I agree.

The Chairman: That is the best system I can think of. I think Mr. Robert made the point in answer to Senator Hastings that if "people's protectors" were established in the same way that we have crown attorneys, they would not be completely independent. I could not quite understand why a crown attorney can be completely independent and a people's attorney could not be independent.

Mr. Gagnon: I would say in answer to that that a crown attorney is not completely independent. Of course, his duty is to see that justice is done. He is not there to get a conviction, but I would seriously question his complete independence. He receives orders from the Department of Justice, although not on the way he should handle evidence. I do not think he is an independent man. I think the defender should be independent.

The Chairman: You have just shaken my faith in justice—for the President of the Bar to indicate that the crown attorney is not an independent man. If he is carrying out his duties, how could you conceive that?

Mr. Gagnon: It all depends on the point of view. If you think I am saying that the man should direct his case according to instructions received from the Minister of Justice, I think it would be terrible.

The Chairman: That is what I thought you said.

Mr. Gagnon: No, this would be terrible, but at the same time the Department of Justice may say: "You lay a complaint in that case".

The Chairman: That is administrative, and has nothing to do with justice in itself. I am talking about the broad independence. We are talking about the people's defender—that is what Senator Hastings was talking about—and comparing him to the Crown Attorney. I will carry it one step further. The Americans have made the most progress in social law of any place in the world, in the interpretation of social law, because they have taken cases up to the Supreme Court of the United States, and they have had some decisions. They have used the people's advocate. I have never seen a question raised about the independence there, and I have always been under the impression that they did an excellent job. They have given their poor people far better representation than we have in any place in Canada.

Mr. Vineberg: Except Ontario.

The Chairman: Yes, except perhaps Ontario.

Mr. Gagnon: I think Ontario certainly is doing a marvellous job, but it has its problems too.

The Chairman: Several million dollars have been spent in Ontario, but as an Ontario citizen I could not care less how much they spent as long as they give the service and that is their feeling. I am not suggesting that the provinces are not doing their job. As I see it. You find Nova Scotia spending $50,000 and Manitoba spending $160,000 and Saskatchewan $200,000, and British Columbia a couple of hundred thousand dollars, and Alberta a quarter of a million dollars. You have to realize that in Quebec, with your population, you have got more poverty there, percentage-wise, than any of the other provinces has. So you have a real problem. We find that problem, as the witnesses come before us. Mr. Robert, who is a lawyer, has said that nobody knows what the social law is on this. He is quite right in what he is saying, but the people coming before us know a great deal less, they do not even know what to look for, and they come to us and ask what their rights are. It is hard for us to tell them what their rights are. What are their rights? What are you lawyers doing about making sure that these poor people have their rights protected so that you do not get another Prévost report—which did not do you much good, as you know.

Senator Inman: I would like to ask about housing disputes between landlord and tenant. Does legal aid handle that?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes, there has been quite a few.

Mr. Gagnon: I have had some myself, personally.

The Chairman: Those would be real ones, that get into landlord and tenant legislation.

Senator Carter: You have 14 full-time lawyers, employed by Legal Aid. Are they lawyers who have come to you straight out of college, or are they lawyers who have started practice and have given up their practice for this work?

Mr. Vineberg: There is no single answer to that, except that they are by no means lawyers who have come to us straight out of college, because we prefer lawyers with at least some experience. We do have lawyers at different ranges. The head of the Legal Aid Bureau is a lawyer who would have about 35 years of practice and there would be other lawyers who would have 25 or 30 years of practice. It is true that, in the main, the Legal Aid personnel are recruited from younger lawyers, but that is not exclusively true. We have a representation of lawyers of different ages.

I may say that we had difficulty in our recruiting policy. It is not always easy to get the man we want for legal aid work. We try to achieve some kind of balance. We do not like to take, in the main, students who are just out of college and have had no experience. We like lawyers to have some experience before they come to legal aid. But we are prepared to take lawyers with very little experience, and we also use stagiaires—that is, students in the fourth year—who can do a great deal of work by making routine appearances in courts, arguing certain motions, visiting prisoners in jail, and so on.

Senator Carter: What is the turnover in your staff?

Mr. Vineberg: We have had problems. I would say that in the last year or so we lost perhaps two or three.

Senator Carter: For the most part they stay with you and make a sort of career out of it?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes, some of them have. Of course, we have not been operating long enough to say that. Recently, we lost through death one of our men who had been with us for a long period of time.

Senator Carter: You paid a very high tribute to the legal aid system of Ontario, and our chairman agreed. Everything is topnotch there. I presume that if you get your grant doubled you will more or less imitate the Ontario model?

Mr. Vineberg: We are not at the stage where we are proposing to imitate the Ontario model. And we are not asking for that. The reason why the Ontario model enjoys the esteem that it generally does in the legal world is that it is so far-reaching so generous, because it is prepared to grant legal aid on almost a universal basis. It is also prepared to subsidize the cost of legal aid through compensating the lawyers up to three-quarters of the regular tariff, which means that every lawyer in Ontario called upon to render legal aid will get paid for it. We are not asking for that in Quebec. Eventually that may come, but we would be quite content to concentrate on a greater extension of legal aid at the level where we have more full-time employees. Our current plans would be to double our 14 in Montreal—that is just as an illustration, as I am speaking for the Bar of Montreal—and to engage more social welfare workers, psychologists and other personnel to round out our work of legal aid.

Senator Carter: You mention legal aid centers in your brief. That is what you have in mind?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes.

Senator Carter: We had a witness before us—I think it was when we were in Toronto—who had some ideas for improving the Ontario system. His idea was that the Ontario Legal Aid System was a bit too passive.

The Chairman: I looked at that yesterday. Actually, what he said, if you recall, was that the lawyers were not participating.

Senator Carter: My understanding of his criticism was that they should be more active, that they should be out in the community; that they should not be waiting for problems to come to them to their centre, but they should be seeking out the people with problems and attempting to clarify the legal position of the poor people vis-à-vis the agencies they have to deal with. I gather that you have a sort of germ of an idea like that in your legal set-up, but as I understand your brief you do not envisage this concept at all, and I think this is the concept you should be aiming at.

Mr. Vineberg: We do a couple of things in the Bar of Montreal, although they are by way of being preliminary, in that direction. We have two radio programs at the moment, Le Barreau au Micro in French and a counter program in English, in which we answer questions from the general public on the basis of an hour or two every week on different subjects, in order to advise the public on legal problems, their legal rights, and so on. We held a program, let us say, in the month of March, and a large number of questions were on landlord-tenant relations.

In the French program we handle all cases as they come. In the English program we follow a different routine. We try to discuss a different subject for each program and try to narrow it down to that particular subject. We might deal with criminal law one week, drugs the following week, the White Paper the next and so on. We find that that helps a little bit in giving the public some understanding about legal problems and where to go for assistance and so on.

We also contemplated the possibility of publishing material about these things and making it available to the public.

Only this past year we introduced a legal reference service. It is not intended to be a substitute for legal aid. In fact, it perhaps caters to the portion of the population which is somewhat better off than those who go for legal aid. But it is intended to guide people to lawyers when they want to ask where to go in any particular sphere. We often find it necessary to refer these people to legal aid.

Senator Carter: Do you have to pay for this time on radio?

Mr. Vineberg: No, it is by co-operation with the radio stations. We don't charge them; they don't charge us. They are happy to have us as a public interest program. We have thought about doing a similar program on television, but we have not been able to work out a satisfactory method. Incidentally, I might say that we don't allow the lawyers on radio to identify themselves, for obvious reasons.

The Chairman: You cannot get on C.B.C. television until you become a little more violent.

Mr. Vineberg: It was suggested to us that we would have to put on some kind of play, like an imaginary trial.

Senator Hastings: I should like to deal with the matter of legal care for a moment. On page 4 of your brief you use the following words:

In effect, the attorney would become the employee of an employer whom he is often called upon to contest before the courts.

Does the fact that he is paid by your legal aid with money from the state have an effect upon the job he does?

Mr. Gagnon: My answer is that I am personally convinced that he is isolated from any influence from the Department of Justice, to put it bluntly. A lawyer in legal aid today is free to act on behalf of his client. We don't think that he would be that free if he became an employee of the Department of Justice or even of a state agency.

Senator Hastings: Why?

Mr. Gagnon: Because he would be under the influence of persons who administer justice and who have another interest than the defence of a client.

Senator Hastings: I am thinking of a legal care commission charged with the administration of legal care in a province.

Mr. Gagnon: Well, a commission... apparently the government of Quebec is moving toward the solution whereby a corporation would be set up, but which would not come under, for example, the Public Services Act. It would be a Crown corporation, if you might call it that loosely, but it would ensure a separation between state and legal aid. I would not quarrel with that. As to whether it would be a commission or not, personally I don't think that is the solution. I would not quarrel with a public corporation, however.

The Chairman: In Ontario and every other province having legal aid none of the lawyers who are giving the service to the poor are inhibited by what you consider to be a serious inhibition.

Mr. Gagnon: They are certainly not inhibited in Ontario. The Bar has full control. They have 100 per cent control.

The Chairman: In the rest of Canada the other provinces are in the same position. The people who are giving the legal aid don't feel inhibited. They take their position on behalf of their client regardless of what the state has in mind.

Mr. Vineberg: Our lawyers working in legal aid sometimes find they are criticized by the Crown prosecutors, who complain that there are not as many guilty pleas as there used to be. There are too many contestations.

The Chairman: But that happens in Ontario.

Mr. Vineberg: But they are proud of the criticism.

Senator Hastings: Who criticizes them?

Mr. Vineberg: The Crown does, saying that there is far too much contestation, that there are not as many automatic guilty pleas as there used to be.

The Chairman: That is true.

Senator Hastings: I can easily understand that.

The Chairman: That is good.

Mr. Gagnon: With respect to the point raised by the Chairman, I should like to point out that we are, of course, part of the Conference of Governing Bodies of the Legal Profession in Canada, and, as such, part of our responsibility is to review legal aid matters. I may be ill informed, but to my knowledge there is no province in Canada where legal aid is controlled either directly or indirectly by the government or by any department of the administration.

The Chairman: That is what I am saying. I am not suggesting that the government controls legal aid. The government pays the shot, but it is being controlled by the law societies. But you are objecting to that.

Mr. Vineberg: No.

Mr. Gagnon: No, we are certainly not objecting to that. We are objecting to a state organization.

The Chairman: Well, I think the term "public defender" was used. The money comes from the state and I understood that you were objecting to that.

Mr. Gagnon: No.

Senator Hastings: You say the role becomes impossible.

Mr. Gagnon: No, we object to the proposal set forth by the Prevost Commission which says that lawyers of legal aid should be part of the Public Service and should come under the Public Service Act. In other words, they should be public functionaries or public servants. We object to that. We certainly do not object to the Ontario situation or the situation existing in other provinces. And I add that in Quebec they are going even further. If the government enacts a legal aid act by which there would be a public corporation set up, Quebec would be the only province in Canada where a public body rather than the Bar has control over legal aid. But we are prepared to make even that compromise so long as we stay clear of the Department of Justice. We don't think we should be under the Department of Justice, except under the ordinary supervision of everyone who receives grants.

Senator Hastings: As I understand it now, you are opposed to the hiring of lawyers by the state for legal aid purposes.

Mr. Gagnon: That is right.

Senator Hastings: But you have no objection to lawyers being paid by the state through an independent commission for the handling of legal care of the citizens.

Mr. Gagnon: No.

The Chairman: The difficulty is that you senators are not lawyers. They are saying that they are glad to have the state pay them so long as the lawyers control the legal aid. We provide them with the funds but they run the organization.

Senator Hastings: The same as the College of Physicians and Surgeons.

The Chairman: Exactly.

Mr. Gagnon: Bluntly, this is true, but I think we state our reasons for that quite clearly. There would also be many other things for us to do. Incidentally, when I refer to lawyers who are responsible for the other things for us to do. Incidentally, when I refer those to whom we pay salaries. I am referring to people like Emile Colas, who has worked in Montreal legal aid for 14 years and has never had a cent from it. It has not been to his own benefit at all. We feel that it is the best way to serve the public. It does not give Colas, for example, anything.

Senator Fournier: Referring to legal aid again, I should like to know who applies for legal aid. Is it mostly the poor people? Could a senator apply for legal aid in Montreal?

Mr. Vineberg: As I mentioned earlier, senator, we do have certain criteria of acceptability. Persons who can afford to pay for legal services are not supposed to be given legal aid. Generally, we take the declaration of the individual concerned as to his status without investigation. But where a person is earning a good salary or has income of his own he cannot apply. He is not qualified for legal aid. It is only where he is economically not in a position to pay for a lawyer that he is qualified to apply for legal aid.

Senator Fournier: Is your office in Montreal a very busy place? Are people waiting in line for your services?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes.

Senator Fournier: As a rule?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes. It is not only that they are waiting for services, but I have to admit that they may have to come back later to have their problem actually dealt with. There are intermittent waits, but I might say that for better or for worse this is the situation in law offices generally, and sometimes clients who are paying large fees have to wait for legal services.

Senator McGrand: Did not the Province of Ontario run into that problem of people who can afford legal aid?

Mr. Vineberg: Yes. There have been a number of cases of abuse under those systems.

Senator Fournier: My last question is this; you are talking about getting more money and that the demand is there and if you had more money, you could serve more people. You mentioned that there were 34,000 cases. But how many did you refuse? Could you develop that capacity?

Mr. Vineberg: It is a case rather that we do not feel that we are anywhere near our potential. We do not go out and let the public know of our existence or of the existence of legal aid to the degree we ought to, or to the degree we would if we had the proper facilities. We are almost on the horns of a dilemma; if somebody makes a public statement about the wonderful work that legal aid is doing, instead of being happy with the compliment, we are embarrassed by the inflow of additional work without additional personnel to handle it. We feel that not everybody knows about legal aid and everybody who would be entitled to legal aid or who needs legal aid are not informed of it. If we had a greater personnel, we would do something to advise them about it instead of being relatively passive in that sphere at the moment. We would go out and look for clients.

Senator Fournier: Do you know how many cases you turn down in a year roughly?

Mr. Vineberg: No. It is only that we turn down categories of cases. We do not turn down cases as such. We never say to a person who is economically qualified for legal aid that we cannot handle his case. It is rather a situation where we do not go out of our way to attract these people. And we do not get the full potential of servicing the amount of legal aid where it is necessary.

Senator Fournier: I think I can add that through the representations we have received here even from Montreal very few people among the poor are really aware of your organization.

Mr. Vineberg: In all fairness I might say that there are some other institutions other than the Bar that conduct some legal aid work. For example, there is a Jewish organization in Montreal known as the Baron D'Hirsch which has had something of a legal aid organization for about 35 or 45 years, in the sense that they will have somebody present who will give advice to people within their area who need it. At the moment it is run by a lawyer.

The Chairman: Yes, but it is very narrow in its approach.

Mr. Vineberg: That is right. It is not handling cases, but it is giving advice and suggesting where somebody might go to obtain an old-age pension and so forth. There are similar institutions of that type as well who co-operate. They do not handle any cases in the sense of going to court. They will listen to somebody and then say "oh, yes, you need a lawyer; we will send you to the legal aid bureau." And then if actual courtroom representation is necessary, they will send these people to us.

The Chairman: Yes. But what you are saying, Mr. Vineberg, is that in Montreal you will find that the Ukrainians and the Polish and the Jews and the Chinese and others through their various social organizations, will do that kind of work, fill in an old-age pension form or make applications for a passport or inform people how to make applications for many things. That is normal. But when it comes to legal aid, they immediately move then on to somebody else, because they do not have the facilities beyond giving advice. That is normal every place in the country.

Any further questions?

If there are no other questions, before closing, I wish to congratulate these gentlemen and ask them to carry our congratulations back to their Bar. We extended an invitation to every Bar in Canada to come before this committee and the Bar of Montreal is the only one which accepted our invitation.

Gentlemen, you came here, and while you did not claim to be perfect, at least you were prepared to face up to some of the social problems that face the poor people of this country. We compliment and thank you for that. What you have done has further enlightened us with respect to the amount of work still ahead for us. On behalf of this committee, I thank you three very distinguished gentlemen, for coming here today and helping us in the way you have done.

Thank you very much.

Whereupon the committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

Report of the Bar Association of the Province of Quebec to the Special Committee of the Senate on Poverty

Introduction

1. The Bar Association is a professional corporation grouping in excess of 3,000 members throughout the territory of the Province of Quebec.

2. It does not appertain to the Bar to express itself on the aggregate of the causes of poverty which affect certain sectors of the Canadian population. Essentially, by reason of the role conferred upon it by its enabling statutes, the Bar is primarily aware of the situation which prevails in the administration of justice as regards destitutes.

3. Evidently this does not prevent individual members of the Bar from questioning themselves as to the sociological and economic cases of poverty, but the Bar, as a constituted body shall limit itself in the present brief to the formulation of recommendations as to improvements to be made to existing laws and to the structure of civil and criminal justice.

The Principle of the Equality of Citizens
Before the Law

4. The Bar has always recognized the principle of equality of citizens before the Law. All are equal before the Law, except as to those restrictions formulated by the legislator itself in favour of minors and incapables. These restrictions have for object to afford an additional protection to certain categories of citizens in the light of their situation of inferiority before the Law. In this manner the equilibrium is re-established.

5. This principle of equality of citizens before the Law means that the legislator, in the making of its laws, must not afford to one citizen advantages or privileges as regards other citizens. The Bar has always opposed and will continue to oppose any such form of legislation.

6. But this principle of equality of citizens before the Law, although valid in itself, is in practice not respected if citizens are not on the same token equal before the administration of justice whether before the tribunals of the common law, administrative tribunals or even before the State. In effect, of what use are equal rights when one is incapable of enforcing them before the tribunals on the same footing as one's neighbour. The theoretical recognition of the principle of equality must be accompanied by the concrete possibility of enforcing these rights.

7. The equality of citizens before the administration of justice entails, therefore, the recognition of the principle of the most complete accessibility of citizens to judicial services.

8. It has long been recognized that the State must furnish to the totality of its citizens judicial services and this from the product of general taxes. In effect, the State builds courthouses, names and pays judges, puts into effect the machinery for the administration of justice and assumes the expenses thereby offering to citizens judicial services which permit them to submit their differences to an independent arbitrator for a final and binding decision.

9. Meanwhile, since the establishment and development of the judicial system and by reason of the ever increasing complexity of our judicial rules, a result of our post-industrial and urbanized social structure, the presence of a specialist in the law becomes almost necessary to assist the citizen who presents himself before the administration of justice.

10. It is obvious that it is the judges who are the first guardians of the rights of citizens who appear before them but their role as impartial arbitrator does not permit them to actively aid one citizen who presents himself before them. In effect, if he were to take part in the preparation of the case of one of the parties there is the danger that his impartiality would be whittled away and that as a result he would be unable to render the judicial service expected of him.

11. This role of mandatory of the citizen before the courts and at the same time the role of technical counsellor reverts to lawyers who have received the particular technical preparation and who have a specific competence on the aggregate of our juridical and judicial system.

12. The Bar recognizes the right of each citizen to obtain the services of a lawyer whatever may be his financial situation since, without it, citizens are not equal before the administration of justice. It is well evident that if one of the parties is represented by an attorney whereas the other is not, the principle of equality is ill-applied.

13. The State itself, at all levels possesses its own attorneys whose fees are defrayed from the aggregate of contributions of citizens. It is more than natural that the citizen himself in a confrontation with the State should equally be represented by an attorney.

14. It would be relatively simple for the State to retain the services of the aggregate of lawyers and to assign them to the defence of citizens before the courts. This structure however entails such disadvantages that the role of the attorney becomes impossible.

15. In effect, the attorney would become the employee of an employer whom he is often called upon to contest before the courts. The attorney would be the recipient of confidential information which he may not divulge to anyone when at the same time his files would be in the hands of the State. The client has the free choice of attorneys and the attorney, the free choice of clients. This freedom could not be respected within a State structure.

16. It is for this reason that the Bar although favourable to the principle of judicial security is opposed to the establishment of a system entirely administered and financed by the State.

I—Judicial Security

17. In 1956 the Bar of Montreal and the Junior Bar of Montreal established an office for legal aid. This office was administered and entirely financed from the contributions of the member attorneys of the Bar of Montreal until only just recently.

18. Meanwhile the needs of the population of the region of Montreal have through the years become so important that the Bar of the Province of Quebec established on January 11, 1968, a research committee to "investigate the necessity of legal assistance in the Province, the organization of same under the aegis of the Bar, its financing, etc. . . with a view to making the appropriate recommendations to the government of the Province."

19. This committee headed by Me Emile Colas, c.r., of Montreal submitted an in depth study of the problem to the Bar of the Province of Quebec on August 21, 1968. Reproduced herein are the general conclusions of the Bar of Montreal which are to be found at pages 53 and following in the report.

20. The executive committee of the Bar of the Province of Quebec studied the report and formulated its recommendations to the General Council on October 11, 1968. These recommendations were subsequently adopted by the General Council.

21. The recommendations of the Bar of the Province of Quebec to the government of the Province are reproduced in extenso and are submitted to the special committee of the Senate in twelve specific conclusions:

22. It is urgent that the system of legal aid in Quebec be amplified.

23. Legal aid may be afforded to any person who by reason of insufficiency of resources finds himself in the impossibility of exercising a legitimate right at law or of obtaining juridical counsel.

24. To this effect:

(a) In criminal matters provision will be made for the defence of accused in first instance from the time of arrest until final judgment and, in appeal, in the case of denial of justice, upon the approval of the Bar.

(b) In the case of statutory offences provision will be made for the defence of accused when this defence is a serious one, according to the directives of the Bar.

(c) In civil matters assistance will be granted in the following cases:

(i) in demand or in defence if their exists a good right of action or a serious defence;

(ii) outside of litigation, preventive or conservatory juridical measures;

(iii) acts and procedures of execution.

25. In the interest of the public and to assure a free and efficient system of legal aid, it is fitting that the responsibility be confined to the Bar of Quebec with power of delegation to its sections.

26. The regulations concerning legal assistance are enacted by the Bar.

27. Each regulation must respect the individual relationship between he who is assisted and the attorney, particularly as regards the latter's independence, code of professional ethics, professional secrecy and discipline.

28. All regulations must be published in the Official Gazette and take effect from the date of publication.

29. Any person admitted to legal aid benefits by the following advantages:

- (a) free assistance of the auxiliaries of justice;
- (b) the designation as a matter of course of auxiliaries of justice; permanent attorney of the local bureau or appointment by the local Bar;
- (c) exemption from the payment of fees and costs;
- (d) provisional exemption from payment of sums due to the treasury for legal stamps, registration and filing;
- (e) advances of certain costs by the treasury such as costs of transportation; fees of experts, taxable costs of witnesses, newspaper publication fees;
- (f) free delivery by the notary or clerk of acts and deeds;
- (g) the costs of stenography;
- (h) all other costs which may be determined from time to time by the regulations.

30. The Bar is of opinion that:

- (a) Both in matters of consultation and criminal matters the services should, as far as possible, be rendered by attorneys in the employ of the Legal Aid Bureau;
- (b) For the moment, in other matters, the services, as far as possible, should be freely dispensed by the other members of the Bar.

As regards these latter services, the Bar believes that the question of remuneration according to the standards to be established, should be studied further.

31. The costs incurred for the establishment and maintenance of legal aid are paid from the consolidated revenues of the Province.

32. The Bar submits each year its budget to the Minister of justice.

33. At the end of each financial period, the Bar has its books and records relative to legal assistance verified by chartered accountants and sends copy of the report to the Minister of justice who may at all times do a verification by his duly authorized representatives.

34. It is encouraging to note that since the formulation of its recommendations, the Bar of the district of Montreal and the Bar of the district of Quebec have considerably improved the structures of legal aid and the quality of the services rendered to less fortunate citizens.

35. Moreover many local sections of the Bar of the Province although their attorneys have at all times furnished their services freely to indigents, have already or are in the process of putting into effect the machinery for local legal aid.

II—Modifications to the Criminal Code

A—Rules as to bail

36. The present situation which prevails before our criminal tribunals is patently inequitable as regards less fortunate citizens. In effect, the rule of equality of citizens before the law is deeply divergent with the actual system in two aspects.

37. To begin with, police authorities all too frequently have the habit of proceeding by way of warrant instead of by way of summons. It must be added that important improvements have been made by the Court of Sessions of the Peace, but much progress remains to be made.

38. The Bar recommends that in penal matters, the procedure should be by way of summons rather than by way of warrant in all cases where there is reasonable assurance that the accused will present himself for arraignment. In any event if the accused does not present himself there is always time to issue a warrant for arrest.

39. Those persons who must be detained by police agents whether in virtue of a warrant for arrest or without one, should be admitted to bail, if available under the circumstances, immediately after their arrest.

40. In order that this might be accomplished, the Bar recommends the establishment of a system whereby a Justice of the Peace would be on duty at all hours of the day and night to immediately return to freedom all accused admissible to bail.

41. Bail normally consists of monetary undertakings such as a deposit of money, a personal recognizance or a mortgage on an immoveable. As a concrete result, a poor man is incarcerated while waiting his trial and a rich man is free until his case is heard by the courts. Occasionally if the crime is important or the accused famous, the courts have even the tendency to award very high bail.

42. The Bar recommends in a general fashion the elimination of almost all obligations of a monetary nature in matters of bail and their replacement by the personal undertaking of the accused to present himself at his trial. The possibility of retaining certain monetary obligations should be examined especially as regards foreign citizens where this method appears the most appropriate to assure the appearance of the accused at his trial.

43. The judge should firstly decide whether the accused is admissible to bail in evaluating the possibility or probability of his voluntary appearance at trial. In the case of foreign citizens or in other appropriate cases he might then determine the nature of the bail.

44. This evaluation should be founded on the status of the accused in his own milieu. Each connecting factor could be examined such as domicile, family situation, employment and generally the environment in which the accused has evolved. We refer you more particularly to paragraphs 94 to 107 of the report of the Bar of the Province of Quebec to the Commission of enquiry on the administration of justice in criminal and penal matters which is annexed to the present brief.

B—Compensation of Victims

45. In the course of justice, there is often the tendency to forget the victim of a penal or criminal delict. Often a citizen is plunged into poverty by reason of injury suffered at the hand of a criminal or as a result of deprivation he has been the victim of.

46. The criminal code contains a provision in article 628 which permits the judge to indemnify the victim by condemning a tortfeasor to pay a certain sum of money. This provision which in any event is rarely applied is largely incomplete. In effect the judge had discretion to award indemnity and the damages are limited to poverty. On the same token, the majority of criminal tortfeasors are notoriously insolvent and incapable of paying any substantial indemnity.

47. The Bar recommends that the State assume the responsibility of indemnifying victims or their dependents for injuries suffered in the course of the perpetration of a delict and confide the administration of this system to an autonomous board either already existent or to a new organization.

III—The Repression of the Exploitation of the Economically Weak

48. Canadian criminal law contains an entire series of severe measures designed to protect life, liberty, human dignity and property. Numerous provisions exist concerning fraud but these provisions are too imprecise as regards modern business techniques.

49. In effect unscrupulous traders have adopted certain business methods with a view to exploiting the economically weak. Often these methods do not constitute frauds in the sense of the criminal code but although not illegal they are clearly inequitable. At times even though these methods constitute frauds, proof of same is extremely difficult to make.

50. It is not our intention to enumerate all these methods since they are too varied but by way of example might be mentioned the canvassing at homes, under pressure, of sales of different objects or courses of all forms, the sale of land improperly described by unequitable promises of sale, the negotiation of promissory notes under the cover of the protection afforded a holder in due course in virtue of the Bills of Exchange Act.

51. To the greatest extent the victims of these dishonest business men are the economically weak, unalert and susceptible to the techniques of pressure sales.

52. It is difficult to create a crime entitled "exploitation of the economically weak" as the imprecision of such an idea would render the law inapplicable. Nonetheless, various measures have been envisaged by the different provinces.

53. Certain provinces have legislation which permits the purchaser of a sale at domicile to unilaterally annul the sale within the twenty-four hours which follow the sale, a period which is commonly called "the cooling off period". The Bar endorses this form of legislation and adds that the delay should be seventy-two hours as opposed to twenty-four hours.

54. Insofar as courses of all descriptions, legislation exists already which permits a future student to annul his contract in paying a proportion of the price corresponding to the number of courses actually followed. This recourse however, is limited to certain courses mentioned in the law relating to private professional schools. This legislation should be extended to all forms of courses or apprenticeships.

55. In the matters of instalment sales and loans, it is extremely important that the true rates of interest be divulged to the consumer. It would be necessary to supply to legislation to this effect, penal sanctions against he who defaults thereunder as well as civil sanctions such as the reduction of the rate of interest to the legal rate of interest.

56. It is easy to imagine a number of important and complex measures, but, without doubt, the best results are obtained in informing citizens as fully as possible on their rights. We shall return to this question in the next section.

IV—Legal Clinics in less fortunate urban centres

57. The Junior Bar of Montreal, with the collaboration of law students, is preparing the establishment in St. Henri Ward in Montreal of a consultative legal clinic.

58. The formula presents numerous advantages. The fact that the clinic is physically situated in the very heart of a less fortunate ward results necessarily in its being more accessible to citizens of the ward, both physically and psychologically. In this fashion the machinery of justice loses its character of distant and somewhat terrifying solemnity in the eyes of less fortunate citizens. Justice and her hand maidens, the lawyers, become more human.

59. Moreover this type of counselling centre permits the introduction of preventative law. In effect, it is hoped that less fortunate citizens will acquire the habit of consulting a lawyer before the signature of a contract, for example, rather than after. Often, in the minds of citizens, recourse is had to a lawyer only when the situation has completely deteriorated and as a result when this latter's possibility of action is often limited.

60. The Bar favours the establishment of these types of legal information centres, on the condition, however, that the legal counselling be given by lawyers duly qualified to practise the profession. The Bar would wish to retain the participation of law students but on the condition that they work under the direction of duly admitted attorneys.

61. In fact these types of offices should be integrated into the systems of legal aid to permit a perfect coordination of the work of both offices. In effect, legal counsellors of these law clinics could refer cases, where proceedings should be instituted, to the legal aid office of that district.

62. The Bar equally favours the creation of a group of specialized lawyers in "social law" who could render invaluable services within these legal clinics.

63. In effect, the complexity of welfare laws, the multiplicity of provincial, federal and municipal jurisdictions renders it absolutely impossible for the citizen to know what he is entitled to under the various welfare laws. Moreover it is necessary to protect citizens from the errors or the abuses of State functionaries in their determination of the welfare to be afforded to a less fortunate citizen.

64. The different administrations, both public and private, should collaborate with the personnel of these legal clinics in furnishing to them the most complete information on available programmes.

65. Finally the possibilities of rendering these clinics multi-professional should not be lost sight of. Side by side with lawyers could be found psychologists, professional job placement personnel, marriage counsellors and even rehabilitation specialists.

CONCLUSION

Gentlemen of the Special Committee of the Senate sitting on poverty, the Bar of the Province of Quebec submits to you these few thoughts and recommendations with a view to the elimination of the causes of poverty over which the members of the profession may exercise a decisive influence.

We hope that our support will permit you to circumscribe this evil which gnaws our post-industrial society and to propose the appropriate corrective measures.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wenesday, May 13, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.40 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order.

We have a brief from the Province of Prince Edward Island. Our witness is the Deputy Minister, Mr. William W. Reid D.S.O., E.D., B.A., who is the Deputy Minister of Welfare and Co-ordinator of Rehabilitation of the Province of Prince Edward Island; a very distinguished soldier, very distinguished public servant, and a man who has worked his way up from the bottom to his present very high position. His curriculum vitae will appear in the record. He will begin by making an opening statement.

Mr. William W. Reid, Deputy Minister of Welfare and Co-ordinator of Rehabilitation, Province of Prince Edward Island: Honourable Mr. Chairman, honourable ladies and gentlemen. In my few opening remarks to-day I simply wish to say how honoured I am to have the opportunity to represent my Minister in presenting this brief on behalf of our little province. I have been asked to express his regrets that he is unable to be with you because of recent pressures of business.

The brief which I have the honour to present for your consideration to-day can be divided into two sections: the first one dealing with poverty, its extent and suggestions which we feel might be helpful in giving some immediate relief to the problem; and the second section referring mainly to the Atlantic provinces in particular and suggesting comprehensive development plans as a possible help in eradicating poverty, and also recommending that increased cost-sharing formulae be considered by the Federal Government under Canada Assistance arrangements.

Following up this brief, we would at this time like to reiterate that there is likely nothing new nor original in this presentation. However, we feel that our concurrence in several points put forward to you in other briefs and through other sources of information, might be helpful. We also felt it might be of assistance to you and your Committee to let you know that the Government of Prince Edward Island has already moved to improve conditions regarding goals, treatment of alcoholics, etc.; and, as you are probably well aware, they have entered into an island-wide comprehensive development plan with the Federal Government in order generally to improve conditions, to create more employment, etc. As the days and months go by, it is hoped that more and more of the goals set under this plan will be attained and that improved conditions will add much toward increasing our overall standard of living in the province and help us in the stamping out of poverty.

In this presentation we have purposely refrained from referring you to a great number of appendices, as we felt that you would already have most of this information available in the form of other briefs, etc. However, should you require any specific information, I will certainly be only too happy to endeavour to answer any pertinent questions; and should I be unable to supply the answer immediately, it will certainly be a pleasure to forward the information to you in writing as soon as I can secure same for you.

In conclusion of these brief remarks, I would like to mention that our major worries in the Province of Prince Edward Island are: first of all, a large number of unemployables plus a goodly number of seasonal unemployed; secondly, our low personal income. As mentioned in our brief, if we could, here in the Province of Prince Edward Island, realize greater cost-sharing arrangements under the Canada Assistance Plan, this would be a great benefit to us and, of course, being of benefit to us would eventually be a benefit to the Atlantic region and to Canada as a whole. Should we realize this greater cost-sharing, I can assure you that this province would increase its assistance rates over and above those presently being granted. We would provide training for staff badly needed to cope with counselling and other help necessary for our citizens; we would provide better foster homes and higher rates of remuneration to those operating same; and we would do everything possible to create more work opportunities for our unemployed and under-employed population.

Again I thank you for this opportunity to appear before you, and assure you of any co-operation that we in Prince Edward Island can give in helping to solve this vexing problem of poverty within our country. Respectfully submitted, sir.

The Chairman: Senator Inman, would you start?

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I am quite proud of Prince Edward Island as regards this brief. I have several questions. To start with, on page 13, paragraph 2, you point to the need for experimentation in poverty programs and the delivery of services. What do you see as your role in initiating or sponsoring such plans? How willing is your government to risk failures in such experimentation? The reason I am asking this particularly is that I know Prince Edward Island has been used before as a pilot project.

Mr. Reid: Senator Inman, in response to your question, I think from what our premier and our minister have informed me, they would be willing to have us co-operate in any possible way with any experiment, particularly in connection with guaranteed income and this sort of thing.

As you know, we have in Prince Edward Island approximately 110,000 people. We are more or less, as I have said in my brief or in my notes, a captive audience. We know from the past, from surveys and other sorts of things, that our people are most co-operative; and we would be willing, in our little department, to foster, support and help in any possible way any experiment; we have been assured that we can go ahead.

We have been submitted to a lot, but I think you will find we have come out fairly well.

One of the things that I think you good people would realize to be important is our alcohol problem, and the fact that the government of the province fostered during the past three years an experiment in alcohol studies, and helped to support the financial cost of this, and there is quite a bit of cost to it.

Now they are going even further, co-operating with the Alcohol Treatment Foundation, and have set up a complete treatment and rehabilitation system for alcoholics, which is now in effect. This is going to relieve our gaols of a lot of the population, in fact of almost 70 per cent of the present gaol population. It is helping a lot already to relieve what I might describe, since I am among friends, as the mess that you good people know existed in our gaols. It has helped already. I understand that through our premier's efforts, eventually the gaols that now exist will go out of existence and we will have one central respectable type of building which will house the remaining 25 to 30 per cent of our criminal population, so that we shall have decent facilities at last. This step has already been taken, and this has also come as a co-operative survey and other effort with the federal and provincial governments co-operating. Studies, surveys and works have been gone through, and now we have this functioning. Our province, I know, is backing it under our development plan, and I am sure that these other things, senator, that you are intimating will also be brought up.

Senator Inman: In your opinion, do you think alcoholism contributes quite a lot to poverty, especially in our towns?

Mr. Reid: Definitely. We feel it is very important, and that the women and children have suffered a lot because of it. They have gone without many of the better things of life because of their husbands—and in some cases it is not the husband but the spouse who is the offender, not always the husband.

Senator Inman: On page 20 in the last paragraph you suggest that workers presently outside of unions should be unionized. Do you really think that unions are the answer to labour problems in P.E.I.? You will remember as well as I do the union upsets and that sort of thing. Do you think that as far as the province is concerned unions would be the only answer?

Mr. Reid: There may be some other answer, senator, but for the time being, just from my own slight association with the Department of Labour where I had an opportunity to rub shoulders both with the unions and with management, I will say that for the time being they present to me the best hope that the down-trodden people have of getting their incomes upgraded. There may be some other way, but at the present time I think, in answer to your question, that I have to say that I feel in unity—not necessarily union—there is strength.

The teachers, for instance, if they had gone along, as they did in my day, with no organization whatsoever, they would probably still be getting $85 a month. You good people will smile at this, but when I came out of university back in 1935, as I was telling the chairman, things were pretty grim. These were depression days. I taught in grade 10 in one of our public schools for $85 a month. With an Honours degree, I was paid $85 a month and for ten months of the year. A person holding that same job today is drawing $12,000 a year.

The Chairman: That was in 1935.

Mr. Reid: That is right, sir, but in those days there was no unity; there was no one voice speaking on behalf of the group, that is, teachers' group.

I am getting back to the under-employed, the unemployables, the people who need help; the ones we have to subsidize to-day in welfare, whose incomes are so small. We have people down there still getting a dollar an hour, and you cannot keep a family to-day on a dollar an hour and a five-day week. This is where I feel that the unions, with their negotiating power, bargaining collectively, can do something and are doing a considerable amount. I feel that it is the chap who is working for the man who employs perhaps two or three and there is no union in there, but those people do need help and I feel that the unions can give counselling services, suggest how these people can talk to employers, as they can if they have reasonable organizers. I feel that for the time being it is about the best tool we have available.

Senator Inman: On page 3 at the top you say that poverty is a complex thing and so on; that it is not a condition at birth: we are all born equal.

Mr. Reid: Senator, I am glad you found that. That statement is not quite complete. This is true. My friend Jean-Jacques Rousseau made this statement a great many years ago. He said that people are born equal everywhere, but everywhere at the same time they are enchained; in other words, they are subject to their environment or the conditions into which they are born.

You are not the first one. I did not amend this. I saw this earlier. This was done in consultation with a group of our people, and I did not put this in, but I did read Rousseau among my other things, and when I knew all that I smiled at this; but I am from Prince Edward Island and I honoured in French when I went to university, and this was there and it is quite definite, and I am glad you picked it up. This is quite true, that we are all born equal, but we have this little "but" in there that we are subject to our environment. We all come into the world with two arms and two legs and if we are unfortunate some of us come in handicapped; but theoretically, when God creates us, we are equal; but that is as far as it goes and from then on we are subject to our environment and the conditions into which we are born.

Senator Inman: I have other questions, but I will pass for the moment.

The Chairman: Senator Pearson.

Senator Pearson: I notice in your background data here that out of a population of 110,000 you have roughly 9.7 or really 10 per cent unemployed. I would imagine the working poor would make up pretty near another 10,000. The problem there, as far as I can see it, is how are you going to raise money to bring these people up. You talk about the old age security and unemployment insurance, that they should all be raised, but how are you going to get the money for them?

Mr. Reid: As mentioned here, sir, we have made these suggestions of raising these certain categories of types of assistance, you recall—for want of a better name—and this is just a small thing and general throughout the country.

Senator Pearson: I think it is a rather large thing, not small.

Mr. Reid: It is a large thing when you put it all together, yes, but it runs into, say, two or three per cent, but it does mean a lot to the older folk. The people I am mostly concerned with are the ones you mentioned, the under-employed and the unemployed. These are the ones who worry us most.

What we would like to do and what we have already taken steps to do—you will note perhaps later near the end of our brief—we suggest that we want to create this more or less job-training type of thing for the people who have not had the opportunity. For instance, the untrained, unskilled fellow we would like to take off our relief roll, so to speak, and put him into training under our trained people; give them something semi-skilled such as painting or the handy-man type of thing.

This winter, although things developed that kept us from getting it started, we had taken from our welfare list a group of 60 people and were making up six teams of ten. We had it all arranged for training, to bring these people in for what I like to call training on the job. We have these people in, some of them from outlying districts, and we have even set up a little dormitory where we can sleep them and keep them, because a hundred miles from home you cannot send them back and forth every day. Those who live nearby, we arrange to have transported. We would like to bring them in as an experiment. We have this work project, and we hope to teach these people to be, perhaps, the village painter or the village handyman, so as to give them something that they can do whereby they can demand a half decent little wage. At the present time they are living in out-of-the-way places. Some of them have families of five to ten, and if there is no Irish moss to pick or if the fishing or farming season is closed, they just sit there and draw unemployment—if they are fortunate enough to be qualified. If they do not qualify, we just have to send them a very modest relief cheque. We hope, through work projects, to train these people, and if they cannot all be placed in Prince Edward Island perhaps they will be in demand elsewhere.

Senator Pearson: How would that work with the working poor? You cannot shift them around when they have a job on which they are not earning very much but they cannot move from there to their training place.

Mr. Reid: In fairness, sir, we may have to subsidize these people some, but we would like to say that there are not any working poor. I feel we have to get our per hour wage up. For instance, instead of a dollar an hour—and 80 cents some of them are getting in the fish plants. Our government has already taken steps to increase their labour rate from the present $1.25 to $1.65, I am told. This is the best way I can think of for getting these people up.

Another thing that worries me more than anything is that we have overlooked the working poor in providing accommodation. All our Central Mortgage and Housing arrangements are very fine up to a certain point and for certain people, but we found last year in the City of Charlottetown, where, say, 20 new units were opened and supposed to be low rental housing, that the rental runs around $100 to $115 a month. The type of fellow you are talking about, senator, cannot pay that kind of rent. Somehow or other we have to get housing for the young people who are underpaid and who are starting out raising a family. I feel we owe something to them. I am trying my best to sell this. I think I have my minister sold, and I hope we can sell the rest of the government on this proposition. Some months of the year these people might be able to pay $50 a month rent. I think it is out-of-the-way to expect them when they are raising a family of four or five little ones and getting perhaps a dollar and a quarter or $1.65 an hour, to pay a hundred and some dollars a month rent, because they just cannot afford it and have the decent things of life at the same time. So we feel there should be some plan.

Departmentally we have a plan to provide about, as I remember, 30 homes per year for five years, which would rent at about $50 a month. Then you might ask: how are these fellows going to pay even that $50 if they are unemployed and there is no fishing in the winter or farming? Then I think it is up to us to put them on what we call Canada assistance, and pay their rent for them until they catch up again in the spring. This is a fair deal; this is what we should do.

Senator Pearson: Would your fishing industry and potato growers be in a position to pay these extra wages that you are anticipating; that is, if instead of 80 cents an hour or a dollar you say $1.65 an hour or even $2, would the fishing industry be able to carry that load?

Mr. Reid: I think they would, sir, just humbly speaking, I am sure they would. I know of men who have made a net profit of $7,000 in the short fishing season, having hired other men, and who in the middle of winter come to me looking for a relief cheque after having cleared $7,000. If they can afford to spend it that way, I am sure they can afford to spend it on their help.

Senator Pearson: These men that are working on temporary jobs, these are the ones you are having problems with?

Mr. Reid: Seasonal unemployment.

Senator Pearson: Seasonal unemployment. They have nothing to do and they wander around and get into pubs, which is what is causing your trouble.

Mr. Reid: Partially, yes.

Senator Pearson: In other words, you need a moonlighting job; you are going to have two jobs for these men?

Mr. Reid: That is right, and this is why we are hoping that the overall plan that the premier and the government are working on will create more employment and keep them busy the year round rather than three or four months.

Senator Inman: If I can follow that up, these people you speak of on seasonal employment, some of whom I know, fish two months of the lobster season and they go on fishermen's unemployment, but they can make at least $7,000 or $8,000 in two months. Do you think something should be done about that? At the same time they are drawing unemployment insurance, but they are still fishing to a certain extent.

Mr. Reid: As you know, some of our fishermen, the ones in the past you are now mentioning they are more or less employers in the fishing business, but they also have farms.

Senator Inman: Yes.

Mr. Reid: They go out and fish, we will say, from the 1st of May until the 1st of July. In the meantime they will have had enough time out of their boats to plant their crops. Then they come back and they sit tight for the winter. They would like to have someone give them a job perhaps in the off-season again; but those people, you might say, are self-employed and they cannot as a rule draw benefits, while the ones they hire can.

I feel this is something that is a little too deep for me. I feel our unemployment insurance people would have to go into that. I believe that unemployment insurance in some cases is being abused. It is certainly a wonderful thing for the person who is a bona fide unemployed person, but not for people like this who are using it. I do not think it was ever created for a seasonal unemployment fill-in like this at all, but this is just my view.

Senator Pearson: What is your main tax base in Prince Edward Island? Is it land, property, or income tax or what?

Mr. Reid: As you know, we have our income tax, but the people who pay income tax in Prince Edward Island would not amount to very much. It is merely a contribution. Our main effort is our land tax, and this land tax or school tax, as we call it, of course goes to finance our educational system. This is where the bulk of it goes, for school buses and drivers, teachers, and so on.

The Chairman: Senator Carter.

Senator Carter: I apologize for coming in late. I was at another committee. I hope I am not asking questions that have already been answered, but I would like to know something about how your welfare assistance operates in Prince Edward Island. Do you have different rates for long-term assistance as compared with short-term assistance?

Mr. Reid: No, sir, we do not. I am like my colleague in Newfoundland—I know him quite well and we are great friends—who has always had this problem. We just treat every case on the usual budget system, and whether it is for one month or 21 months does not matter. We give it on the basis of need in the home for whatever time it may be.

Senator Carter: Do you have different rates for urban families as compared with rural?

Mr. Reid: No, sir, not in that sense, except that we do make allowance for a higher rate of rental in the city. This is all. Other than that, we do not.

Senator Carter: Just adjust it on rents?

Mr. Reid: That is all.

Senator Carter: Are the rates that you pay based on family size?

Mr. Reid: Yes, sir; the bigger the family, the more money would have to be put into that home, and based strictly on what we call the budget deficit system.

Senator Carter: Do you have a cut-off rate?

Mr. Reid: No, sir.

Senator Carter: Regardless of size?

Mr. Reid: No, sir.

Senator Carter: There is no cut-off rate?

Mr. Reid: No. I could go to a neighbouring province—and I will not mention any but I will say it is not Senator Fergusson's province; but, seriously speaking, I can go to a neighbouring province where there is a ceiling. The ceiling was raised during the past year, but my friends there still tell me it is not enough. In other words, a family of 25 (this is a little exaggeration) gets only a certain amount of money. There are families almost that big living within a household. I can think of one family in our province of a man, his wife and 12 children—they are 14. These people are given assistance on the basis of need of the 14 people, not on the basis of three people. In a certain neighbouring province you would get $175, whether there were three in the household or 14, and this we do not think is fair.

Senator Carter: What would a family of four get in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Reid: It would depend, sir, on the specific family and their need. I could not tell you exactly because, as I say, it is based on their budget, what they need and what they have. In other words, if there was income coming in it would have to be subtracted from the overall. This is why I am hedging on this. A family of four, we will say, could have $425, but maybe they have an income of $220, so we could only give them $205.

Senator Carter: So then you do actually assess need?

Mr. Reid: Right.

Senator Carter: That is interesting. This is the first time I have found the Canada Assistance Plan really being put into effect in the way it was intended to operate. How do you assess need in Prince Edward Island; How do you go about assessing need?

Mr. Reid: The Canada Assistance came into being in 1966, as you know. Therefore we had to take figures of cost of living and so on that were set up in 1965. So we have a little system whereby we say that the first adult in the family should have $30 a month for food. This is not very much, but it is a dollar a day; the second adult in the family, husband and wife, they get $30 each for food which is on their allowance. Then there is $25, we will say, for the first adult; $20 perhaps for the second, and so it goes. There is quite a little schedule. I can mail this to you if you like to have it for your interest. If you would like a copy, I can put one in the mail.

Senator Carter: I think the committee would be interested.

Mr. Reid: I would be only too glad. These are regulations in connection with our General Welfare Assistance Act. You work out the whole thing, food, clothing, housing—cost of rent or, if the man owns his place, we can give him allowance for maintenance, we can allow for his taxes for the year, we can allow his utilities, his light, his heat. All these things are permissible.

Senator Carter: Whether he is rural or urban.

Mr. Reid: That is right, whatever the cost may be. In addition to that, he may have special needs. He may have a sick wife, in which case we can make allowance for any prescription drugs. They can be included in his budget. Or if it is a special case of surgery or something like that, or a hearing aid is needed, any of those things can be included.

Mark you, in Prince Edward Island we are having it pretty rough, and we do not go out and advertise this in the papers that we are doing it, but we will do it for anybody who is in need. If you were on the assistance rolls, and it was shown that your child needed a hearing aid, a hearing aid would be put right on that kiddie; or if the child needed treatment by a specialist in New York, he would be sent to New York with all expenses paid for the child and escort. All this sort of thing is done and we are doing this.

Senator Carter: With that sort of needs test in operation, your budgetary expenses must be on a higher level proportionately than in, say, other Maritime provinces?

Mr. Reid: On a per capita basis our grants, our givings, are better, yes.

Senator Carter: Have you made any comparisons?

Mr. Reid: This is another thing that I should have prepared for you, I am sorry. In a brief we submitted to the minister, we have all this laid out. I see your chairman has a copy. This is available, and I shall be glad to see that copies come to the committee individually if you do not already have it.

The Chairman: Have you copies for all the committee?

Mr. Reid: No reason why you could not. I have not them with me, but we can get them and I shall be glad to see that they are mailed to you. This is a brief, by the way, that we submitted by your representative.

Senator Carter: I am familiar with it, yes.

Mr. Reid: We had a very nice hearing. Of course, after a year's study and work, we had everything in this that we felt the minister and the government here would want. All the comparative figures are in here as to how much Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the other provinces give; they are all laid out in here.

The Chairman: It is 13 per cent in Prince Edward Island, which is higher than normal.

Senator Carter: It must be.

The Chairman: Nova Scotia was a little less than ten.

Mr. Reid: These, of course, may have varied a bit since this was made up. I think it is close enough.

Senator Carter: You mentioned the Canada Assistance Plan as an umbrella for other payments, and you seem to indicate in your brief that you would like the old age security, guaranteed income, guaranteed annual income and those things to be adjusted more adequately in terms of the rise in the cost of living than they are now, instead of the actual two per cent. You also intimate that the Canada Assistance Plan might be used to a greater extent as an umbrella for other services. You did not say anything very much about guaranteed annual income.

Mr. Reid: I mentioned in here, sir, that we would be willing in Prince Edward Island to be more or less a guinea pig as an experiment, did you notice that?

Senator Carter: Yes.

Mr. Reid: I mentioned that before you came in this morning, I believe.

Senator Carter: On the basis of the Canada Economic Council.

Mr. Reid: We have had, sir, just briefly—some of the senators will remember—a little experience in Prince Edward Island in guaranteeing income, particularly for older people. Whether our experience would be of any help or not we do not know, but it might be useful in that we just have this small group down there we could work with and try out anything; a general income experiment, if they wish, on all people of working age, whatever they wanted. It could be done on income tax returns, whatever way they would like to try.

At the present time, as you know, we are supplementing the present old age security.

For instance, down in Prince Edward Island if a person is not entitled to the full income supplement, we can, if he or she is getting less than $100 a month, bring that up to $100.

We feel that everybody 68 years of age and over should have an income of at least $100 a month. This is what our government has said, and the previous government before said this. So we carry that out. So that if a recipient were receiving old age security only at the basic $79.58, we now give $20.42 to bring it up to $100, whether he needs it or not—that is not the criteria.

Senator Carter: This is as a matter of right?

Mr. Reid: That is right, we have guaranteed this.

Mr. Carter: Under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Reid: This is why I say we have had a little bit of experience. I think there are one or two of your other briefs that have suggested such a proposition, and we go along with this. We would even be willing to take part in an experiment to see if we could make it work.

The Chairman: British Columbia and Ontario do the same thing.

Mr. Reid: Yes, they do in another way, a little different way.

Senator Carter: You are the guinea pig in one of these plans. I thought you would be tired of being a guinea pig.

Mr. Reid: Well, it is one of those things. I think it is important enough to ask that if it would help, it would help our people too. I think it would be an awful lot easier to compile figures with a 100,000 population than to go into a province where you have two million.

Senator Carter: Well, you are supplementing then old age security from the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Reid: No, sir. We are supplementing it from Prince Edward Island Funds. This is not shareable, because the needs test will not permit it being shared. Under Canada Assistance you have to measure up to needs test or you cannot share.

The Chairman: You see what he is saying?

Senator Carter: Yes.

The Chairman: You follow what he said?

Senator Carter: I did not get that.

Mr. Reid: Our province is doing this on its own; this is not shareable unfortunately. If it were shareable, we would not have to pay it because Canada would be paying it.

Senator Carter: Yes, half of it.

Mr. Reid: No, they would be paying it in the form of G.I.S.

Senator Carter: I know what you are saying. You mention in your brief, if I remember, that something might be done under the Canada Assistance Plan to supplement or subsidize the working poor. Some provinces are doing something like that under the Canada Assistance Plan as it is. Are you doing anything like that in Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Reid: Not at the present time. By that I would assume, sir, you are suggesting we raise their income?

Mr. Reid: No, at the present time, other than to subsidize them, we are doing this in Prince Edward Island. The reason I put this in that this is a Canada-wide thing and I was thinking of others. Supposing you were working, drawing $200 a month and you had a family of five and could just not make ends meet. We can give you another $75 or $100, and we are doing this in a few cases.

Senator Carter: Under Canada Assistance?

Mr. Reid: Right, but it is not shareable.

Senator Carter: That is the same thing.

Mr. Reid: Yes, we are all right on this. I am sorry, I misunderstood you at first. We are definitely doing this up to a limited degree, but still feel that the answer is not there, that we should be paying working people a respectable sum.

Senator Carter: You mean the economy should be paying.

Mr. Reid: Yes, the economy should be subsidizing them rather than, you might say, public funds.

Senator Carter: Just one last question, Mr. Chairman. What is your attitude towards family allowances as compared with guaranteed annual income, which would take into account the size of the family?

Mr. Reid: Well, the present family allowance, sir, does not to me fill the bill. Of course, it is going in a lot of cases to families which do not need it, but this is all right and does not matter; but to the family which really needs it to-day, $8, $6, or even the $10 youth allowance is not very much. As I think I mentioned in the brief, it has not kept pace with the cost of living going up and up, whereas that has stayed the same as it was back years ago. We feel that the guaranteed income would be much better and more stable.

Senator Carter: If the federal government had extra money available, you would prefer it to be used as a guarantee?

Mr. Reid: As an individual I would definitely prefer.

Senator Carter: Rather than just stepping up family allowances. Thank you.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to say first that I was quite impressed with the humane approach of your welfare department in Prince Edward Island to the problem of people in need. I think it is really quite wonderful that where there are people who actually need things you see they get them. We have not found this anywhere. Sometimes it is much more rigid.

On page 22 of your brief at the top you support the recommendations that were advanced by the C.M.H.C. in their presentation, and one especially you mention is the dispersion of public housing units in smaller groupings. It seems to me that in most places I have known the people who are in nice locations are very unwilling to have public housing built amongst their houses. How do you suggest that we can carry out this dispersion in view of that attitude of many people?

Mr. Reid: Well, it may be, senator, that we would have to bear the brunt in the communities of a little bit of adverse comment, and perhaps provide the space scattered about us.

In our own city of Charlottetown I can think of nothing worse than taking, say, a city block and creating just one area of low rental housing. I think this earmarks it as where the poor fellows live, and so on, and the houses will all be rundown.

My feeling on their being dispersed, if we can get the city fathers to do it—as they have started in Charlottetown and are trying all the time to get to the spots and have been able to get a couple already; I find that when these people go in there, amazingly enough they try to keep up with the Joneses, which is a good thing.

For instance, I think Senator Inman will recall that when our housing project was put up over North River—which I think is as snobbish an area as we get in the Island (we do not have too many, thank goodness)—the people said, “This will become more or less a ghetto within no time.” Do you know, this housing project in which these people took part themselves and the places were built for about $10,000 each with their own labour in co-operative housing, of course, those people to-day have some of the nicest little homes and have kept them up, so that the whole little area of a block or two is a credit. It is amazing, and I think it can be done. I feel this is the way. Let us put the people there and let them feel they are part of the neighbourhood. If we keep it south of the railroad track or over the railroad track, they are always going to have that attitude; but if we can fit them in and make them feel part of the community, where they have a voice and can take part in the activities and their children go to the same school and the mothers and fathers are in the same home and school association, I think this is good. It is a hard up-hill fight, but we may have to do this.

Senator Fergusson: I agree with this, but that really does not answer my question. How do you make people who are already living there willing to accept the public housing?

Mr. Reid: I don't know. I think all you can do is to try what they have done in Charlottetown. They would not believe this five years ago, but I bet you that the people who live out there would believe it, and they would be the best ads we could get.

Senator Fergusson: That is probably how you would have to go about it.

Mr. Reid: I think you just have to jump into it; that is, the heads of government, whether municipal or what, have just got to go ahead and say, “We are going to try it”.

What we are doing, just as a little aside—it is not exceptional and I am sure it is done elsewhere—we have all through the province, (I don't know why,) a lot of widows who have all been left a little home. They own a little plot of land here and there, and they are having quite a lot of trouble. What we are doing, under the Canada Assistance Plan we have raised their little allotment. If they are getting $150, perhaps we raise it to $200, and we have gone to the bank with them, and said: “You lend this lady $50 a month for a year or two. She wants to fix her home”. We get the home fixed up as best we can, and $50 each month goes to the bank on her account from Canada Assistance. She is paying it, or she thinks she is paying it, and she is part of the deal. She signs the note, and we just guarantee that the money is going to be there. We feel this is worth while.

Senator Fergusson: Speaking of widows brings us to the fact that there are a large number of single women who are heads of families. They may be widows or separated or divorced. Is there a very large proportion of those on welfare in Prince Edward Island, women who are single heads of families?

Mr. Reid: I would say about 20 per cent. It really takes in our old mother's allowance.

Senator Fergusson: Do you still carry on mother's allowance?

Mr. Reid: No, everything now is under Canada Assistance.

Senator Fergusson: That is what I thought.

Mr. Reid: We have brought everything in and done away with those old categories. We have everything now based on the financial need. At one time a man had to be totally and permanently disabled in order to get $75 a month, and it was pretty difficult. Now he can be totally disabled, or he may be permanently but not totally, and we can give him help. Before you could not do this. He had to have a strict medical certificate that he was totally and permanently disabled, and all he could get then was $75 in any province of this country. Now we can get him $150 if he needs it, even if it is just for a month, as Senator Carter asked earlier. We do not limit him to a month or a year; we can give it any time, we can give it in just the same amount. He may need more for one month than he would need if he were on for 20 years. He might have more expense by sudden sickness than he would have over a long period. These are things you can do.

Getting back to your question, I would like to put in here that our real problem in housing with the placing of the units, this is a problem, but the real problem I find is to get something for the person who has not got the money. They are the ones that really cause us worry.

Last year we had, I think, in the city of Charlottetown about 90 people whose names were submitted by the Welfare Bureau. There are two welfare bureaus operating there. There were people who had no homes, who were being put up in second-rate accommodation. The heads of the bureaux said: "These people need housing". Do you know that when the 21 new units were created, not one of those people got in, not one. This is the thing that worries us; this is why we are trying to help these widows and everybody else.

Senator Pearson: How would the children of these people be received in these areas; do the kids mix freely with the others?

Mr. Reid: In Prince Edward Island, sir, people can mix better than anywhere I know. I was amazed and I did not realize he was there, but we have one little Negro boy in Charlottetown; I did not know this until one day I was in the barber's shop and he came in with two other boys, and they were the greatest chums. We do not seem to have any fixed judgment against people because of race or other denomination, or whether the boy is rich or poor. This does not enter into it. He is accepted for himself. This takes us back to the "everybody is born equal" idea, but we find that in Prince Edward Island things are pretty good that way. I have among my friends people who are rich and poor as far as that goes.

Senator Fergusson: How many Indians do you have still?

Mr. Reid: We have 230 Indians, and they are all pretty well in a little reserve called Lennox Island. Up in Malpeque Bay, and the population has dwindled. They are mostly oldsters and very young. Most of the active ones have migrated out to other provinces and up to the State of Maine, but we still have 230. The problem at this time—I should not say it is a problem, but we are encouraging them to go anywhere. We give them our services, we put them in our homes for the aged. We look after their child welfare problems, we take them on just like anybody else—except if they are living on the reservation. We say to them: "Now, you are wards of the Government of Canada. We do not want to touch your problems. You go and see your Indian agents". This is for Canada Assistance type of thing. If they are living off the reserve, we treat them like any other citizen.

Senator Fergusson: What about education? They can go to the same schools?

Mr. Reid: They can go the same schools. They have their own school on Lennox Island, but we are encouraging them to come off the island and mingle with the other people. We have one or two families scattered around. There is one enterprising chap whom we call Chief Redcliff of Rocky Point—you would know him, senator—who is in partnership with one of our own local men, doing a bang-up job on a little Indian village type of thing.

Senator Inman: But they can go to the same school?

Mr. Reid: Yes, they always have. We have had them over at the Rocky Point School the other side of Charlottetown. There is no racial prejudice.

Senator Fergusson: I do want to pursue the matter of the Central Mortgage and Housing recommendations. There was another one I would like to ask you about. The third is the involvement of citizens in community design processes. We all talk about this but we do not seem to make such effort to get them involved. In your province, has your welfare department had anything to do with citizen participation like this, have you supported it?

Mr. Reid: Our welfare department is at a little disadvantage at present. Welfare, for the time being in Prince Edward Island, is not in the housing field. We have what is called a housing authority in Prince Edward Island headed by the Minister of Education at present, and he is presently busily engaged building up a staff. He now has a good manager whom he got to come in there from the Royal Bank of Canada, a very good chap. I believe he now has a staff of about four people. I used to do this for them out of one of the drawers of my desk, and their senior citizens, and ran their senior citizen housing apartments all over the province, of which we had about 290. They are nice little places, and they are going to expand that a bit. In addition to that, we still operate the manors where we offer nursing services and care for the aged and infirm. These manors are very nice accommodation. We have expanded that, and we are going to expand that program again this year; but the senior citizens and the, you might say, the housing authority come under a different jurisdiction at present, so I cannot give you too much, except to say that they are expanding, and it has quite a place in the new development plan. I understand that the drawing board contains plans now for more apartments, and they are definitely going to be more of what you might call the hostel type of thing. At the present Montague, Summerside and Alberton have nice, up-to-date manors. These provide all nursing services and works for these older folks and people over 60. Now there is going to be a new one erected at Souris, and they are going to expand the ones at Montague and Alberton by another 24 beds. So this will give us a lot of accommodation.

We have in welfare at the present time 750 beds, which we operate for handicapped people. The great majority are over 60 years of age. Some of them are between 16 and 60 who are completely handicapped, like multiple sclerotics, paraplegics, quadraplegics, people who just cannot help themselves. We operate that, but we do not, senator, get into the housing department. We are interested and we have asked and made a submission to the housing authority asking them to do something about this great group of ours, the under-employed and the people who cannot afford to pay $100 to $150 a month rent.

Senator Fergusson: I am very interested in what you have done for older people in the way of housing in the Island. I think it is quite outstanding in Canada, for the size of your province, that you have made such good provision; but even if it does not come under your department, would you know if there is any citizen participation on this level?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: There is?

Mr. Reid: Meetings are held. They bring them together to discuss. I take it you are asking whether we should have a housing development created in a certain area. This is what we are planning for, yes.

Senator Fergusson: Is that not what it was created for, that they should participate in carrying it out?

Mr. Reid: Whether we listen to what the old folks want?

Senator Fergusson: Not the old folks.

Mr. Reid: No, but I mean the community as such. The first thing we do is to try to organize the people in the locality. The Women's Institute, and so on, they get together with the people who reside in these homes. We started this before, and it has taken about a year and a half to go. I made the mistake of going to Europe for three weeks, and while I was away they quietly took this thing out of my desk and moved it up the street. So we did not get on the job. We were trying to organize what we call clubs or community groups to sponsor and improve the situation and perhaps spread it out.

Another thing we would like to see in welfare, we feel that all these homes, the nursing homes and the apartments, have certain facilities which could be used by the community. We could have a counsellor there, for instance, once a week, and he could have older people who work as residents there and come in and talk over their problems. Things like this, these would be worth while.

Senator Fergusson: I think that is terrific, and we do realize that with this development of the homes you have to reach out in the community and give help to the older people, but you are speaking only of older people, while I am also interested in tenants in public housing who are not older people.

Mr. Reid: This is the group, senator, (I have mentioned this earlier, I think); I am sorry, I neglected this – the younger families, the married couples who are starting out to make their way in the world, having difficulties. Yes, I think this is true, that we have to do more. As far as welfare is concerned, we have made a submission to our housing authority asking them to come up with something. About all I can tell you to-day is that they have come forward with what they call some kind of plan for shell housing, to provide these homes which these younger people can come in and finish themselves. This will perhaps be helpful.

As you know, C.H.M.C. recently had increased their grants. Anyone almost can borrow now, but unfortunately the "almost" is still there. This is in the offing. Shell housing has definitely been proposed. It was in our Throne Speech the last session, and I hope it will come up again on 2nd June when our House reconvenes. It is definitely in the offing.

Senator Inman: I have a question, Mr. Chairman, on page 25, where you speak of expropriation law, family law, and so on. Is there any system of legal aid for the poor on the Island?

Mr. Reid: At the present time, senator, no, but there is, again, in the most recent Throne Speech provision for it. The legislation has been prepared, and it goes a little further, I understand, and in addition to this there is going to be help brought forward in the form of a family court. This is going to be helpful. This is all prepared, and I am sure will go right forward.

Senator Inman: So really up to the present time . . .

Mr. Reid: There is not anything, except that we advise the woman. An unmarried mother comes in to me and I have to advise her to see her lawyer; and unless her lawyer is a good-natured fellow and will take her case, she has a pretty rough time, except the help we can give her.

Senator Inman: And if the lawyer should take her case, most of the culprits leave.

Mr. Reid: The culprit leaves the province, and she is no further ahead. So we feel in this kind of welfare and in general welfare, we have felt the simplest thing to do is to help this poor woman with her problem; have the man in and talk to him and see if you can reason with him. That is all you can do, and if you can get them back together, fine; if you cannot, you help her all you can to get her back on her feet. Probably in some cases you will have to take her children and put them in one of the homes until she gets re-established well enough to take them back.

Senator Inman: What about if they need any advice on landlord and tenant matters, or anything which is personal?

Mr. Reid: Unless we can do it ourselves or can impose on the good nature of our Deputy Attorney General to advise, they have to go and make their own way to a lawyer.

Senator Inman: So that legal aid is badly needed.

Mr. Reid: Quite. There is no legal aid as such at present.

Senator Inman: On page 26 you speak about home nursing. Are there any nurses now that come in to see poor families with an invalid or somebody who has just come out of hospital and needs care? Have you any nurses?

Mr. Reid: First of all, senator, we have no V.O.N. in the province; that is one thing we have not got in Prince Edward Island. However, we do have a fairly active public health nursing set-up, and if they know of any home that needs help, no matter where it is in the province, if I suggest to them through welfare channels that they look in, they will. It is not a regular visiting service. The only regular visiting service we have offering nursing service, are three welfare bureaux, one in Summerside and two in Charlottetown. They have nurses attached, and they make regular visits daily to various homes in the city or in Summerside or wherever it may be.

Senator Inman: Is there a charge for this service?

Mr. Reid: There is a charge if they can pay, if they wish to. It is gratis, it is definitely free.

Senator Inman: I guess you are too young to remember when this Miss Earl used to operate in the dispensary.

Mr. Reid: Yes, this was the free dispensary, but this has been carried on by the two welfare bureaux. They both do this, and they have nurses that go around. As a rule they are student nurses from hospitals, and they go around under direction from the welfare bureaux and visit these needy homes, get the mothers cleaned up for the day, probably get the children their breakfast and send them off to school.

At the present time under our new development plan, we have a project put forward under the Health Department for what we call home nursing care. This would be an expansion of the public health nurses. They would have extra people who would take this on, and in addition to just the occasional visit where they would perhaps give an inoculation or make a bed, these people would go in and perhaps stay for the day. There will be a fee for this service if the people can pay. If they cannot pay, we will pay it under the Canada Assistance.

Senator Inman: Would they be a sort of home-maker type?

Mr. Reid: That is right, home-making/nursing; it is a kind of co-operative effort.

Senator Inman: At the present time if a person needed home nursing care, how would they go about contacting somebody to get it?

Mr. Reid: First of all, probably the family doctor would make arrangements if he could. If not, he might say: "You phone the nurses' registry". This is expensive and costs $20 or $25 a day. So what they have to do as a rule in the case of a needy family, they would come to my office or somebody in our department, and we would try to get one of the mothers who was on the relief or welfare roll, or one we know of who would go out, and we would pay her to go and keep house for that family whilst the mother, we will say, was in hospital or whatever the case may be. We have had to do this, so that a man can go to work, for instance. If the woman of the house is away busily negaged having another child, the man wants to carry on his work rather than stay home and lose his $15 a day so as to keep an eye on two or three children. We try to get a home-maker in there and let him go to work. In some cases he pays. If he has the wherewithal, he will pay; if he is a better type of fellow and one who has a job where he is making a reasonable amount, such as a railroader or something, he can do this; but there are lots of them who unfortunately cannot afford to pay, when we just put that home-maker in there and it is charged up to Canada Assistance as a welfare service 50/50.

Senator Inman: I think particularly of a convalescent case, or perhaps a person who would have to have a bed bath, but they cannot be in hospital because they are too full. That would need a nurse's aid perhaps. How would they contact you? They would still call you?

Mr. Reid: Likely would call us and ask us, and I would probably in this case get one of the aids from one of our homes to pop in there once or twice a day at a dollar a call or something to do this. This we have done, too. But 90 per cent of those, senator, when they get that serious, they come to somebody in the department and say: "We want a bed in one of those homes you are operating". I would say in the last two years 90 per cent of our cases have come to us from hospitals. This you will all be amazed at. They come out of hospital on stretchers, on crutches or in wheel-chairs, not able to walk out, this is the way they are being discharged, and we take them in our welfare institutions supposedly until they are able to walk again, but they get in there and they like it so well they stay there the rest of their days. We have them there, old folks, 100 years of age, and they stay with us. It gets to be home.

Senator Inman: Of course what we need is more hospital accommodation.

Mr. Reid: I think, senator, that on a per capita basis Prince Edward Island is pretty well off for hospital beds.

Senator Inman: Well, people are more hospital conscious to-day, and they go in for things they used to stay home for.

Mr. Reid: Another thing I think the senators here will be interested in. In Prince Edward Island we always had big homes, and it is just the same in rural Saskatchewan, I think. In the old days everybody was welcome in everybody's home. You always had a spare bedroom or two and there was no problem. To-day people are living in small apartments, living in one or two rooms on the second or third floor in the cities, and they do not have room to bring in visitors, or to keep mother and dad even after they are married. There is just no room. So we find that our homes, for aged people particularly, are in big demand.

Senator Inman: On page 36 I was rather interested in this where you are speaking about children placed in foster homes which are paid $60 a month per child irrespective of age or physical condition. That is so, is it not, that it is a flat rate of $60 a month?

Mr. Reid: Up to a point. We have been able to overcome that now that we have got involved in Canada Assistance. This is slightly astray. We are paying as much as $90 for problem children, bed-wetters and others that you just cannot get into homes, and we have some others with a problem. We are now trying to get the real problem children—the bad actors, and there are some little fellows who are full of life and will steal the foster parents' truck or tractor and put it over a bank and wreck it, things like that; we are trying to get these people into what we call group homes with a pair of foster parents particularly dedicated to taking six or eight of these children in knowing their problems and saying, "We are going to deal with these problems". We are going to try to have these homes. We are actually setting them up and we have two of them for girls at present. We are paying the foster parents a retainer, whether they have anybody in the home or not; they get so much a month on the understanding that they will take these problem children as the need arises.

Our next step is to make some provision for looking after the young men, because we find that at present we just do not have anywhere and we do not like to put them in gaols. I think you will all agree that is no place to put them. We are trying to get a foster home or group home which will look after these juvenile delinquents, as they are called for want of better words. We have no educational or institutional facilities as such for juvenile delinquents in the province. We have an agreement with both New Brunswick and Nova Scotia whereby we can send these problem people of ours away, but they must be committed to these institutions by the Courts. In the meantime, whilst awaiting sentence and so on, we feel it is wrong to have to put them in with the hardened criminals in the gaols. This is why we are trying to get as quickly as we can a group home, or at least one or two, for these problem young men. We have it now under control for the women; the young girls we can put there whilst awaiting transportation, say, to the school at Truro or Halifax. We now have these foster homes into which we can put them where they will be cared for under the direction of our child welfare officials and these foster parents.

Senator Inman: I was going to ask you about that problem of getting people, especially in the rural areas, to take these young people. That was not too successful at one time. Can you still do that?

Mr. Reid: Well, we have greatly improved the foster home situation. I think we have been getting probably a better type of woman. We had increased it. We used to pay just $30 a month.

Senator Inman: I know.

Mr. Reid: Now we are getting it up to $60 here, and we are paying $90 for problem children. By the way, this is just board. Anything else is incidental. If one of these children should take the family vehicle and wreck it, we pay for the damages and all that sort of thing, so really this is just, you might say, fringe benefits.

Senator Inman: What about their clothing?

Mr. Reid: That is all provided, senator—clothing, school books, anything they need; dental care, medical care, eye, ear and nose, everything.

Senator Pearson: In your brief you say that you would like more co-ordination in departments. We have already seen in some of the briefs we have received that there is considerable confusion in the welfare programs, and that the recipients did not know where to get their relief and did not know what their rights were. What did you plan in the way of co-ordination of your welfare or within your department, so that these people could be effectively looked after?

Mr. Reid: The first thing we have done, sir, under this overall plan, we have organized and have weekly meetings. As Deputy Minister of Welfare I sit in with the deputies of about seven other departments once a week, and we have been telling one another now for the last ten months or so what we do. This they did not know before, and I had no idea of some of the things that were done in education. I had no idea perhaps of all of the details that were carried on in health. I know that they had no idea what we did in welfare. So we have started to do that.

Then the next thing we have done, we have resident throughout the province our representatives who are located in more or less five major areas. We have people living right out in the community. The people out there, of course, get to know them; they know our representatives, and our investigators or welfare officers know where everybody lives. If I phone one of them and tell him I want him to see Joe Doakes, he will be out there to-morrow, because he knows where Joe Doakes is before he goes. He has a record, he looks up his little book to see: "What did we do for this fellow last time? What was his trouble?" This is the way we keep in touch.

What we plan on doing, and it is something I have been trying to get down to and which has to be done in great quantity, is to issue a little directory that will go out to key people in every centre, and which will be available in the thousands to the public. If they want to know, for instance, where does a handicapped person go for help, it will be in this little book where he goes.

If he comes to me, I am also co-ordinator of rehabilitation in the province, so I can tell an individual where to go to get treatment of this kind or that kind, whom to see and how to get there, and make arrangements. We are fortunate in being a small province. In the bigger provinces there are about 20 different people doing all these things. In our case, when I say greater co-ordination is necessary, I feel that we should know what the education department has to offer, what Manpower has to offer, what the labour department does, how I get a man into apprenticeship training. I think we should all know these things, the heads of the departments and the public should know, I agree with you, and they do not know.

They tell me in Prince Edward Island that they have trouble. I do not know of anybody having trouble getting to the Deputy Minister of Welfare. If they do, it is not his fault. They can come in. The door is always open. They can phone or write or do anything they like, or get in touch with one of our representatives. Clergymen can come in, and any representative, clear-thinking citizen can come and any time ask for help for one of their people. I think we are doing a fairly decent job, and in 48 hours we get somebody sitting down with that person in trouble. If it was a case of nothing to eat in the house, we get groceries there just in the time it takes to make a phone call to the nearest grocer. I think this is the way it should be done in any locality.

We, of course, in Prince Edward Island have a small community of 100,000. I could drive anywhere in Prince Edward Island pretty nearly within two hours from my desk, which is good. If all our provinces were divided into regions like this of, we will say, 1000 square miles in each one, I think we could do a pretty good job. As I mention in our brief, it is not going to be a cheap job but a costly one. However, if we are going to give the service we have to pretty nearly come to that.

Senator Pearson: Next I would like to ask about the question of an interim report. Listening to you this morning, I feel that Prince Edward Island is in pretty good shape as far as handling their welfare programs. I do not know whether they have sufficient money, but you have a good organization going there. What value do you think would come of an interim report from this committee?

Mr. Reid: As far as I am concerned, sir, when I say "interim report" I am not speaking of Prince Edward Island. This is a little difficult. As I understood this, this is to help the Canada-wide picture. I am trying to fit myself in as Prince Edward Island being a part of Canada. Is there any little thing that I could suggest that would help Canada, not just P.E.I.? I feel that all these things that are suggested here, like, for instance, your upgrading of the G.I.S., your upgrading of old age security, improving workmen's compensation (this is a provincial matter right across the board and it would have to be done by each of the ten provinces) and dealing with inflation—these are things that go way beyond Prince Edward Island.

I felt that if you felt that there was enough merit in these suggestions, that you could perhaps suggest to the Department of Welfare federally: "Let us get on with this".

I think you will all agree there is a white paper pending on welfare somewhere along the line, or at least those of us in welfare have been led to believe this. I feel that this is dragging on. Are we letting valuable time slip by on the Canada scene, not just P.E.I.? We are aware these things need to be done, and we have made our suggestions to the minister through the region down there. We have all met with him and had a good hearing a week or so ago, as the brief will show you; but I feel that if we are going to make this a good strong country—and I have been all over the world and I am pretty proud to be a Canadian—I think we should get at it on a Canadian basis, and if there is anything you good gentlemen can do to speed up the powers-that-be in their thinking I think it should be done.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to refer to page 25 where you are speaking of birth control and you suggest that the government in certain of its own programs and through support granted to independent agencies, make real options known and available to Canadians. You have said that Prince Edward Island has already served as a testing ground for some experiments and willing to act in that capacity again. Could your department do this for the people of Prince Edward Island, and could you not demonstrate how it could be carried out? If you did, it would be a service to every province.

Mr. Reid: It might be worth considering, senator. To be honest, this bit here I felt was worth repeating. This I gathered in reading one or two other briefs that were submitted to you, and I felt this was good. This is why I put it in there, as I mentioned in other places, just to emphasize I think it is good.

Senator Fergusson: It just occurred to me it might be tried out.

Mr. Reid: We could do this. It gets back to co-ordination, and we would have to contact our health people and say: "Would you go along with us on this?"

By the way, just as an aside, we have adopted another little plan. I do not think I mention it in here, but during the past year in addition to providing drugs, various pills and what-have-you, for former patients in our mental health institutes, we have adopted a policy of giving prescription drugs to all people who are on our welfare roll at present. This has been quite a help. This, we find, has been another extenuating circumstance in bringing on poverty in a lot of families, that is, they cannot afford the high cost of drugs. This we have done.

By the way, we have also instituted the program, in co-operation with our own department of health, whereby they provide these drugs for us through our own provincial pharmacist and it is no longer done through the drug store. We found that the drug store did give a good service, mark you, and was essential in certain things, but the difficulty was that the cost was terrifically high. We found we were paying as much as $10 for a $2 article.

Senator Pearson: You supply the patient with the cost or . . .

Mr. Reid: The patient is provided with the article, and we pay the bill to the department of health. The patient does not even receive the bill. It is free—well, it is not free but it is shared on the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: Senator Inman.

Senator Inman: One more question. Speaking of families on welfare, has the province given any thought to giving work to the people where there are projects that have been thought? I am thinking of reforestation, which is going to be very necessary in the world; taking some of the group who would perhaps rather work instead of families being on public assistance.

Mr. Reid: This is what we do to-day with our work activity projects. We bring those people in who have not an opportunity to get a job in their community; they have been on assistance because they cannot get anything. They would work if they knew how to work and had an opportunity. We are going to train these people, and we have made arrangements with Manpower that when we get, say, 10 people trained who can paint, they would come to us and say: "We will take some of those fellows and put them to work in a ship yard or wherever they need painters or whatever it may be, such as handymen." This is what we are going to try to do.

As I said before, when the election broke on us, we had 60 of these people ready to go, and I hope now we are ready to get the green light to go ahead, bring this many in and get them off the relief rolls. In other words, instead of getting $100 or $150 a month, I would hope that that man would probably take home $195 a month. It would give him a little incentive, and he would be able to say: "I am working for a living".

It is much the same thing as we had under the old winter works thing, where we brought people in from the country and had them cutting wood and things like that.

Senator Inman: I am thinking back to the 1930's, when they were paying out dole in the winter months, and I said to the mayor of Summerside, "Why don't you get these people out shovelling snow?" Some of them would rather do this than receive the dole, even in the majority of cases. It seems a strange thing to be handing out this . . .

Mr. Reid: As long as it is work for wages and not work for relief, we can do it; but there is a marked tendency to-day that you cannot ask a person to work for his groceries or whatever; it has got to be for a pay cheque.

Senator Inman: But surely there are some things that could be done.

Mr. Reid: I agree with you, I think we all agree. In our case we have all our various homes, and if we could take these people and get all the rooms painted, I think this is worth while, and the taxpayer is getting something and the individual is taking home a pay cheque to his family. With some of these individuals, unfortunately, we may have to take the pay cheque and give it to the good lady, because you cannot trust some of these men to take the cheques home, but this is something we may have to do.

Senator Pearson: It must be a bad province.

Mr. Reid: Well, I do not think we are any worse than any others, perhaps.

The Chairman: I think we have to clear up one matter. The welfare system in your province is at the provincial level, not at the municipal level.

Mr. Reid: Well, sir, yes, the provincial level; we have just one provincial unit in a sense, except that we have two municipalities working as such, the city of Charlottetown and the town of Summerside who do work as units. They have in the city of Charlottetown two welfare bureaus. We have, the same as Newfoundland, the old religious system of Protestant and Catholic, so that we have two welfare bureaus and they are charged by agreement with the city and with us with providing assistance to the needy people within the area, the city of Charlottetown; and Summerside, the town has its own set-up.

The Chairman: Do they contribute?

Mr. Reid: They contribute absolutely nothing, except they keep the records. They send in the claims to us, and we repay them 100 per cent of what it costs, 50/50 federally.

The Chairman: The point I wanted to be clear to the committee was that the department is at the provincial level without contribution by any of the municipalities.

Mr. Reid: Right.

The Chairman: You say in some of the municipalities you may have—for instance, we dealt with the Catholic Women's League in Charlottetown which came before us I recall they were given a budget which they had to live within and something that they could not over-run.

Mr. Reid: I think you are speaking now of the Catholic Welfare Bureau.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Reid: They are members of the Prince Edward Island United Fund, and this is the budget they would be speaking of; but as far as needy people go, whether they have 100 or 250 families who need help, they can give it, and as long as they live within the budget deficit system of Canada Assistance, this is all right. There is no limit on the assistance that they can grant, but they must live within their salary and all that sort of thing for their own, you might say, pure maintenance and so on. This does not enter it. The assistance given to needy people is shareable 100 per cent; if they have ten families or 110, it does not matter.

My recollection is—I could be wrong and I have not looked at the evidence recently—but as I recall they were spending about $8,000 a month at the time; and when they asked them the question about increasing the allowances in certain circumstances, they indicated to us that they could not go beyond that, and they had to make that fit into the number of people that they had on assistance.

Mr. Reid: There is something wrong there, sir. As far as assistance goes, they have the same rules as we have. If a family merits $410 a month, they can give it to them, and if everything is above board and they qualify for that under the needs basis we send them back $410.

I think you will find, sir, that the thing that is worrying them is that they are definitely limited by the United Fund to a specific budget which they must live within, but this has nothing to do with their help to needy families, nor with their child welfare Act. These are reimbursed 100 per cent.

The Chairman: I think you said to the committee this morning that information to the recipients is pretty well lacking. You are not alone in that respect. It is true from the hearings we have had insofar as provincial governments are concerned. However, you have been aware of that, sir, for some time, and it is one of the really serious matters insofar as it affects the poor people. My question to you has to be: Why has not some of that been done beforehand?

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, seriously speaking, I do not think that our people in Prince Edward Island lack information nearly as much as we are told they do, because there is no difficulty. They come in, and if they have a problem they can come in again to-morrow. We do not chase them. They are welcome at any time. They do not have to have an appointment, and as far as we are concerned I doubt very much if it is as serious. After all, we are only 1000 square miles with 110,000 people. I do not think our problem is as bad as some people paint it. Perhaps I am wrong but I don't think it is.

The Chairman: I do not think anyone is painting your problem that bad.

Senator Pearson: You have good roads down there; you can get around.

Mr. Reid: The roads are pretty good. Another thing about it, I do not know of any other province where, we will say, the Deputy Minister of Welfare will pick a crippled child up and take him from that province to another to get an artificial leg and bring him back, things like this. The health people cannot do this, but we do it in welfare, and I think we should do it. They have rules that restrict them, and they cannot pick up a patient and take him.

The Chairman: But you make the rules in welfare yourself.

Mr. Reid: I think these are little things that worry me. I agree we do not have enough propaganda, and we are going to have to do something.

The Chairman: As I saw the list for Prince Edward Island, I gathered that your welfare list has declined last year particularly.

Mr. Reid: I think what is giving that, you were looking at a graph in connection with this merit, and I think what has happened is that away back in 1966 there was a great . . .

The Chairman: I did not look at that, or I ignored that, but I looked at 1967, 1968 and 1969, and you were down in 1969.

Mr. Reid: Yes. Well, we have improved because of our industry. We have more packing plants and our fishing plants have eased the strain a bit. All these things have helped. As our plan unfolds I hope, as I mentioned this morning, that we will have even less.

The Chairman: Are you part of Medicare?

Mr. Reid: As of 1st December, sir. I might say this, that we in welfare have for the last three years had a plan whereby anybody who was receiving assistance, anybody and his dependents, can also have free medical care. We have enrolled all these people under a local Blue Shield Plan for which we pay the premium. I think it is now about $37.50 per capita. We have around 9,000 people under that plan at the present time.

The Chairman: I am told there was recently some, perhaps not legislation, but special directives for tenant and landlord relationships, or is that in the making?

Mr. Reid: I believe, sir, these have been passed. They are an order-in-council. This was done about two or three months ago.

The Chairman: Those are new, to meet that special situation.

Now, guaranteed loan for the poor, how extensive is that?

Mr. Reid: As far as at the present time, sir, I should say it is nil.

The Chairman: But you said there was something.

Mr. Reid: We are doing something, but it is more or less the sort of thing that we are just doing in conjunction with their normal assistance, and they go and make the arrangements for themselves. We are not giving guaranteed loans as such.

The Chairman: No, there are some people I gathered from what you told us, that sort of help for home improvements?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

The Chairman: How extensive is that?

Mr. Reid: Very, very small percentage; I would perhaps say one per cent of the case load.

The Chairman: All right. Your case load is 4,000 approximately. What has been the incidence of loss, if any?

Mr. Reid: To date we have had none.

The Chairman: None at all.

Senator Inman: There was mention in your brief some place about an increase in recipients. Why would there be any increase?

The Chairman: Increase in what?

Senator Inman: In recipients.

The Chairman: In numbers? He said there is a decrease.

Mr. Reid: There has been a slight decrease in P.E.I., but this is in the overall region.

Senator Inman: You mentioned they might have expected an increase.

Mr. Reid: I think it is an increase in the overall amount of payment of moneys; not so much in numbers as the overall amount, because we are trying to bring people up-to-date with the times.

Senator Inman: I was thinking that our population is pretty nearly static.

Mr. Reid: That is right. No, this is from a regional report, you will notice, and it is based on the overall amount of payments. For instance, I know my friends in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would like to be able to afford more for their needy people. This is their hope.

The Chairman: Let me just tell you this. This is Mr. MacPherson of the Catholic Welfare Bureau, and it is on page 4: 38, on November 6, 1969. Let me read that page to you:

The Chairman: You said that when there are changes made in the social assistance, no one appeared to know it except the person directly concerned. What have you in mind on the changes? Do the changes need consent; can it be made at the local level? I am thinking of consent of other governments.

Mr. MacPherson: Before we speak of changes the poor are not even informed of the legislation that is now available to them. Our Social Assistance Act states that a family of seven needs $325 a month just to meet their basic needs, but when they come into the office you can't afford to give them this $325, so you try to give them $150 to $175 and you say, 'You make both ends meet on this,' They don't know their rights. Legislation has said, 'We know you need this and it should be available to you, but it's not. We are not going to tell you about the program.' It sounds good for a government to come out at election time and say that this is what we are going to do, but in order to implement it we need the money and our island here hasn't got the money.

That was my recollection.

Mr. Reid: How much did he say, sir, because I will tell you, just to put you in the picture, that he came to us last fall, province where they had a minimum of $150. It is now $175 that they give over there. He is just a transplant; he does not belong to the Island. What I am trying to get at is why a man would make a statement like this.

The Chairman: I don't know. I was there.

Mr. Reid: Reading between the lines, this is what he was trained on. Before he came he was limited to $150. He is not limited in Charlottetown. If that family need some three hundred and some dollars, he can give it. We will straighten him out.

The Chairman: I recall we were examining him at that time and he gave evidence and we listened to him. He was the director of the Catholic social services, or the assistance director, and he gave us that information. Your information to-day is a contradiction on what he said anyway.

Mr. Reid: I would hope so. I am afraid he is carrying back to this previous association, and this is unfortunate. I like to get at these things, as you do, and we will fix it.

The Chairman: That is what I came out with anyway. It was a story that we had heard very often before, and it is a little different that when you tell it to-day.

Mr. Reid: We might chisel a man who, for instance, is entitled to $315; we might give him $312, but we certainly would not do a thing like that.

The Chairman: No, but, Mr. Deputy Minister, we were listening to people who were telling us their story, were examining them. That was the question I asked him because it is a normal question for us to ask. This was his answer and there was no other answer to it. To some extent our minds are oriented towards that kind of thinking.

Mr. Reid: This is very helpful to me.

The Chairman: There was something here about the working poor and medical aid. Very often in some of the provinces for the working poor we see medical, dental and other aid almost automatically. Do you do that?

Mr. Reid: Not unless they are on our roll; unless they are on our roll we cannot do it.

The Chairman: Let us put it this way. A man to whom you are giving some assistance, you will put him on the medical aid and . . .

Mr. Reid: Drugs and whatever is normal, whatever he needs.

The Chairman: Medical and drugs; even glasses?

Mr. Reid: Glasses.

The Chairman: Glasses, hearing aid?

Mr. Reid: Anything.

The Chairman: I see. You have a head-start program.

Mr. Reid: That is down in King's County, sir.

The Chairman: How is it getting on?

Mr. Reid: I understand very good indeed. They are doing a lot of this experiment in day care and that sort of thing. I understand they are training ladies who will go out and do day care and also, we hope, will train ladies in some home-maker services which will be very useful.

The Chairman: Do you co-ordinate with them?

Mr. Reid: Yes, we are in touch with them. In fact, the director of their day care services there and their children's efforts are working with us now in preparing legislation for the province to look after day care centres and so on.

Senator Inman: Do you find much of a need for day nurseries for working mothers with children? Is there any thought of that?

Mr. Reid: This is the sort of thing, day nurseries for children, that would enable mothers to go to work in fish plants and things like that. This is what they are expanding an effort to do at present, getting this line up. We find that not only this but they are providing day care for children of more or less under-privileged homes where perhaps there is not as much heat, where father and mother do not get along. There may be an alcohol problem. I understand from the reports we get from these good people, that it is surprising the improvement these little ones are making. They can even see the difference when these kids come to the centre on Monday after being home for two or three days in the environment of the home. In some cases they almost have to start over again to break down the antagonism of these little fellows on being given proper leadership, discipline and so on.

The Chairman: How big a staff do you have in welfare?

Mr. Reid: In our Department of Welfare, sir, we have a staff in the office and in general of about 40.

The Chairman: And how many in the field?

Mr. Reid: Which includes about 12 field staff.

The Chairman: How many points outside of Charlottetown?

Mr. Reid: Do we have people located?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Reid: Five.

The Chairman: Where?

Mr. Reid: Souris, Montague, Charlottetown, Summerside, Elerslie, Montrose which is outside Alberton.

The Chairman: Those are central points and you have a man stationed?

Mr. Reid: Lives there.

The Chairman: He would be alone or have somebody with him?

Mr. Reid: No, he is alone.

The Chairman: He looks after an area?

Mr. Reid: All we have to do is to send the information out to him or phone him, and he only comes in when he is called in. We do not drag him in all the time.

The Chairman: How many social workers? By that I mean, how many trained, qualified social workers would you have on your staff?

Mr. Reid: On our staff all our trained social workers at present are on our child welfare division, and at the present time we have four.

The Chairman: In the welfare?

Mr. Reid: Right, in the child welfare division.

The Chairman: When we are speaking of welfare, you define it for us. What does it include in addition to the welfare of the poor?

Mr. Reid: It includes the child welfare division, rehabilitation of disabled people, and our homes. When I say I have a staff of 40, this is just our main office staff, this is general welfare and child welfare and not including the institutions in that.

The Chairman: No.

Mr. Reid: Because the institutions run a staff of perhaps 350 people or so.

The Chairman: Last year you spent approximately . . .

Mr. Reid: $7,200,000.

The Chairman: Which was an increase of almost a million and a half over the year before.

Mr. Reid: You will be interested to know, Mr. Chairman, that I have been with the department now since 1956, about 14 years, and our budget has increased from about $800,000 up to approximately $8,000,000, tenfold.

The Chairman: Well, in 1956 you are many years away from 1970.

Mr. Reid: But we are coming on, gradually increasing.

The Chairman: There was an increase in spending last year; there was some slight reduction in the numbers. What brought on the increase?

Mr. Reid: Trying to better the allotment to the needy people. The rates were increased.

The Chairman: The rates were increased.

Mr. Reid: We are trying all the time to get more and more for these people, and we review their cases, and we are trying to get them up to the maximum as much as we can.

The Chairman: And you are quite clear for the committee, that there is no cut-off point where you say: "This much and no more, no matter how many children you have"?

Mr. Reid: The only cut-off is based on the financial need of that family, that is all.

The Chairman: As you find the need. It is not based on the pocketbook of the province?

Mr. Reid: No.

The Chairman: Is this what you are saying?

Mr. Reid: That is right.

The Chairman: Have you in other years run a deficit?

Mr. Reid: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: You have, in the department?

Mr. Reid: And our government has always voted it in for us.

The Chairman: Considerable?

Mr. Reid: Last year, as I remember, it was about in the vicinity of $600,000—$807,000 last year. They made that up. In other words, they realize you have to put that out. This was our budget and this is what we actually paid out.

Senator Fournier: Are you short of money? If you had more money, could you help more people?

Mr. Reid: Yes. If we had more money, sir, we could increase our rates. I feel we could increase our overall budget system, make our allowances more generous. We could train more badly needed people for counselling and supervision of a decent welfare plan, which any province would like to have. We could, as I think Senator Inman indicated earlier, create more job opportunities. This is one of the important things. Those are three things we could definitely do if we had more money.

Senator Fournier: Do you have the situation whereby a person is better off on relief than working; he can make more money by not working and being on relief?

Mr. Reid: No, I do not think we actually have that, although some of them take that attitude. I personally feel, and I always advise anybody, that they are much better off working even though it may only be $20 a month. But what can you do with a person if you say: "You get $100 on assistance. If you work you get $120 or $125"? There is perhaps not enough incentive in the spread, but we have that sort of person and I think we have them in every province. I do feel that a man is always better off working than he is on relief.

Senator Fournier: Do you have a policy whereby you like to give encouragement to a man to remain on his job instead of going on relief?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Senator Fournier: And you have a policy whereby, assuming that he has an earning capacity of $60 and he needs maybe $80 . . .

Mr. Reid: Yes, we do that, we try; we are presently supplementing. But, again, this is a point we mentioned earlier, that we would prefer that a man's income would be such that we do not have to supplement. We do not think this is good.

This will shock you good people, but within the last three years we have had people working for the government in our province receiving an allowance from our department at the same time. I felt this was wrong. I went to the minister concerned and I said: "You should do something about this". One of the members was on our welfare committee, one of the ministers, and he did. That man now, instead of getting about $200 to keep himself, he was a paraplegic and we had trained him as a draughtsman, and they gave him a job, sure, but he was only getting about $100 to keep himself, four children and his wife. He just could not do it, so we had to subsidize him and now he is getting, I think, around $420 a month, which lets us off the hook and he is no longer on relief, which is the way it should be.

Senator Fournier: Thank you, sir.

Senator Pearson: What percentage of assistance do the federal government pay?

Mr. Reid: Fifty-fifty, sir, on the direct assistance. They pay 50 per cent also on any of our salaries, our staff and so on whom we have engaged since 1st January, 1966, since the inauguration of the plan, but it is a 50/50 deal.

There is another thing I think we have to realize that makes for the cost in this, and that is the contacting. We have to make all the contacts or visits, the repeat visits; the services all have to be pretty well rendered by the province. Sure, the federal government shares in a 50/50 deal in regard to welfare services which they approve all right, but they do not share in all the travelling expenses and some of these involvements that you run into, but they do share on the direct welfare cost.

Senator Pearson: The direct payment to the recipient.

Mr. Reid: Yes. One good thing that came out of the Canada Assistance Plan when it was finally adopted, was the sharing of the cost of child welfare. This was a good thing and it was a big break for our province particularly. They are sharing 50 per cent now of the cost of our foster home care and all that sort of thing in connection with children who are awaiting adoption and wards of the province.

The Chairman: Under the Canada Assistance Act?

Mr. Reid: Under the Canada Assistance Act, yes. This has been a big help.

The Chairman: May I, on behalf of the committee, thank you for the pains that you took in presenting the brief, which has been carefully considered by the committee.

We are impressed by the fact that there is a definition for need, and it is a human and very humane definition of need, which is something that is very vital to the people concerned. It is a realistic one.

We appreciate, of course, the interest and concern in the problem in Prince Edward Island, and the fact that they are spending 17 per cent of their total budget in welfare of various kinds, which is a little more than some of the other provinces are spending. It indicates an attempt to deal humanely with the people of the province.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, before we close, may I ask a question which may not be relevant to the brief but which I would like answered. What do you do with your retarded children?

Mr. Reid: It is pretty well under the Retarded Children Association's jurisdiction. They are a voluntary agency, as you know, but we do have a fairly wide-awake mental health division in our province headed up by Dr. Beck, and they provide more or less a constant counselling service to these families and for the children involved.

In addition to that we have a retarded children's school set up in the Department of Education. There are about four or five of these classrooms operating about the Island now. The Department of Education supplies the teachers, specially trained. I understand, and I understand that the C.A.R.C. supplements, instead of the normal, you might say, town. In the City of Charlottetown, the city does pay the teacher, but in some of the smaller areas the association puts up a subsidy. Those are functioning.

Then we have what is called a home for retarded children — Sherwood Hospital. It is a little residence for 21 children, a nice little place where 21 are in residence under foster parents' care, and the meals are served from the parent Riverside Hospital nearby.

In addition to that there is operated there a day school for the retarded, and this is one similar to those in Montague and Summerside. The children are brought in by bus by the Legion in this case. They come in and spend the day there. We have those schools.

In addition to that, once they get to be young adults there is a problem, and they have created, as you probably remember, what we call an occupational training school just outside Charlottetown near the Charlottetown rural high school. These young people are brought in there to give training in handicrafts and in, we will say, vocational things such as bookbinding. The girls are trained, as I understand it, in looking after motel accommodation, maid work and this sort of thing. This is actually being done for the young people. I understand that Manpower even participate in some of these courses where the people are training, and they will share in the cost of the regular allowances paid for the courses.

Senator Fournier: I think you are better organized than many of the richer provinces across Canada.

Mr. Reid: Again, I think it may be due to the fact that we are a small, compact unit, and it is a little easier for our people to get together.

The Chairman: I think also we had Dr. Beck before us and he is a dynamo.

Mr. Reid: Yes.

The Chairman: In this particular work, and as I recall him he gave us quite a broad view as to what is being done. They have leadership there that we had not seen before.

Senator Fournier: I think so.

The Chairman: If there is nothing further, on behalf of the committee I thank you.

Mr. Reid: Thank you, sir; thank you, ladies and gentlemen.

The Committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

BRIEF TO THE SPECIAL
SENATE COMMITTEE

ON POVERTY

DEPARTMENT OF WELFARE

PROVINCE OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

Introduction

The Department of Welfare of the Province of Prince Edward Island sincerely appreciates the opportunity afforded it to present a Brief on Poverty to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty at this time, we wish to take advantage of the occasion to say we have followed your proceedings and deliberations with interest and we want to compliment you, Mr. Chairman and your Committee on the time, effort and thoroughness you are putting into your enquiry.

Creation of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, we believe, was truly a step in the right direction. Its activities since its inception are resulting in a tremendous impact on the problem and as never before are involving the welfare-minded section of this country in a deep search for solutions.

Your Committee has definitely brought out the fact that poverty is a country-wide problem varying from region to region in its intensity and complexity. It is our hope as we present our thoughts concerning the problem as it affects the Province of Prince Edward Island that the information we provide in our Brief will be of some assistance in reaching conclusions which may help in solving the problem of Poverty in Canada.

You will note we have probably refrained from referring to a number of appendices and I am sure that you will also notice a lot of our thoughts are identical with those expressed in other Briefs presented to your Committee. However, we are all thinking about the same problem and, therefore, a lot of our thinking must be along the same lines, our hope being that with repetition important points may be brought to the fore. If after consideration of our Brief the Committee should have any questions pertaining thereto we will be only too happy to provide information verbally or should it not immediately be at hand at the time it will be our pleasure to forward same to the Committee in writing as all information put forward can be substantiated by reliable statistics, already in the hands of your Committee or available to them upon request.

Poverty

Poverty is a complex thing. It is not simply low income nor lack of material things, it is not a condition at birth (we are all born equal), it is not any one factor nor even several factors combined since they can be offset by other factors. It is a most difficult subject on which to give any complete and precise definition.

Poverty can be considered as a mixture of low or no income, inadequate food, clothing and housing, lack of opportunity, health problems, social exclusion and other indignities. Poverty may be compared to the human body lacking thought, anticipation and future aspiration; its real tragedy is that it liquidates the human, precludes hope, erodes expectation and is a form of dying.

As we see Poverty, it is so complex that we have no hesitation whatsoever in leaving a detailed definition to specialists or in accepting the definition used by the Economic Council in their Fifth Annual Review.

Some authorities consider those to be in the low income group who spend on the necessities of life over three-quarters of their income. The balance of income left at their disposal is usually considered so small as to leave the individual and family in the grouping generally accepted as being in poverty.

Another yardstick used in measuring poverty on this Continent is to regard those in such a classification if their income falls below approximately—

$1800 for an individual
3000 for a family of two 3600 for a family of three 4200 for a family of four 4800 for a family of five

To keep these figures up-to-date 5 per cent should be added annually to cover inflation.

Should these figures be accepted on a national basis then we would find a very high percentage of families on Prince Edward Island would be included in this poverty classification.

Extent of Poverty in Canada

With regard to the extent of poverty in Canada this Department is not in position to provide much useful data as we are limited to knowledge of our own Province. However, we can truthfully state that many of the Federal Welfare Programmes have failed to accelerate with inflationary trends. Likewise, salaries and income in Prince Edward Island in many areas and particularly with respect to our primary farming and fishing industries have also failed to increase at current inflation rates prevalent in Central Canada. On the other hand, cost of living has increased more in line with increases in the larger industrial areas. The foregoing factors indicate that as long as these trends continue more and more of our citizens will fall into the various categories of poverty.

Some Suggestions Worthy of Prompt Action

1. Old Age Security payments should be increased:

The statutory provision which increases by 2 per cent in any year is insufficient and should be corrected. The Minister of Health and Welfare has said that adjustments in pension legislation must await presentation of a White Paper on social policy. He has recently added that legislation arising from this White Paper is not likely to come about before possibly two sessions of Parliament. This certainly slows down the help process and we urge something be done to speed up matters.

The basic old age security benefit was at a level of $76.50 per month January 1, 1968. It rose to $79.58 effective January 1, 1970. The $3.08 increase in basic old age security benefits since 1 January 1968 is far behind the escalation of prices in the same period. Indeed the buying power of the pension is upwards of 7 per cent less than it was three years ago.

Guaranteed Income Supplement suffers from the same deficiency. The net result has been that upwards of one and one-half million old age security recipients are worse off at a time in life when they can expect additional expense pressures for such things as special foods, medicines, hearing devices, etc. The situation is, of course, most serious for the 785,000 Canadians who receive the G.I.S., particularly those (62 per cent) who receive the full supplement.

Provinces are attempting to meet the needs of such persons in various ways. British Columbia uses the Canada Assistance Plan to provide a $150 monthly income to those who meet "needs" qualifications. The additional costs are shared 50-50 with the federal government. The Ontario Government has announced a $100 tax rebate program to assist home owners and tenants of self-contained housing units. Such programs are of undoubted value in meeting the needs of some thousands of older citizens.

We would stress however, that there are provinces who cannot provide an adequate guaranteed income level for older persons because they find it hard to provide their 50 per cent of an income supplement under the Canada Assistance Plan and the Atlantic Provinces (P.E.I. included) fall into this category.

In any event, many older persons requiring assistance do not take advantage of the program because they "do not want to go on welfare".

It would appear the appropriate action here is to amend the Old Age Security Act and remove the 2 per cent limitation, permitting the level of increase to correspond to actual cost of living changes.

Indeed, given the increasing numbers of persons who must make use of the G.I.S. provision (including 62 per cent or more who require the full G.I.S. benefit), we suggest prompt consideration be given to adjust the level of the basic $79.58 benefit upwards, in view of the actual experience of the last four or five years.

2. Unemployment Insurance

At the present time increasing unemployment is being permitted as a weapon against inflation. The rapid increase in the numbers of unemployed persons is revealing the inadequacies of range of coverage and scale of benefits in force and we agree with those who feel this program should be more total in coverage and benefits should be increased to represent a greater percentage of lost earnings.

In testimony before your Committee, the Department of Labour noted that "unemployment insurance does not lift a poor man out of his poverty". We feel about all it does is to push the person (and his family) toward poverty and welfare dependency.

It should be noted, too, that maximum weekly benefits are (since June 30, 1968) $53.00 per week for a person with one or more dependents, and $42.00 for a person with no dependents. Given the cost changes in the period since June 1968, these levels are some 6 to 7 per cent short of keeping up with rising costs.

If unemployment remains for some time at its present level this means that some 1,000,000 Canadians have been eased into poverty, and will endure serious economic hardship, psychological stress and the possible loss of assets hard-won over the years.

This is a National problem and we would again suggest prompt remedial action by the Government of Canada.

Specifically, we suggest:

(i) increase of benefits to a level representing at least three-quarters of previous average earnings.

(ii) supplementary benefits that will cover (on behalf of the claimant and family) premium costs for related federal-provincial insurance programs—e.g. medicare and hospital care. We stress this because of the relatively high premiums for such services in at least half the Canadian Provinces, meaning in effect that either coverage lapses or the household squeezes expenditures on necessities to meet such costs.

(iii) enlargement of the range of the program to include most, if not all, salaried, professional and other members of the labour force not now covered, including those working for charitable and religious institutions and foundations. Such enlargement of the program range would enlarge the fund available for benefits. At the same time it will bring to cover those persons once thought relatively immune from unemployment, but now becoming vulnerable as a result of shifts in personnel and technology patterns in business and industry (e.g. middle income range and upper income range technicians, professionals, etc.)

3. Workmen's Compensation

The arguments we have advanced concerning improved benefit levels for old age security and unemployment insurance apply also to Workmen's Compensation benefits so we suggest benefit levels should be reviewed by the provinces and brought closer into line with the claimant's previous earnings level and the current living costs for the region.

If workmen's compensation programs are to maintain individuals and families in non-income-earning periods, benefit levels must be adjusted to provide a realistic percentage of previous earnings and relate to actual living costs.

4. Inflation Combat Programmes

We feel the Government of Canada should review current programs to combat inflation and modify them in view of their present detrimental effect on the poor.

At present, the lowest income groups are hit by high prices; at the same time the programs of economic slow-down have resulted in half a million Canadians becoming unemployed, with punishing effects on at least another half million persons who constitute their dependents.

Business and labour can still act to advance, or at least stabilize, their positions.

The Economic Council of Canada warned (in the Sixth Annual Review) of the possibilities of over-reaction and/or inappropriate reaction to the general inflationary situation.

Just recently, one of your colleagues, Senator Maurice Lamontagne asked Government to recognize the "cost-push" character of the current inflationary process and to tone down programs and remedies that are more appropriate to a "demand-pull" situation.

Current inflation in Canada, and in the Western world, said Senator Lamontagne is "structural, not cyclical in character . . . it is quite possible to have at the same time cost-push inflation and deficient aggregate demand; rising prices and recession . . . Yet most governments persist in fighting price increases as if they originated from a temporary excessive demand".

We ask that the Government of Canada review present policies in the light of that argument.

The economically weak cannot stand greater pressure, this is simply a deliberate escalation of poverty at a time when we ought to be seeking to eliminate it.

We would suggest that firmer pressures on the economically powerful—a firm limiting of price increases; and an accompanying restraint on upper wage levels—combined with selective improvements in the economic position of the weaker economic groups of society would be a more effective strategy, both short-term and long-term. If present policies remain unchanged, the most vulnerable groups in society (the disabled, the aged, the injured, the unemployed, the low-income wage-earner, and the welfare recipient) will be weaker than ever before, and the gap between the affluent and the deprived will have widened dangerously. Such a development would create severe social problems.

Moreover, these same groups will be the ones hardest hit by increases in real property taxes (which are of course passed on in rents) and by indirect taxes on purchase items increased automatically by rising prices.

We therefore feel that modification of present fiscal and monetary strategy must accompany the kinds of immediate program benefit improvements we have recommended. We are very much aware of the importance of controlling inflation. Nonetheless we question the effectiveness and the justice of present remedies.

Long-term plans to eliminate poverty leave much to be desired if in the present crisis and stress we revert to the traditional method of asking the poor to bear the heaviest human and economic costs to keep the "system" working! Poverty in Canada will never be eliminated by simply making adjustments in existing programs, nor by the introduction of new programs alone.

As the work of your Committee has shown, to eliminate poverty a fundamental re-statement of policy must take place and new styles of service must be developed. Axioms have to be challenged; assumptions examined.

We suggest, too, that fiscal and monetary axioms are in need of examination to determine their present appropriateness.

5. Canada Assistance Plan

We suggest prompt federal action to help Provinces review grants and allowance levels of public assistance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan, and to improve the range of programs that are cost-shared under the Plan so that . . .

(i) assistance rates may be reviewed and increased as necessary to reflect price changes.

(ii) provinces may bring into their general program of assistance some of the items or services that are now regarded as "special assistance" or discretionary . . . e.g. provision of drugs, prosthetic appliances, dental services, etc.

(iii) provinces may extend the reach of assistance programs to meet some of the urgent needs of the 'working poor'. This provision of CAP is used with considerable effectiveness in Alberta and need not involve demeaning "investigative procedures". It is unfortunate that corrective health procedures may be stalled because essential drugs or devices cannot be provided under public auspices to those who are working and who therefore are adjudged to be "not in need".

(iv) provinces not now doing so begin to assist Day Care Services through the provisions of CAP. Here again we stress the importance of the "prevention" possibilities of the CAP. We agree with others that if benefit levels of federal income maintenance programs can be raised to sound levels, the provinces should be able to shift resources to improve the adequacy of public assistance (welfare) grants and at the same time undertake support and preventive programs that will help the working poor and, in fact, the entire community.

6. Recommendation to Committee

We recommend that the Special Senate Committee on Poverty issue an interim report at the earliest date possible and that this report propose such prompt actions by both federal and provincial governments as will prevent further deterioration in the economic and social position of the poor, and forestall increases in the numbers of persons in poverty. We are convinced that remedial actions are possible now, in spite of inflationary pressures and that such actions can prepare the way for more comprehensive anti-poverty, human development programs based on the proposed Federal White Paper on Social Policy and from the continuing work of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

Among the recommendations of such a report, we suggest including:

- i) increased old age security benefits, including the guaranteed income supplement
- ii) improved unemployment insurance benefits and coverage
- iii) reforms and improvements in Workmen's Compensation programs
- iv) review and modification of current federal anti-inflationary monetary and fiscal policies
- v) federal-provincial action to improve social assistance benefits and to develop more preventive programs under provision of the Canada Assistance Plan.

Some Suggestions for an All-out Attack on Poverty in Canada

Obviously it is beyond our capacity to outline a comprehensive, inter-connecting network of policies that are required to eradicate poverty in Canada. Your Committee has received a wealth of testimony from varied sources and competencies. To review that testimony and the studies of the Committee itself is to be aware that the war on poverty will NOT be won unless it is fought on many fronts.

However, we feel that:

a) the evidence shows already that poverty will not be eliminated in this country until we collectively actually do something about it. What is required of us is a response profounder than "enlightened self-interest"—hard work reflected in a programme of action is necessary.

b) the evidence suggests that there is no inexpensive or easy cure for poverty. Comprehensive policy formation is required over a span of years. Federal-provincial jurisdictional indecision is detrimental to real control. Coordination of policies and programs is essential. We believe that federalism can advance policy development in this country and do the best job for the liberation of people.

c) the evidence clearly suggests that much experimentation is required to help us find appropriate programs and delivery of services. We need new styles of federal-provincial partnerships; the integration and coordination of departments or agencies to give clarity and accountability; public-private partnerships to obtain a more relevant 'people-orientation' to programs, and to achieve a degree of community 'control' and direction. In addition, there is need for a much more imaginative use of modern communications possibilities—the press, radio-TV and cable systems, to disseminate information, secure citizen feedback, and indeed, to carry out critically needed training/human development services.

Following along on these thoughts we would propose the following steps to be included in any comprehensive attack on poverty in Canada:

1. Harmonize tax policy—total tax policy!—and social policy objectives.

"...the tax structure in general fails to give adequate recognition to social security objectives. Thus, on the one hand, we are talking about extending social security programmes to aid the poor; at the same time we have a situation where, because of the low level of exemptions given under the tax system, many of the poor are being taxed.

The problem is compounded by the fact that the sales taxes imposed by federal and provincial governments hit hardest at the poor... many of the poor do pay income and other taxes; it is one of the causes of their poverty... All of this seems to point to the need for closer and continuing consultation between governments and between departments of government to see how the various pieces fit together and to consider whether greater efforts cannot be made to ensure co-ordination of principles and objectives"—Dr. L.A. Kelly, Queen's University, 1969.

As economist Thomas Wilson has also pointed out, it is a fact that Canada's poorest people pay a higher proportion of income in taxes than anyone else. Taking into account the effect of all forms of direct and indirect taxation, lowest income Canadians pay in taxes some 60 per cent of their income.

This particular issue really strikes at the heart of the policy choices—the basic values and goals system—of our society. We will merely toy with poverty problems unless we relate the processes and structures of the total tax system to the expenditure—program priorities of our society.

"To achieve equity in the sense of a reduction in income inequality is one of the major objectives of modern government. The two principle instruments are taxation and expenditures, and it is the combination of the two that determines the net effect on equity. For example, a steeply progressive tax schedule combined with expenditures that benefit the well-to-do (highways, power boat facilities, airport construction, subsidies to cultural activities) could be less equitable than: a moderately progressive tax schedule with expenditures that benefit lower-income groups (public hospitals, low rent housing, services to the aged and indigent)". A.J. Robinson—"the Concept of Equity in the Carter Report"—Public Finance in Canada—Selected Readings, Toronto, Methuen Publications—pa 30.

If the thrust of education expenditures continues to benefit the rich more than the poor, if health and care institutions continue to develop along traditional lines without a reorientation in the direction of 'prevention' as against 'case treatment'; if urban transportation networks are basically "access and egress routes" for the more affluent, without priority attention being given to the design of alternative transportation systems that will serve the total population of a Canadian megalopolis; if our rural programs deal in piecemeal fashion with economic crises and are not fundamentally concerned with developing models for viable "rurapolitan" networks—than modest victories for equity in the income tax systems will not be of much account.

2. Income Maintenance and Redistribution Measures should be primarily a Federal responsibility to make possible the re-design of Provincial "welfare" systems and a de-emphasis on tax types that have a regressive effect on the poor.

a) We are convinced that the Federal Government is the appropriate jurisdiction for Canadian income maintenance programs and suggest that federal control in this area would permit most effective coordination of present policies and the development of more equitable ones in the future.

We have already suggested that increases in old age security payments, unemployment insurance payments, would lift many Canadians above the poverty line.

We would now suggest that thinking of a guaranteed income program for Canada, the federal government should consider a major improvement in family and youth allowance benefits. We feel that the benefits be tripled (going from $6, $8 and $10 as at present to $18, $24 and $30), and that youth allowances should be available beyond the age of 18 when, by simple declarations, it is shown that the person is not attached to the labour force and is involved in some form of training program.

The costs of such a transformation of benefits would not be excessive, if benefits became taxable income, and if tax exemptions for children and youth were reduced or eliminated, in coordination with appropriate revisions of the current suggested White Paper tax reform proposals.

The effect of these changes would be to maximize the benefit to the poor and the 'near-poor' (the underemployed, the unemployed and the low-income wage earners), while also maximizing recovery through the tax system of demogrants from those who do not need them. The federal borrowing costs need not be excessive since adjustments in the tax deduction procedures would keep the recoveries in line.

The suggested changes would move Canada in the direction of more comprehensive guaranteed income arrangements, and would in effect achieve such a result for the most vulnerable segments of our society.

At the same time, policy design for a guaranteed income program could be in progress. Consideration might be given to introducing such a program in one region, for example, Prince Edward Island. Our Province is relatively small, a manageable jurisdiction with a "captive" population and where several other surveys have been made and it might be possible to test in such a way the procedures that would permit a nation-wide re-working of income maintenance programs in the direction of a guaranteed income system. In principle, we support at least exploring the idea of a guaranteed income program as a "social right" objective for Canada.

At the same time, however, the current rigidities of the G.I.S. in the old age security program suggest that a premature launching of such a scheme would be undesirable. Unless care is taken, obviously, the guaranteed annual income mechanism can keep individuals in poverty, rather than liberate them.

(In any event, as the Committee knows, there are prodigious technical and conceptual problems to be overcome—for example, how much erosion of adequate income levels can be tolerated as a "trade off" for probably necessary "work incentives").

b) the fundamental shift we propose in federal income maintenance policy, in our judgement, does NOT threaten nor diminish provincial constitutional responsibility in the field of "welfare".

On the contrary, we believe that it will make possible the radical, essential, re-orientation of provincial welfare systems from relief, to human and community development processes.

Moreover, if the fast-growth tax fields of the federal authority could assume responsibility for income maintenance programs for all Canadians, provinces would be able to shift the use of their more restricted, slower-growth tax fields toward community development and human development programs (education, health and municipal affairs) and ease the pressures on real property taxation, which is penalizing more and more of our citizens.

It is in this way that we see new federal revenues, generated through tax reform changes (estimated at $630 millions a year), being used so as to achieve greater balance and equity in the overall tax system.

3. Occupational Training and Up-grading programs must be improved in range and duration; and major grant funds should be available to private agencies in the adult education field.

Given the statistics on adult Canadians with very limited education or no formal education at all, present federal training programs are not adequate, and the program duration time is too short.

We have followed with great interest the evidence your Committee has brought out concerning this matter. As a year's program can at best achieve about 3 years upgrading educationally, the existing programs fall far short of what is required to upgrade the education levels of thousands of Canadians. The Basic Training for Skills Development program must be extended in its coverage period so as to be useful in overcoming the very considerable education deficiencies of many persons, and also that it may take account of the slower level of functioning of some adults who use the program.

At the same time, we believe that every effort should be made to coordinate planning and major support should be given to organizations (public or private) who are on the front line of adult education work, especially in more remote areas, or in the context of community animation.

We were greatly impressed with the submission of Frontier College, Toronto to your Committee. We trust that the Department of Manpower and Immigration will increase assistance to the $50,000 level proposed. Such organizations should be encouraged, their skills and dedication used as widely and intensively as possible. More grant assistance for such work is essential if we mean to build human development ideas into our anti-poverty programs.

4. Canada should end illiteracy

There are Canadians at work today in many parts of the world, "making gains" against illiteracy.

What's the situation in Canada?

In response to a question raised in the House of Commons March 9, 1970, Mr. Yves Forest replying for the President of the Privy Council, said that:

"In Canada's adult population (20 years and over) according to the 1961 census, there were 169,904 illiterates with no schooling . . . and 828,597 who were functionally illiterate, with one to four years of schooling.

According to the 1961 Census 13.4 percent of the unemployed aged 15 to 19, and 10.4 percent of those aged 20 to 24 were functionally illiterate, with less than five years of elementary education.

In 1967 8.32 percent of juvenile offenders were functionally illiterate (1,499 of 18,000 juvenile delinquents who had been to court). Of those who entered Training Schools in 1967, 12.83 percent were functionally illiterate."

The Atlantic Development Board study: Profiles of Education in the Atlantic Provinces, notes that 10.8% of Canadians are illiterate or functionally illiterate. In some regions and communities of Canada the rate rises to 44 per cent, including levels of 6 per cent, 10 per cent and even 17 per cent total illiteracy. Such statistics are evidence of deep human deprivation; they also suggest something of the way in which the consequences of such deprivation will spill over to affect the milieu of the next generation.

Surely, as part of a comprehensive strategy against poverty, Canada will mobilize experienced personnel, develop programs and adapt others, and through a mobilization of public and volunteer effort make progress against illiteracy in our own nation. In fact, we would hope your Committee might engage in a study as to how modern communications systems might be useful in overcoming illiteracy.

5. This Department of Welfare supports vigorous efforts on the part of Canadian unions to organize the 60 per cent of Canadian employees still outside worker organizations.

To be sure, unions, like all other institutions in present-day society, must discard outmoded "crafts" and styles, and develop new forms of procedure, and indeed, of co-ordination with management appropriate to our industrial-technological systems.

But in this age of international corporations, where policy decisions may show scant regard for economic and human considerations in one community in a single nation, union leverage from the inside is important.

Some 40.9 per cent of Canada's poor, and 66.5 per cent of the 'unattached' persons live in Canada's cities. As they obtain employment they are very vulnerable, and can easily be held to low wage levels in an industrial "ghetto". Union organizing activity, therefore, is important as a counterforce to depressed working conditions. It is to be hoped that Canadian trade unionists will continue efforts to supply organizers to the poor and working poor, as a stabilizing force on the side of social justice.

6. There is need for housing and land development policies that are truly in keeping with other elements of anti-poverty strategy.

For many months, this Department has been concerned with the growing crisis in housing for lower-income citizens, a crisis that persists despite shifts in government policy that have directed more funds toward subsidized housing. Indeed, we are endeavouring to have our Housing Authority undertake a demonstration project in multi-income-level housing to see if there is any way we can achieve a project that will reach the lowest group.

In 1965 about 97 per cent of N.H.A. loans went to the income group representing about 60 per cent of Canadians.

Many housing markets in Canada are available only to the upper third of the population.

In 1969, 205,000 housing starts were achieved—and yet the “filter down” process works less and less adequately. Thus the real issue, as President H. Hignett of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation said, is “not the numbers, but the mix”.

We were impressed by the CMHC brief to your Committee, which stressed how “much of the population has no access to areas of new buildings and the choice of access among those who can afford new housing is narrowly restricted by the level of their income . . .” Mr. Hignett brought clearly before us all the fact of “territorial separation” taking place, especially in metropolitan communities; a separation between rich and poor.

We support the main recommendations advanced in the CMHC presentation, particularly:

- (i) dispersion of public housing units in smaller groupings
- (ii) preservation and rehabilitation of neighborhoods
- (iii) involvement of citizens in community design processes
- (iv) housing allowance programs to assist lower income families

We believe that other improvements are required in Canada's housing/land development programs:

(a) We feel that despite the Economic Council's strictures (in 1967) that housing had tended to bear too large a proportion of the burden of cyclical adjustment, Canadian housing policy is still too tied to fiscal and monetary policy considerations.

(b) We suggest that Canadian housing legislation needs to provide some of the interest-supported, rent supplement and non-profit program possibilities available under U.S. housing law.

For example, “221 (d) (3)” housing is a program of below-market rate of interest which enables non-profit groups, cooperatives, and other agencies to provide housing for families of moderate income.

Under certain categories of rent supplement program, 95 per cent to 100 per cent borrowing is possible, enabling nonprofit, cooperative, groups to venture into the housing field. This type of scheme has particular relevance for charitable organizations or churches, since in many instances land is available, owned by these organizations or churches, in effective locations.

(c) We feel strongly that Canada must take seriously the enormous influence of land costs on the costs of shelter.

In their excellent brief to your Committee, the Social Planning and Research Council of Hamilton and District, (at paragraphs 3.84, 3.85) argued that “since the cost of land is such a large part of the cost of housing, and since land costs have been rising so markedly” we must consider the common European practice of the municipal (governmental) ownership of land. We would strongly support new initiatives and experiments in this direction, even as we would affirm that land-tax policies (as part of the total network of taxation) should be re-examined to see what they might contribute to more rational use of existing serviced land and the avoidance of gross inflation of land values through speculative holdings.

Walter Stewart (writing in MacLean's Magazine, February 1970) has shown very effectively how even a public program to ease the problems of home ownership can have the effect of boosting land costs, even though it can probably be argued that without HOME intervention the land costs would have been much greater still. (4,602 lots at $4.00 per lot; 18 to the acre on land that originally sold for $1,100 per acre. Assuming $20,000 per acre for servicing costs, the author projects gains of some $50,000 per acre—see pages 23ff.)

Obviously, public intervention (as in Saskatoon) at the level of land acquisition and servicing can work to ease the cost of housing. Moreover, such intervention can also serve to guide the development of Canadian communities—counteracting “sprawl”; providing for natural amenities; linking such development with other networks and systems of schools, roads, transportation.

Up to this point we have concentrated on matters of income, provision of shelter and access to economic and human opportunities as these matters are fundamental to a truly comprehensive, co-ordinated and effective attack on poverty and to emphasize this statement we quote from the Report of the Economic Council of Canada:

"In absolute dollar terms—the difference in amounts spent—the poor are most deprived of sufficient food, clothing, shelter and transportation. However, viewing the expenditures of the poor as a percentage of the expenditures of the nonpoor, those living in poverty are most deprived, in a relative sense, of transportation, of recreation, of furnishings and equipment, of reading material, of medical care, of personal care, of clothing and of items to complement the formal education system.

One of the most important consequences of poverty is that it affects the ability of the poor to invest in themselves and thereby to lead more productive lives . . . (This) is likely to have particularly serious consequences on young children whose potential abilities are largely shaped in the years of early childhood . . . Even the possibility of significant child nutrition problems, seemingly so improbable in this country, must be taken seriously".

7. POLICIES THAT AFFIRM PERSONS

(i) Justice for the Poor. The Honourable John Turner said: "It is the poor who suffer most from society masked in the trappings of the law. For it is they who are victimized when urban renewal arbitrarily disrupts a neighborhood; it is the poor who are hurt when creditors garnishee wages or repossess furniture; it is the poor who are deprived when welfare agencies deny, reduce or terminate, welfare benefits on vague, unarticulated or clearly illegal grounds; it is the poor who are penalized when . . . landlords . . . withhold repairs or capriciously evict them into the street; it is the poor who are hit by bail procedures linked to financial means; it is the poor whose privacy is invaded and whose dignity is denied". . . . "Too often the poor see the law not as a friend but as an enemy, not as an aid but as an adversary, not as a remedy but as an obstacle".

We support the efforts of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association to secure "due process" for welfare recipients when they deal with "the system". We urge prompt action in all Canadian jurisdictions to reform the law and regulations in respect of Landlord and Tenant; Expropriation Law; and Family Law. We are delighted to note the way in which law students and faculty have begun to offer legal aid services, especially in the 'preventive-advisory' field. We urge that all appropriate steps be taken to stop the demeaning of the poor through unnecessary questioning and invasions of privacy. We urge that most effective ways be found to inform program recipients of their rights, details as to levels of aid, and appeal procedures.

(ii) Family Planning—The repeal of provisions of the Criminal Code making it an offence to sell or distribute information about birth control or contraceptive materials, has resulted in little government action to offer such services to Canadian citizens.

We endorse the submissions of the Family Planning Association and the Vanier Institute touching on this matter. Terrible damage is being done to individuals and families because information and counselling services are not generally available. We are aware of the convictions of some regarding permissible forms of family planning. We respect such views even though we cannot concur with them.

We suggest that the Government in certain of its own programs and through support granted to independent agencies, make real "options" known and available to Canadians. Every Canadian should be helped to feel adequate and realizing his or her full potential, be able to make an adequate contribution to society.

(iii) Nursing Home Care—older persons, and sometimes their children, often face bankrupting costs and hopelessness because nursing home service does not fall within the framework of allowable health care costs.

Other forms of care and treatment are also excluded.

We suggest that ways be found to bring as much as possible of such costs within the health insurance program.

(iv) Community 'Supportive' Services—We support others in the belief that the various levels of government ought to encourage experimentation in programs and delivery of services and that Family agencies, Homemakers services, Hospital outpatient departments, church agencies and others should be encouraged to develop new networks of service, seize new opportunities to be supportive of persons and families in their neighborhoods; assume "advocacy" roles on behalf of the poor.

Many agencies and institutions need to be realigned. Combinations of public and private funding may result in more diversified, "open" services, less bureaucratic and closer to the people . . . for example:

—the Day Care and Clinic services that can be operated out of homes for the aged for the benefit of a much wider community than the community of the institution itself;

- the meals programs or drop-in centre programs which improve the eating patterns of older persons through providing the nourishment of companionship;

- Day Care programs and Head Start Nursery services that can be rendered in homes, neighborhood and school, and might thereby release the potential of thousands of youngsters;

- Home Counsellor services related to Day Care Service, bringing parents new understanding of their role in awakening the potential of their children and beyond such services there are the Citizen's Organizations themselves. The encouragement of support of such indigenous action groups is most important and we must keep in mind youth centres where youth-planned activities, along with counselling and recreational activities are available to children 12 years of age and over level.

The process of becoming visible, vocal, asking for a piece of the services, asking for actions that are their due—such group activity has a real and positive role to play in breaking the helplessness and dehumanizing effects of poverty.

Combatting Poverty

For almost a year now representatives from all four of our Atlantic Provinces have been meeting to discuss ways and means to combat poverty in our provinces and perhaps come up with ideas to not only eradicate poverty in our own provinces but perhaps provide a formula which would be helpful to Canada as a whole. As a result of our deliberations a joint brief has been prepared for presentation to the National Minister of Health and Welfare in the hope that the Atlantic Region may secure much-needed additional help from federal sources so as to enable us to do a better job in clearing our region of poverty and at this point in our presentation we are happy to include a considerable amount of the subject matter from that joint brief . . .

In recent years, expenditures on Welfare and Welfare Services have increased rapidly and there is every indication that this escalation will continue. It is difficult to see how in the next few years we here in Prince Edward Island can continue to provide welfare services comparable to those available in the rest of the country, without additional federal assistance to that now being received.

The Second Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada (page 136) has summarized the factors underlying the problem within the Atlantic Provinces and as the Council points out we have a lower proportion of our population engaged in productive activity. Throughout the Atlantic Provinces a smaller proportion of the total population is in the working age group of 15–65 years and we also have a lower rate of participation in the labour force along with a rate of unemployment consistently higher than in other regions in Canada and with much more severe seasonal fluctuations. In addition to this, experience has shown that the anti-inflationary policies of the Federal Government will result in an even greater increase in unemployment in Prince Edward Island and throughout the other Atlantic Provinces, as well.

These factors have caused a larger proportion of our population throughout all Atlantic Provinces to depend on welfare programmes.

Personal income, wages and salaries show that even those who are employed do not do as well financially as those in other parts of Canada. Generally this is a reflection of the educational level of the population with the higher proportion living in rural areas. At the same time the rate of capital investment and public expenditures on growth-related services needed to raise income levels has been much lower than for the rest of Canada.

The persistent nature of the problem of economic depression in the Atlantic Provinces is expanded upon further in detailed studies prepared by the Economic Council of Canada. The statistics in these studies give an indication of the area's greater need for "catch up" expenditures, at a time when provincial government expenditures on, what the Economic Council calls "growth-related functions", are lagging behind. Recent studies have shown that programs designed to improve the physical resource base have not made any significant impact on the problem. It is now generally accepted that much more comprehensive programs involving improvement of human as well as physical resources are needed. Programs that emphasize education, health, housing and labour mobility must be developed as part of a total coordinated program of labour force adjustment. The Comprehensive Rural Development Agreements now in effect in New Brunswick are an attempt to develop such an approach as is also the Prince Edward Island Comprehensive Development Plan.

Provincial expenditures are limited by their tax base and consequently those areas with the greatest need for social services have the choice of increasing the burden of taxation or spending less per capita than the more affluent provinces. In fact, the Atlantic Provinces have spent less as shown by the Economic Council's Report and the tax burden tends to be greater. This is clearly a very inequitable position. To improve this situation, it is necessary to remove the constraint on the provincial tax base by means of grants from the Federal Government. This is only partially achieved under the cost-sharing and equalization grants. These grants should be such as to make it possible to spend an equal amount per capita in each of the provinces throughout Canada. There is little need to emphasize that this point has yet to be reached. At the same time it is necessary to recognize that low income areas create a greater need per capita than the national average. Therefore, a second step in improving equity must be to increase per capita spending in the poorer areas of our country with the aim of creating an equal standard of service in the face of greater demand on the social and welfare services. Frequently we find that these depressed areas have higher costs of providing such services attributable, for example, to their smaller and more dispersed communities, higher salaries necessary to attract qualified staff to these areas. This, in turn, creates an additional requirement in allocating expenditures to the depressed areas in order to compensate for the higher costs of providing such service. Consequently, we feel that a strong case can be made for improving the standard of service in poorer areas above the level of the rest of the country. We feel that present Federal Cost Sharing Formulas do not take into account these greater requirements in the Atlantic region.

In short, we think that present Federal assistance programs for the Atlantic Provinces are lacking in three important respects:

(a) Insufficient assistance has been provided for major human resource development programs which are the responsibility of the province. Although assistance is received from the Federal Government through shared cost programs and equalization grants, with the exception of medical care, this type of assistance does not take into account the higher per capita need in the Atlantic Provinces and the lower tax capacity available to meet that need. In addition, Federal programs such as housing and manpower do not appear to be reaching the persons with the greatest need. Programs for development of human resources must have a high priority in any attempt to eliminate poverty.

(b) The Federal Assistance Programs have not recognized the special and important role of an income maintenance program in any attempt to combat poverty. While the Canada Assistance Plan has contributed much to this area, the sharp increase in costs has put a heavy drain on provincial budgets and made it difficult to develop effective preventive and rehabilitative services. With the implementation of the Canada Assistance Plan, the provinces are being put in a position where they must spend a greatly increased amount of money on welfare programs. In fact, the adoption of the Canada Assistance Program is forcing us to "catch up" and we do not have the money. Therefore, we must look at the possibility of reductions in other government programs and/or welfare programs. Reduction in welfare programs can only be accomplished by severely limiting the definition of need. Our present needs test results in a payment which is no higher than that for the rest of the country. Yet one study has shown that, with the exception of British Columbia, living costs are higher in the Atlantic area.

(c) Present federal programs have tended to single out particular areas of the Atlantic Region for special assistance, when in fact the problems and therefore, the need for special assistance, are region-wide.

As the result of a long history of chronic dependency, we in the Atlantic Provinces have large numbers of persons who are hard-core welfare cases. Consequently massive programs of rehabilitation, community development and prevention are required to ensure that whole communities do not go on welfare and stay there for long periods of time. We recognize that anything done in this area is not going to reap benefits for a number of years, but we feel that we must get started. The program envisioned would be designed to ensure that all persons in the Atlantic Provinces are able to take advantage of improved educational opportunities, both for themselves and their children; that housing is improved, and that conditions which contribute to poor health do not continue to be a factor in limiting ability to benefit from educational and employment opportunities. We view such a program as a necessary compliment to and in fact an integral part of any successful program of industrial development. Future programs, we contend, must aim to improve "the sour atmosphere of poor health and bad housing—the accumulated defeat, alienation, and despair which often so tragically are inherited by the next and succeeding generations."

In order that such a program may be launched we believe that:

1. A Comprehensive Development Plan should be established for the whole Atlantic region. This program would be similar to the Comprehensive Rural Development Plan for Northeast New Brunswick, Province of Prince Edward Island or the Gaspé and the Lower St. Lawrence Region. In fact, if we were to follow the recommendation of the Economic Council of Canada, this program would be as far reaching as that carried on in the Appalachian Region of the United States. Of utmost importance in the development of such a program for the Atlantic Region will be the modernization of our primary industry and the introduction of diversified secondary industry. Equally important will be the recognition of the special need for additional expenditures in the related areas of health, housing, education and welfare.

2. We believe the programs should be administered by the provincial governments involved to ensure maximum effectiveness, integration and coordination and to foster optimum local participation.

3. We believe that it is virtually impossible for the Provincial Governments in the Atlantic area to expend the required amounts of money in the health, education, housing and welfare programs under the present sharing formulae and tax agreements with the Federal Government.

RECOMMENDATIONS

Until such comprehensive plans are developed and until new tax sharing formulae are arrived at which better recognize the special needs of the Atlantic provinces, we recommend that:

1. There be increased sharing of the costs of the Canada Assistance Plan in recognition of the greater need in the Atlantic Region and the lower tax capacity available to meet this need. In other words, the proposed formula should recognize the fact that the Atlantic Region suffers greatly because of regional disparity. Any such cost sharing formula must, of necessity, include the costs of work activity programs carried on in the Atlantic region.

2. This increased cost sharing formula should be related to such factors as proportionately higher unemployment rates and lower labour force participation rates in the Atlantic Region compared to the Canadian average.

CONCLUSION

If as a result of this presentation to Ottawa our Atlantic Provinces receive more financial sharing from the Federal Government each Province has committed itself to do certain things to help eliminate poverty and we are particularly pleased to state that if extra monies are received here in our Province they will not be spent on anything other than welfare services. In fact, being specific, in an effort to cut down poverty we hope by tackling such causes already mentioned in this brief including alcoholism, use of drugs, etc., the Province of Prince Edward Island will be in position to make the following improvements in its programme:

1. Improvements in Financial Assistance Programs

a) Food allowance would be increased by $5.00 for categories of assistance recipients under Section 16 (a) (b) (c) and (d) of the regulations. For fiscal year 1970-71, this would represent an increase of $500,000 maximum for the total program.

b) Our public Assistance Division and our administrative staff generally are badly in need of upgrading and additional training. To accomplish this end we need to establish an in-service training program which will cost us at least $15,000 for the present fiscal year.

2. Improvements in the Provision of Needed Social Services

a) The Child Welfare Division is in serious need of more and better qualified staff. At the present time, for example, we have seven (7) welfare workers supervising five hundred (500) wards under the care and custody of the Director of Child Welfare. In the same manner the present allowances paid for maintenance of children in foster homes are totally inadequate. For example, the total maintenance allowance for a child in a foster home at the present time is $60.000 a month. The shortcomings in such maintenance rates are making it almost impossible to obtain the calibre of foster homes our wards require. These two items would increase our Child welfare budget by an additional $60,000 for the current fiscal year.

b) it is our intention to expand our present Work Activity Projects to provide an opportunity for more adequate incomes to persons presently receiving nominal amounts under our social assistance program. It is our hope that these projects will provide training opportunities for persons presently receiving social assistance who do not qualify for such training under the present Canada Manpower Training Program. While the initial costs of work activity Projects are higher than simply carrying such persons on assistance rolls, we would expect that participation in such projects will enable such persons to eventually become self-supporting or partially self-supporting by entering the employment field. In addition, the expansion of Work Activity Projects will enable those persons involved to obtain more adequate incomes for themselves and their families during the training period. The estimated increase in cost with the expansion of Work activity Projects would be between $100 — $600 per year for each recipient. At the present time we plan to engage up to 100 recipients in such a program at a cost of $112,000 for the current fiscal year.

In summary, then, these are a few of the things we feel would help us in our struggle against poverty here in our Province and in the Atlantic Region as a whole. If we are to get anywhere in the struggle however, we must put thoughts into action, our action must be "all-out" in scope and we need the assistance of all Canadians as we are dealing with not simply a Provincial nor Regional problem but a National one—and in addition to physical and planning assistance we would suggest your Committee impress on Federal authorities our very marked need for increased financial assistance from them as well.

Clerk of the Committee.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

Rev. J. W. McCarthy (Bill): Born Montreal, 25 July, 1931. Age 38. Educated in the Montreal Protestant School system, Sir George Williams College and McGill University. Graduated Montreal Diocesan Theological College with a L.Th. Was employed by the Canadian National Railway for six years as a clerk and brakeman. Served in Canadian Army Special Force 1950-52 (Korea). Was ordained priest in 1960 in the Diocese of Montreal. Served as Parish Priest in the suburban Parish of Roxboro for three years. Was a Penitentiary Chaplain at Leclerc Institute for three years and Superintendent and Executive Secretary of The Old Brewery Mission Inc. since 1963. Also was a volunteer fireman, police chaplain and Reserve Army Chaplain. Married and one son.

Charles Robson: Born in Montreal, Sept. 9, 1912. Age 57. Trade—Spray painter—unemployed in trade since 1965. Claims production demands were too great and he had bad lungs or a severe cough. He also got involved in serious drinking. Charlie has a grade seven education; became a spray painter in 1929. He joined the Canadian Army in 1942 and served overseas with the 6th Light A. A. of the R.C.A., 2nd Corps. In 1943 his wife left him and his three sons were placed in the Weredale Home in Montreal. The boys are married and things are working out very well for them. Charles receives a 5% disability pension from the D.V.A., totalling $13.25 and presently that is his only source of income. He claims he is not sick enough to get the War Veterans allowance, but he is physically incapable of even washing dishes, so he exists at the Mission.

Basically he has multi problems, but they centre around Alcoholism. Reasons for it are: (1) Painters were prone to this because of an old belief it was the only way to counteract lead poisoning from the paint fumes, plus in the old days, Pay Day was cash on the line in the office, which was the tavern. (2) Wife problems—drink and forget. (3) It's too late to change now. (4) No alcoholism treatment centre for poor English speaking people in Montreal.

Gordon Clayson: Born in Montreal, Nov. 7th, 1928. Age 41. Grade six education. Worked as waiter and bar man and race tracks. Came to the Mission January 1967 for a few days; has been on the street ever since. Constantly in a state of confusion—was released from the Ontario Mental Hospital, Port Arthur, and feels safe in Quebec. An honest man, beaten by life, needs serious psychiatric care and hospitalization, but can tell how rough it is at the Mission, how terrible it is to exist. While he may be sick, his story about skid row is true and the fact of poor rations at the Mission is a story we would argue with, but then again we are not starving like they are. Whether he will appear or not is questionable.

Neil McGowan: Born Montreal, April 8, 1915. Age 55. Grade five education. Worked for C.P.R. twenty-eight years, pensioned sick benefit: has Parkinson's disease—sent to Mission by Montreal Neurological Institute. Unable to live alone—needs friends—suffers from loneliness—seems happy to be wanted. Strong as a bull—real nice guy. Worst thing that happened to him was the death of his mother. Sees a lot that happens in the Mission—doesn't say much. We have told him it is essential that you people know what is going on in the Mission society and that since he is a permanent resident he would know better than anyone. Probably a company man, but one of many cripples we care for.

James Dorrien: Born Belfast, Ireland, March 25, 1926. Age 44. Mechanic. Married—2 girls living in Belfast. Claims to have served as an administrator in the Arctic and had a nervous breakdown. Was hospitalized at the Montreal General Hospital and came to us through the Montreal Council of Social Agencies. We found him to be very talented and reliable until his dependence on pills became an addiction and when these ran out he went to alcohol. His tolerance level is low and he could be a chronic alcoholic. His behaviour pattern is that he goes from one mission to the other and usually lasts anywhere from 30 to 90 days before he is barred. He has attempted suicide more than once and has been in the Douglas Hospital a few times. His main problem is environment and if he could move up, he could win again. If he remains on Skid Row too long, he will be permanently damaged. We have a search party out for him.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, May 14, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: We have a brief this morning from the Old Brewery Mission of Montreal to be made by The Reverend J. W. McCarthy. As you will see from his curriculum vitae, he is a very distinguished and hard working clergyman who is doing work in an area which needs a great deal of attention. I will ask him to speak for himself.

Rev. J. W. McCarthy, Executive Secretary The Old Brewery Mission Inc. Montreal: Ladies and gentlemen, it is a great privilege to be here today. We thought we would bring a little army with us, an army of wanderers, of people who have quite a few problems, each of whom will represent actually one of the situations that are spoken about in the brief.

During the course of the year we have approximately 3,500 different men who come into our mission. They come for all sorts of things, but basically for food and lodging, and they are pretty tired after a day's wandering around the streets; they are poor and hungry or starving. Often whatever they have on their back is all that they own. In fact, you may see them with small shopping bags, and that is the sum total of a life of existence in our community.

Everybody tends to think in terms of a mission such as ours as one where we have nobody but, as the term goes, "rubby-dubs," who are chronic alcoholics, who have fallen to the level of drinking anything that they can possibly drink without any fear whatsoever of what it may do to their system, because at this stage they do not care. Well, that is about ten per cent of the men that we have coming to the mission during the course of the year, those who are real chronic alcoholics. Among the other group of individuals who come, basically the most serious problem group that we have to deal with are people who are very seriously mentally ill.

As we mention in the brief, in detailing the various types of individuals and what happens to them, as long as they are passive, as long as they do not commit any criminal offence—or as long as they do not get caught at it, they are allowed to wander the streets. We know one fellow in particular who is a war veteran and who still has a plate in his head. He often gets arrested, but the police let him go immediately because they know that the D.V.A. will "spring" him and there would be all kinds of problems with him, so they let him go and he comes knocking on the door of the mission again. Obviously he should be in an institution, but who wants to blow the whistle on people who should be in institutions? We do not really feel that it is our job to call the police and to go to Court, and it is a tremendously humiliating experience. You say: "O.K., I am Joe Blow, a citizen, and I am doing a citizen's job." I have found that people have broken windows in the mission. Now, sometimes we kind of provoke them because they get so hostile and involved, and one fellow actually hit me on the head with a piece of wood. I took him to court but only to get him treatment, because we could not get him treatment any other way, and after the fellow started hollering the judge said: "Refer him for psychiatric analysis or assessment". We have never seen him since, so he is probably sitting in one of the local hoosegows awaiting treatment.

As I mentioned earlier, there are 35 per cent of our people who, we feel, are in this category. There are a lot with various types of mental illness, stemming right down to mental retardation. What did we do with the children who were mentally retarded 30 years ago? We did not have all of the resources that we have today. We find these men homeless, hostile, introverts and yet very passive and docile—until you threaten their existence. We have them down with us because nobody else wants them. As I mentioned earlier, they have nothing to do with alcoholism whatsoever. These are people who are very seriously ill, who have been deprived of the gifts that the ordinary person has, and who have suffered and existed for many years.

The other group which we all know quite a bit about is the alcoholics. It is shocking that in our province anyway there is very little treatment, and almost no treatment whatsoever for non French-speaking alcoholics. Later on in the recommendations, if someone would question the recommendations, you will see that the D.V.A. hospitals are requested to become involved in this, because the government has seen fit to state that an alcoholic who is or was a veteran is suffering from a self-inflicted wound and there is no treatment. You teach a man how to use dynamite, you teach him to use some of the most complicated equipment in the world, you teach him how to put his life on the line; then when he cracks up and gets drunk, and becomes addicted to alcohol, you say he has inflicted that upon himself. Psychologically, you have damaged that man beyond repair.

We have had one fellow in the mission for the last couple of years who was a pioneer corporal in my regiment overseas and he was a dynamite expert. Now he is a complete alcoholic with no possibility of treatment through D.V.A., because it is not authorized. Under the table they do some work, quite a bit of work actually, but officially they are not supposed to.

The problem of alcoholism has been swept under the carpet recently by the increased recognition of what drugs are doing to young people. It is giving a real impetus to the work on the treatment of drug addiction, but leads to the retardation of any work in the field of alcoholism in Quebec, and that is a fact. I have sat on committees trying to get something organized, and we find that any time we get up to a level where we are going to receive some involvement, we find other groups from the drug side of the field have over-shadowed and overpowered us because, "After all, these are young people"

I am prejudiced, I am sure, but I feel we are very concerned about young people provided they come from the right side of the tracks. In a few years, we, in The Old Brewery Mission, will be experiencing the damaged young people who come from the other side of the tracks for whom no treatment resources will really be available, whose involvement pretty well dictates that once they are on it they will never be off it, and that they will be damned as criminals and will be sent up. They will not have the legal representation that other people can have, and it will not be too long before they will be completely addicted. Then eventually the brain will be damaged and we shall find that their families will even reject them and we will have them with us.

You also notice in the brief that we spoke about the transients. There are still a lot of people with wanderlust, still a lot of people who cannot take pressure, particularly when they move from area to area. You will see it in the statistics, and statistics perhaps do not mean too much to you, but if you happen to come from a certain province I am sure you would put your finger on it and say, "Well, there are only one or two from our province who have ever stayed at the mission", but one or two represents two percent of 3,500. We find quite a few Maritimers who are passing through Montreal and who never really make it. Their one goal is to get to Ontario or Toronto, where there is an English environment and they can find work; whereas if they try to find a job as a labourer in Montreal they have multiple problems, firstly, because they do not speak French and, secondly, because the majority of the labour force in Montreal is made up of immigrant people who are not afraid to work for a smaller rate of wage than other people. The average Maritimer is trying to push through Montreal, but he finds that if he just has one drink, in Montreal he has no more money. So he is hung over for two weeks or a month, or maybe even three months, before he can move on to other provinces to meet with friends of his who have made it in the other provinces. These represent possibly about five per cent of the people who come through the mission during the course of a year.

Then there are, and we cannot ever deny the fact that there are unemployables. There are people who are unemployable through perhaps brain damage, perhaps through straight laziness, perhaps through a twisted mentality that has developed in them for many years. That is our role, we consider, to take care of these people.

We feel that if other organizations, if other groups, if governments could be aware of the needs of the people who come to us, that they can siphon off the cream, the people who are redeemable, that can receive treatment and can move onwards and upwards. If we save a thousand a year across Canada, that is a thousand more than we saved this year, and a thousand people added to the economy is just as good as a thousand immigrants with no investment. There is no prejudice nor slur meant there at all. I am just saying this is a fact. When you get the opportunity to speak to some of our people in a few moments, you will find that all I say is true. We do have potential and we do have hope, and I feel that people should seriously take a look at the situation.

I go to church very early Sunday morning and I take a mass for sisters in Montreal at 7.00 o'clock in the morning. After mass I drive around the city and I see my friends by the hundreds. I suggest to you sometime that when you are in the city, or even here in Ottawa where there are a lot of our "graduates", you will see them on Sunday morning pounding the sidewalk, looking for something. Now, that something may be a butt, that something may be a bottle that he can get two cents for, that something may be a newspaper that will give him something to do during the daytime; but because of our discipline we do not really recognize this. I do because of the work I do, but I am sure you do not recognize it.

When the Olympics come to Montreal in a few years nobody will be allowed in the public parks for two months beforehand, because they will clean them up, and our boys will spend three months in jail. This is why our prison percentage is pretty high. The city decides, "We don't need that kind of people around here," and they can testify. During Expo I think the minimum was 60 or 90 days that was given to people who were found in parks just prior to the opening of Expo. If the city were to spend half the money they spend on arresting people and processing them through the courts on doing something constructive and positive, even just providing medical treatment, we would find we would be doing something with people that had never been done before. I think I have over-stated...

The Chairman: No, no. Can we identify these various people? What is your name?

Mr. James Dorrien: Jimmie Dorrien.

The Chairman: Who is the next one?

Mr. Charles Robson: Charles Robson.

The Chairman: Your name?

Mr. Jean Marie Pilote: Jean Marie Pilote.

Mr. Neil McGowan: Neil McGowan.

The Chairman: We have a short history here that the Reverend McCarthy gave us about each one of you. Now, you have a right to privacy which is your right. It is up to you whether we put this in as part of our record and use your name. You must say "yes" or "no", and do not hesitate. If you do not want it, we are not going to use it.

Mr. Dorrien: I know my rights.

The Chairman: You know your rights, and are you satisfied?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Mr. Robson: I am satisfied.

The Chairman: You are, all right.

Reverend McCarthy: I might say we offered them the opportunity of using a pseudonym and they all rejected it.

The Chairman: Then we are clear about that.

Senator Quart: I don't know if my question should be asked now, but it refers to the statement which the Reverend McCarthy made about the D.V.A. When applying to the D.V.A., have you been refused any assistance or treatment for this man with the steel plate? I would be very interested because I know intimately the ones who are in charge of D.V.A. in Montreal. I would like to know: have you applied and were you refused?

Reverend McCarthy: They take him away for two or three months, and he progresses to the state where he convinces them that he can function and does things the right way, so they say, "OK., go." They even administer his money weekly because he cannot handle his money, it is impossible for him to handle it, so they give it to him once a week. He is forever in and out of courts. He is a tremendously polite person, but he just has very serious problems of mechanism. If he has one drink he cannot walk; he is really rubber-kneed just on one drink. His tolerance level is such, probably from the dosage of medication that he is given, that after one glass of beer he is just uncontrollable.

Senator Quart: After the meeting, if you would give me his name, I will see what I can do.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Chairman, first of all I would like to thank the witnesses for appearing here to-day. As the saying goes, you have to walk the walk to be able to talk the talk. No doubt you have walked the walk, and I hope you talk the talk to us and try to help us—and tell us to go to hell if we ask you the wrong question.

Mr. Dorrien: I will guarantee.

Senator Hastings: We are here to try and find out. I think we know the problem, I think we have all seen the problem wherever we went, and we are trying to find the answers. Personally, I saw it while spending an afternoon on skid row in Vancouver, and I know something of what you are talking about. We are trying to find the answer.

Mr. Dorrien: You just spent an afternoon. I spent quite a few years on it.

Senator Hastings: You know more about it than I do, and I hope you will tell us.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I will.

Senator Hastings: As my first question, Mr. McCarthy, I would like to ask, since you indicate the cost of operating your mission, where are you funded, how are you funded?

Reverend McCarthy: We have a public subscription campaign just around Christmas time, in fact at the end of November. We have about 10,000 subscribers at the mission, and we solicit new members each year, as it were, and we basically get all of our funds for operation from that campaign.

Senator Hastings: A public appeal.

Reverend McCarthy: That is right.

Senator Hastings: You are not accredited to the United Fund or a government agency?

Reverend McCarthy: No.

The Chairman: How old is the mission?

Reverend McCarthy: The mission is 90 years old.

Senator Hastings: I notice you have a very distinguished board of directors. How does one become a member of the board of directors?

The Chairman: $10,000 any one year!

Reverend McCarthy: The fact that the board is distinguished looks lovely on paper, but these people have contributed fantastically to the work of the mission in the setting of policy. You obviously know some of these people, and they have really been the backbone of the mission for many years. They have supported it, they have gone out and hustled money. We were expropriated a few years ago for a new highway, which has not been built, and they gave us $150,000 for the building. It cost us close to $500,000 to move, but the board went out, really went after it and got the money.

Senator Hastings: In other words, the board of directors set the policy and you administer it, do you?

Reverend McCarthy: That is right.

Senator Hastings: How often do they meet?

Reverend McCarthy: Approximately once a month.

Senator Hastings: Where do they meet?

Reverend McCarthy: At the mission. They have lunch at the mission, and we go downstairs for the meeting afterwards.

Senator Hastings: Do any of the board do any other work for the mission except the meeting?

Reverend McCarthy: We also have our own summer camp, and there is a camp committee in which they are very involved. They visit the camp regularly and are involved in it; but to be involved in program, no.

Senator Hastings: They do not involve themselves in the day-to-day operation of the mission?

Reverend McCarthy: Well, they are there.

Senator Hastings: They are there?

Reverend McCarthy: Well, our president drops in at least once a week and calls me probably three times a week. That is involvement, I think.

Senator Hastings: And the other members, do they drop in?

Reverend McCarthy: Yes.

Senator Hastings: And stay and work with these men?

Reverend McCarthy: I wouldn't say that, but they ask my opinion on what is happening. We are in a different milieu than where we were before, and the situation is more difficult. There is more muscle on the main street than there was where we were before. I confide in them and they give me support, but to go out and put their arm around Jimmie, no.

Senator Hastings: The point has been made two or three times in our meetings that the upper income group are happy to pay the bill and so forth, but that is the end of it; they leave the actual work...

Reverend McCarthy: I can honestly say that our board of directors means more than dollars and cents to us. They are a really spiritually involved group, and I do not mean that in the religious context; I mean they are morally involved in the work of the mission and they are really concerned about the situation. I would not say otherwise if I didn't believe it.

Senator Hastings: If I could turn to alcoholism, I certainly share with you your concern over the increase in alcoholism and the cause of it, and that everywhere we look at poverty we find this alcoholism. I am going to ask you, would you say alcoholism is the cause of or a symptom of poverty?

Reverend McCarthy: Alcoholism amongst the poor people is, you are saying?

Senator Hastings: Where you find poverty you find alcoholism, as you find it in 35 per cent.

Reverend McCarthy: But you find it everywhere else too.

Senator Hastings: But of your 35 per cent, did alcoholism cause them to be there, or is it a symptom of their condition?

Reverend McCarthy: It is two or three things. Alcoholism perhaps holds the neurotic solution to their neurotic problem. They do not recognize their problem and they run away from it with alcohol. In a lot of instances this has been part and parcel of their milieu. Their fathers were drinkers, and usually the son of an alcoholic is alcoholic himself. It is handed down, but it is not necessarily because it is handed through the genes; it is something which they inherit as a way of life, it is a part of growing up. If you are in a poverty area, as soon as you can make it to the tavern you have got it made whether you are 18 or 20. That is part of it, but I would not say alcoholism is a cause of poverty. It certainly helps it along beautifully, but it is not a direct cause of poverty.

Senator Hastings: On page 4, dealing with the treatment of alcoholism, you practically write off the A.A. program because you say it is designed to the middle class. On what do you base that?

Reverend McCarthy: A.A. started in a mission environment; it started on skid row with people who were at the bottom, and these people found within themselves the strength to help themselves and get up. I am not saying the world over, but I am saying that in Montreal in the English-speaking A.A. they have become a very polished group. We have two A.A. groups that meet in our mission regularly. The French one meets Saturday after Saturday 52 weeks a year. As for the English one, if we can get 20 meetings we are lucky. They do not get the involvement down there.

A.A. is a tremendous program, and that is why I like it, because it has redeemed hundreds of thousands of people who never had the opportunity to be redeemed before. I think they are close to the million mark to-day in members. They have something, but it seems that as they grow they want to forget, and they too are sliding into the syndrome of forgetting what happened.

The Chairman: What happened?

Reverend McCarthy: Right.

The Chairman: You say it, not I.

Reverend McCarthy: Pierre Berton says it very well.

Senator Hastings: I question your conclusion but I will accept it. As you say, it started on skid row, and from what I understand A.A. will go anywhere to help, but there has to be a motivation and perhaps this is what is lacking in the men with whom you are dealing. In the case of the middle class there is more motivation; you have got more men to work with. When a man has reached your level, he has lost all motivation and liquor is his outlet, as you have said.

Reverend McCarthy: If you remember in the brief, they picked the fellow up who attempted suicide, and they pumped him for what? That is what I am saying, that you can have all the motivation in the world, but if someone is saying: "You do not go any further than there, man", that is it—you don't get any help.

When you hit the sidewalk from the mission in the morning, you hit the sidewalk and you are alone. What is good about A.A. is that there is somebody with you that can help you. I am saying that A.A. can be good, but even A.A. has got to the point of saying: "Let us not get too involved, because we may tumble again", and that is a very serious problem with them too. They can remind them very vividly and perhaps send that poor soul out on a drunk again. I am not criticizing them overly.

Senator Hastings: I am well aware of their problem. On page 4 you say you will force him to compete; on page 6 that you will try to make him exercise his powers. Do you think you can rehabilitate an alcoholic by making him, forcing or coercing him?

Reverend McCarthy: Well, a few years ago we had a survey at the mission, and we got all excited about what we could do for rehabilitation. All of a sudden, we realized that every fellow that came in the door would be saying: "Look, I want some clothing, and I want the same kind of clothing as he got, because I am entitled to it". I begin to get the feeling that the Statue of Liberty phrase of "Send me everything", and "Everybody is equal", just does not work in society.

The Chairman: Bill of Rights.

Reverend McCarthy: Well, Bill of Rights, it just doesn't work; that in order to do something you have got to compete. The minute you walk out of that door again, you are competing with somebody, and in order to get something you must compete, you must be involved.

We have established a threefold type of program where, first of all, if you don't care, that is our job; look, that is our charter, take care of people like this. However, if the government does want to do something, then move him up a notch and give him a few privileges, give him a few things extra. O.K., that is coercion. So what?

Thirdly, if he gets on his feet, then we should be able to do more for him, and we should be able to obtain assistance; we should be able to be involved in some rehabilitation type of process where he rehabilitates himself because he walks alone tomorrow morning.

Senator Hastings: He has to have the motivation.

Reverend McCarthy: Certainly, but he shows it in his first stage, and if he does not show it in his first stage then finally he starts looking at the thing again and says, "Man, I don't want any more of this. I want to be up here." So we set aside another floor where he can find these things, and it is progress, I think.

Senator Fournier: I would like to ask Reverend McCarthy how long you have been in charge of this mission.

Reverend McCarthy: I have been the superintendent since 1963. When I was in college I sued to take services twice a week, and I felt that it was more that could be done than that, but generally about 15 years I have been involved.

Senator Fournier: That is good. I think I read somewhere that you have four missions. This is not for Montreal and district only. Where are the other three?

Reverend McCarthy: The Salvation Army has one in Montreal. The Welcome Hall Mission has a small one.

Mr. Dorrien: A new one at St. André on Dorchester Street has just been opened by a priest, whereby men go in there and all they have is a bed and that is it. That has just started.

Mr. Robson: About 35 men.

Senator Fournier: Is there any communication between those four missions? Do you work together or separately?

Reverend McCarthy: We have tried to work together with two of them. The fourth one is just new. There is also the French groups that are trying to organize. They asked me to sit on the meetings and I have been involved in it. In fact, I am one of the directors of our "opposition" or whatever you want to call it.

We find we have not been able to have co-operation with the Salvation Army, but the Welcome Hall Mission we have co-operated with.

Senator Fournier: If any one of us wanted to visit your mission any day, would it be possible?

Reverend McCarthy: Absolutely.

Senator Fournier: On Clark Street. Is this for men only, or do you have women also?

Reverend McCarthy: We only have men staying at the mission, but we have a women's clothing department, women and children, which is basically for camp families. We have one or two women who come in regularly, and the best we can do for them is a hand-out from time to time, outfit them with clothing and perhaps pay their room for a week, but we do not have accommodation for women.

Senator Fournier: Would it be married women, women with children, or women of the street, I suppose—let us put it at that level—looking for a place to stay?

Reverend McCarthy: Burnt-out.

Senator Fournier: Do you have any helpers besides you from time to time?

Reverend McCarthy: In the mission we have an administration staff of about eight people, operation staff of about 15 people—about 25 people altogether.

Senator Fournier: Any doctors or nurses?

Reverend McCarthy: No. We have one doctor who helps us from time to time.

Senator Fournier: Do you have a number of young people?

Reverend McCarthy: Who help as volunteers?

Senator Fournier: No, as patients.

Reverend McCarthy: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Do you have many people? What would be the average age?

The Chairman: It is in the back here.

Reverend McCarthy: We have 16 per cent under 30, about three per cent under 22.

The Chairman: The age groups are on page 3.

Reverend McCarthy: We discourage people under 18. We may put them up for one night. I think there is a legal implication. We have never been involved in it, but if they are under 18 we manage to get them referred some place. In fact last year there were four young fellow from Ottawa came for supper. We called the police in Ottawa, and they had left home that morning and the families didn't even know that they were gone. With the young people we do not fool around; we get right involved. It is no place for them, no environment for them, and we try to discourage them from being involved there.

Senator Fournier: We have a different class of society that we call "hippies". Do you have many of those applying at your door?

Reverend McCarthy: No.

Senator Fournier: No hippies. Thank you, reverend. I will pass the questioning to somebody else but I may come back.

Senator Pearson: I want to ask a question about your summer camp. Just reading the brief, I feel that summer camp has quite an effect on the people. I am just wondering if summer camp could not be made a permanent year-round affair for a certain group of these people who might be advantaged by being in a camp away from the city altogether the year-round, so that they could gradually grow into some feeling of responsibility—the effect of having good food and such like, and the possibility of rehabilitation in that place. Do you think that could be worked out?

Reverend McCarthy: There are possibilities but not in our camp. The camp would have to be relocated. The idea might be worth while thinking about, but you are then involved in treatment, and what I have said throughout is that we have been involved in maintenance, which is somewhat evil in a way but it is a lesser evil. You do take people and you do do something with them, and then you have to put them back whence they came. What you are saying is: "Now that you have them there, keep them there and see if you can do something with them". For the people that come to our camp I would think that would be a very Utopian type of project.

Senator Pearson: Too high for your class of people altogether?

Mr. McCarthy: No, I wouldn't say that, in no way.

The Chairman: Haven't got the money.

Reverend McCarthy: I don't even believe that money is really the problem either, but I do feel that the type of community has to be where there is going to be feed-back into a community, so you cannot have it set aside, but it has got to be involved in it. It might just be involved in the outskirts, in a suburban area where they can feed in. It is an idea that has not been thought of, I am sure, but it is worth while thinking of.

Senator Pearson: Have any of you men been to an Alcoholics Anonymous group?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Senator Pearson: How did you find it?

Mr. Dorrien: Well, as Reverend McCarthy says, they are getting a little polished now, and their tendency is that if a gentleman goes in with a hundred dollar suit on sort of style, my first association with A.A. was that I had a beautiful apartment in Rosemount in Montreal. I phoned A.A. He came up, he took a look around and he figured: "Well, this gentleman is worth while saving". He took me to hospital, and the first thing he said to me was, "Have you got a hundred dollars on you?" Fortunately I did have a hundred dollars on me, and I turned it over to him and he helped me then. Then I went to a couple of their meetings and I decided it was not for me; these are not "we" people. I tried it for a few times.

Senator Pearson: Isn't it possible to have another group together? You do not have to mix with that group; you can have an association of your own of "we" people as you call it.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I think most of these people are very selfish people.

Senator Pearson: You mean they are individuals like yourself.

Mr. Dorrien: Let us say a gentleman is trying to keep a sober head. He picks you up and he brings you to meetings here and there and everywhere else. Now, who is helping who? He is helping himself.

I found out in two or three cases—I have had two or three sponsors—that I was in the same bracket as them. At that time I did hold down a very responsible job, and I found out that these people were concerned primarily in meeting but in themselves; and through me they were helping themselves, so I decided to start looking elsewhere and I couldn't find it.

Senator Fournier: What is wrong with that? He is helping you, you are helping him, and you are working together.

Mr. Dorrien: That is not the way I found it. I will give you an instance. I did feel I was going to slide or slip, so I phoned up my sponsor and his wife came on and she was crying. I said: "What is the matter?" She said: "My husband is not here. He was left with another woman."

The Chairman: That doesn't only happen to alcoholics.

Mr. Dorrien: No, I understand. She figured I should have kept her husband on the straight and narrow. He had been dry for approximately two and a half years. I was depending upon him at that particular time and he was not there. Now, this is a fancy outfit at one of the Knights of Columbus halls in Rosemount.

Let us put it this way, that I find that A.A. is not for me, so I had to seek guidance somewhere else.

Senator Pearson: My experience of A.A. is out in Saskatchewan, and the group in this town that I come from take all types from the very bottom up. One is a storekeeper-manager, owner of the store; one is a carpenter and such like, one is a truck driver. They have all done well as far as I can see, and they are all holding down responsible jobs now. Apparently liquor is not touching them at all. They may be an exception to the rule, I don't know.

Mr. Dorrien: No, it is possible in a small community like that, but in large cities we have got numerous groups. There may be a doctor, maybe some director of a company. He is not going to associate with me. I am just a common mechanic.

Senator Pearson: This is why I say why not form another group of people of "we" class as you call them, to help each other?

Mr. Dorrien: As Reverend McCarthy says, our English group that comes to the Old Brewery Mission, we can only get a few meetings a year, and this is what is happening. In a predominantly French-speaking community we run into problems like that.

Reverend McCarthy: I don't agree. It is a case of self-motivation: if you want the thing, you are going to get it.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Reverend McCarthy: You don't need outside sponsors; you don't really want it. That is the long and short of it; whereas the French group has had quite a few success stories. Men are back on the street, in the course of a year there are two or three people. That is two or three more than you guys have been putting out.

Mr. Dorrien: Perhaps, yes, I would say that, Rev., but their meetings, they come in from a particular group, but ours are not. These people that do come to see us in English-speaking groups, some of these gentlemen are in very good positions and the association is not the same. I have been in quite a few of their meetings and I have found it this way.

As I say, a doctor is not going to deal with a common mechanic. This is what I find, and I find that Alcoholics Anonymous is not for me.

Senator Pearson: I can see your point there.

Mr. Dorrien: I am not kicking it, you know.

Senator Pearson: I can see your point quite easily, that it is pretty hard to mix the two.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Senator Hastings: Jimmie, if A.A. is not for you, could you tell us what is for you?

Mr. Dorrien: Well, Reverend McCarthy has tried to help me on numerous occasions. I have worked in the mission, and I have held some responsible positions with the mission. You have got my background there, a rough sketch of it. I have tried. I go out and I say, "Well, this is not for me." I think back in the past, and I have earned in the past anything up to $12,000 or $15,000 a year as a mechanic. I have travelled all over North America and South America. I have worked for the Government of Canada in the Canadian north. I get $20, $30 a week, and I think back to what I had and then start getting lonely and I say to myself, "The only people that are real, the only people that I know are sitting down at the Jordan Bar", and the first thing I know I take a drink and I am lost.

I think if given a chance—like myself I have sent men out on jobs from the mission. People phone in. Now, a gentleman goes out on a job. He does his day's work and he gets a dollar and a quarter an hour or something like that, and bus tickets. He tries, he comes out and buys himself a meal and a package of cigarettes. He has worked a whole day and he will wind up perhaps at the end of the day with $6 in his pocket. Then the next day there is no job available and he hits the sidewalk. Perhaps it is cold, perhaps it is raining and there is nowhere to go, so he turns into the closest place, a tavern. "I'll only have two". Now, we are a closed group, us gang. We go in, we sit down, and we have six bucks in our pocket. Perhaps we meet a couple of our buddies and they have only got fifty cents. So the three of us sit there and the $6 goes. We are sitting down there, and the next thing we wind up...

Senator Fournier: What do you do in good weather, if this is only in bad weather?

Mr. Dorrien: Have you ever been lonely; do you know what loneliness really is?

Senator Fournier: Yes, I know.

Mr. Dorrien: I have been in a crowd in Times Square in New York City and I was very lonely.

Loneliness drives you into a bar. You are looking for company. I cannot walk down the street or meet you in the park the way I am dressed and strike up a conversation, so I have to go and look for the people I know.

Senator Fournier: You are opening up a point for a lot of discussion. We would like to hear it, but this is no place for a long argument.

Mr. Dorrien: No, I understand.

Senator Fournier: Although we are very glad to hear what you have to say. You made the statement that you thought you were going to slip or slide. When you felt you were going to slide, wasn't there some feeling of responsibility within you to make you pound your head and say: "I am not going to", or did you just wade right into it?

Mr. Dorrien: No, I have fought it. I am sitting here to-day with money in my pocket and I haven't had a drink now...

Senator Fournier: God bless you then.

Mr. Dorrien: ...I would say for about a week and a half.

Mr. Robson: You won't have it long.

Mr. Dorrien: But I have fought it.

Senator Hastings: Jimmie, you still haven't answered my question. You have told me about the problem, and I have some conception of your problem. I know the fear of loneliness and the remorse, and where you find the answer, but I want you to tell me what we can do. If we instituted a guaranteed minimum income of $300 a month, would that help you, or would that simply hasten you to your grave?

Mr. Dorrien: I don't think so, no. I would need assistance; but give us back our human dignity, give us back our self respect, give us the chance to try. There are men down there in that mission that have brains and intelligence, but when you are beat down so often, as Reverend McCarthy says, you come up so far and they stop you when you get back so far, and they tell you that that is as far as you are going to go and that is it. Sure, we need assistance.

The Chairman: Dorrien, when you were occupying your important administrative job in the north country, who told you that was as far as you could go?

Mr. Dorrien: Numerous people that had more government experience than I had.

The Chairman: You had an important job?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

The Chairman: Paying you good money?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

The Chairman: And you were quite happy there?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

The Chairman: Contented and with responsibility?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

The Chairman: Because I gather you have a spark of leadership in you. Why did you leave when you were at that level? You are a young man of forty-four in the prime of life.

Mr. Dorrien: Why don't you go down and tell some of the employers in Montreal that?

The Chairman: I am telling you. You were at that high level and in the prime of life, and you walked out or something happened that you left. Why?

Mr. Dorrien: Well, I have seen so much wastage in the north, and we have exploited the Eskimos.

The Chairman: Never mind the Eskimos.

Mr. Dorrien: I am just giving you an idea.

Reverend McCarthy: Weren't you sick when you came out?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I was.

Reverend McCarthy: That is the answer.

Mr. Dorrien: I was what they term as "bushed".

The Chairman: We understand that term. That can happen.

Mr. Dorrien: I was draughting some drawings and they got all mixed up and one thing and another.

The Chairman: You had a nervous breakdown.

Mr. Dorrien: Well, it was approximating that.

The Chairman: When you came back, you did something about it, why didn't you then try to move back into the territory and the job that you knew so well?

Mr. Dorrien: I figured if I went back into it, perhaps the next time I would have more of a breakdown.

The Chairman: What kind of mechanic are you?

Mr. Dorrien: You name it and I am it. I have worked on Diesels, steam...

The Chairman: If that is your answer, "You name it and I am it", you are priceless in the market to-day. There is one thing they need above everything else in this country and that is mechanics who know something about mechanism. Why can't you get a job at your own price and on your own conditions almost?

Mr. Dorrien: Forty-four years old, they don't want it.

The Chairman: I don't go along with you on that. I think if a mechanic walks into any automobile repair shop to-day, they wouldn't care if you were as old as Santa Claus, they would hire you because they are so hard up for good mechanics. At forty-four you are in the prime of life.

Mr. Dorrien: Just go down to Montreal and find out.

Reverend McCarthy: You have had some hang-ups with booze, which makes you not a good mechanic, right?

Mr. Dorrien: You can be the best mechanic in the world, but if you are on the booze and you aren't there, you are no good.

Senator McGrand: This group of people that you know each other, I presume they are on friendly terms with each other?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, sir.

Senator McGrand: And you realize that men in the A.A. that wear a hundred dollar suit are in a little different category and they can fraternize with each other, but cannot your group, made up of individuals who know each other, find that spark among yourselves that activates a person to lift himself up?

Reverend McCarthy: Charlie, can't you find something that would activate to help yourself in your own community? Can you do things together? You obviously can drink well together and do all kinds of things together. Why can't you help yourselves together?

Mr. Robson: Pretty lonely when you are by yourself, to help yourself when you are all alone in a gang.

Senator McGrand: You are not alone with your pals, now. When you are with your pals and you talk things over, why don't you say: "Well, boys, it could be better if we tried"? Perhaps you would find the spark that lifts you up rather than keep talking about the people who are beating you down, and say to yourself: "It is within me and not in my neighbourhood to improve my situation"? Can't you find that sort of fellowship among yourselves? I don't want a long answer. I have another question.

Mr. Robson: We might be like that for a week or two, and then we just go right back in and go for a drink and right back into the same rut.

Senator McGrand: If that is what it is, there is not much use giving you a chance, if this is going to be your approach.

Another question just to Mr. McCarthy. You mentioned that most of your inmates are friendly and docile until you invade their privacy, when they tend to be a little nasty. Of course, that is the old animal instinct of defending your territory. How do these people today, when we are tearing down the inside of a city and building up high-rise apartments, when the community in which they live is disintegrating, in your experience how do you best achieve something, with them as a group or with them dispersed all over the place? Isn't there a group therapy there?

Reverend McCarthy: There is, but how are they to hear without a teacher? Their old folk ways, their old habits, their old patterns, are something that they adore, and this is it. This is all strange to them, rushing and the Metros and the Expos, and everything else is strange to them. So they shelter, they lock themselves up, they go to tavern because that is where they are. They talk about things and they watch a ball game. We instituted a program just by putting T.V. in the mission. Unfortunately we cannot do it all the time, but on rainy days definitely the people can stay in the mission. We watch when a World Series is on or when the hockey series is on we let them watch T.V. We figure the taverns have a real drawing card for these fellows, and they stay out and watch T.V.

The older people are a real concern. If the fellow does have a few drinks and upsets this old people's home that he is in, he is out. "We don't want your kind here", and so he is out. Then where does he go? He gets a cheap room where he can afford to exist; he comes down to the mission and bums food. If he needs clothes, he comes down there and eventually we bring him in. We have not had the opportunity to bring too many in because we don't have the space.

Senator McGrand: What can you do; what is the prescription that is going to help that fellow? What can you give that fellow that helps him, just money?

Reverend McCarthy: We have a small room group which is an amazing group. It was started by two of our social work students who came down to work in the mission this year. They are at the McGill School of Social Work. They were operating an old people's group in another community centre, and they wondered if they could do something down there. We gave them a room, gave them a T.V., and they meet just once a week. The men can come in any other time during the week, but once a week they have this group therapy type of thing where they talk. For years, let us say, Charlie and Neil never talked to each other. Now they talk to each other, and they think that Charlie is not a bad guy and that Neil is not a bad guy, because they communicate, but before they were isolated and alone and they suffered from loneliness.

Senator McGrand: A self-imposed loneliness.

Reverend McCarthy: That is right.

Senator McGrand: That is it, a self-imposed loneliness.

The Chairman: What do you say to that, Robson, self-imposed loneliness?

Mr. Robson: You don't know anybody.

The Chairman: I know, but you have got two children who may have grandchildren as far as I know in Montreal. Do you see them?

Mr. Robson: I seen them last year.

The Chairman: Last year?

Mr. Robson: Last summer.

The Chairman: How old are the grandchildren?

Mr. Robson: One is four and one is two.

The Chairman: Interesting age, aren't they? How come you only see them once a year? Do they live that far away from you?

Mr. Robson: No. Well, about 10 or 12 miles.

The Chairman: The sons have cars and they can pick you up?

Mr. Robson: My young son has a car.

The Chairman: And don't they give you company and friendship?

Mr. Robson: I can go any time I want.

Reverend McCarthy: Aren't you ashamed?

Mr. Robson: I don't like to go.

Reverend McCarthy: Isn't that why you don't go? Why don't you tell them how you went last year? How did you get there last year?

Mr. Robson: They came to me.

Reverend McCarthy: They came down to see you and you had fallen on the sidewalk when you were stoned one night?

Mr. Robson: Yes, twice.

Reverend McCarthy: You had a slit on your head, and your daughter-in-law looked at you and said: "Oh, my God, dad, come home", isn't that right?

Mr. Robson: That is right. I got ten stitches in my head, and two weeks later I fell on my face.

The Chairman: How much more friendship do you want when your daughter-in-law and not your son came and said, "Come on home, dad", when they saw you in some difficulty?

Senator Quart: That is wonderful.

The Chairman: Isn't that worth while, something nice that can happen to a man, to have the hand of friendship extended?

Mr. Robson: Yes. I just don't like to stay there, that is all.

The Chairman: We don't understand everything around this table.

Mr. Robson: Another thing where he lives, he lives I don't know a soul there. The only ones I know are him and his wife and the two grandchildren. I don't know a soul. If I want to go to somebody I know I have to go 10 miles.

Senator Fergusson: I can understand that very well. That can happen. Taking the case of people who live with their children some place with which they are not familiar, they cannot be happy no matter how kind the children are.

The Chairman: I was talking about visiting. I didn't say living.

Senator Fergusson: I thought you meant living.

The Chairman: Oh, no. Go ahead, doctor.

Senator McGrand: You mentioned that they did not know each other until they got group therapy. Now they do know each other, and surely by exchanging their problems with each other and their attitudes towards their problems, they ought to be able to get at least that fellowship that goes along with being in the same boat; isn't there something in that which should relieve you of your loneliness, unless you are determined to remain lonely?

Mr. Robson: No, I am not determined. I get along with everybody. I know a lot of fellows. I know every guy in skid row, and that is no lie.

Senator McGrand: That's good, you know.

Mr. Robson: I worked in the kitchen and served them when they were coming through the line; I know them all.

Reverend McCarthy: The amazing thing is, we are developing that this is a phenomenon that might be peculiar to our situation; but if you remember back in the Bible and the parable of the wayward son, he went and mixed with these people, he found fellowship, and when he had blown everything he was alone. This is what happens. Everything is gone, and they find themselves alone. Other people reject you because you no longer have money; they are no longer your peers. You find yourself with a new group of peers, and how does that group operate? As soon as one guy gets an unemployment insurance cheque, "Charlie is a good guy, come on!" Next week Jimmie might be getting a cheque from somewhere else or Jimmie might get a couple of days' work. You had better believe they have fellowship, but is it a healthy fellowship?

Senator McGrand: That is what I say, that somewhere they can find that spark perhaps that activates the group.

Reverend McCarthy: We need people getting their hands dirty who can isolate people who are obviously in a group that need medical care, that need psychiatric care; get them out of that, let the group function and continue the group. We need people from the community involved in this, and it is a very effective piece of work, we have found it before. Sometimes you get too involved in it so that it is like a new child or a new toy, that you are giving all your attention to this and the other is suffering.

Because of the volume that we have, we must concentrate on the maintenance. So these are little bones that are thrown up, but we find they are effective and, darn it all, if we can get involved in it and have everything going, we would have a different outlook. We would have guys saying: "What are you doing sitting around here week after week? Look at me." It is great to have someone say, "Look at me", who has done something, and it works.

Senator Fergusson: I would like to come back to talking about the camp for the families that you have, where you give them a summer vacation. I would like to know where you get the money, for one thing, how you operate, who pays, and how you choose those who go. I would understand from reading this that it is only families, but according to the list that you gave us of the family status...

Reverend McCarthy: That is something different.

Senator Fergusson: I understand that is something different. I think if you will just wait, maybe you will see the connection. According to those people that you have, it is a very small proportion that are married. Is it from that group that you choose the people to go, or is it from an outside group altogether that you choose people to go to the camp?

Reverend McCarthy: The people that go to the camp are outside the group altogether.

Senator Fergusson: They are, I see.

Reverend McCarthy: This experience started many years ago. In fact, 64 years ago we opened a summer camp, and we took families which used to be from the Griffin town area, from the Point St. Charles area, and basically poorer areas of the city, and it became a camp for poor people, though we have modified that by saying it is a camp for needy people. If a fellow's wife has a nervous breakdown and he is paying for all kinds of treatment, so that they do not have any money for a vacation but the woman needs to be freed from her children, we would take that family to camp. It is completely different to the men's work.

Senator Fergusson: It has nothing to do with the men's work?

Reverend McCarthy: No. The fact, which you did point out, that a lot of them are single men, points to another problem that has not been mentioned so far; that is, that many of our men who are single were dominated by their mothers and when their mothers died they could not function. We had one fellow who was a customs officer almost 40 years, who drank himself out of his job afterwards. His mother used to do his shirts, even press his uniform. He never paid a cent for having his uniform cleaned or anything, because his mother took care of everything. He found himself down in the mission after drinking himself out of all kinds of jobs, and found himself wandering around lonesome and broken. Here obviously was a man of talent. He was clean and neat. What happened? He said: "Well, the only job I have is as a cleaner at the mission". The guy didn't know how to sweep floors. We made him the night watchman, but he didn't know how to make a pot of tea for himself. What I am saying is that the Oedipus complex is very great. Also the fact of being single is one of the contributing factors to homelessness; most definitely, you have put your finger right on it.

Senator Fournier: Where is the camp situated?

Reverend McCarthy: The camp is in Lorraine, which is 18 miles past Morin Heights.

Senator Fergusson: Where do you raise the money to run the camp?

Reverend McCarthy: We have a campaign there during the summertime, and the camp is subsidized by the mission to the tune of about $15,000. It will cost $85,000 this year. Last year we raised about $65,000 and we had to subsidize it by about $15,000 from the mission.

Senator Fergusson: Would you tell us a little more about it; what is it like? Is it a large dormitory type or are there cottages?

Reverend McCarthy: It is a fantastic experience. It is a community of 500 people. We have three main camp sites: one for boys age 8 to 14, one for girls 8 to 14; and mothers with little children of 3 months to 7½ years of age, they live in main camp in separate rooms. The babies are taken to the babies' feeding station in the morning and they are fed formula. We provide disposable diapers—not that it is really a luxury, because if you can imagine the flies around the camp disposable diapers are a necessity. Then they go to breakfast and the little children are fed separately by our counsellors, while the mother sits down to a meal by herself perhaps for the first time in a year, with a group of people who are her peers. During the day there is entertainment and recreation programs for the children. It is a tremendous camp experience, where a mother gets a rest. That is the whole aim of the camp, to take the mother from this environment, give her a rest, and to do something with their children. We try to inspire our counsellors to be something for the children to look up to. I don't know how I am going to beat somebody, but this summer we have to get people who are prominent athletes—let's say the Expos or the Canadiens or something, to come up to our camp and say: "Hey, kids, if you try hard enough you can make it too." There are a lot of them that came from that environment who did make it, and some of them went to our camp. In fact, one of the players in Junior Canadiens to-day is one of our old campers, and these people are really going. That is our goal, what we try to do in the camp setting.

I feel that if we could add something to it, if we had people in the community who will say, "Here we have a homogenous group which maybe if something like this had been mentioned earlier could be worked out", or perhaps we could help them solve some problems while they are there, to lessen their anxiety, and then we are doing something.

Senator Inman: Could I ask a question with respect to that? How do you choose the people to go to this camp?

Reverend McCarthy: They come to us and they are referred from agencies, from churches, and we select them on the basis of need, according to the number of children they have and what have you. There are not many that are turned away. If they are turned away, it is because sometimes they have overstayed their welcome, or they are very aggressive and they upset the whole camp procedure—they know it all and they have all the answers. However, basically almost everybody that comes forward or is sent, we take.

Senator Inman: Any limit to the number in the family?

Reverend McCarthy: No, we have had some families with nine or ten children there.

Senator Fergusson: I am not being critical at all, but it is just that I have been curious. It is a camp for families, but obviously it is for girls and boys and mothers with little children.

Reverend McCarthy: That is right.

Senator Fergusson: There is nothing for the fathers. They must need that sort of rest and relaxation too.

Senator Quart: They have it while they are away.

Senator Fergusson: You may be right.

Reverend McCarthy: This question has been posed many times, and usually it does come from people who are in the know in social work, but to say all men...

Senator Fergusson: You cannot do everything, of course, and I can see there are problems of priorities.

Reverend McCarthy: There would be multi-problems. There would be a problem with alcoholism, which is not there. We are restricted. There will be all kinds of problems and we don't need them.

Senator Quart: I was going to suggest that maybe you could institute a weekend before you close up the camp, for all the fathers of those ones who had come. Then you would be able to compare how they measured up to the wives, and probably you would get greater insight into some of the family problems. Probably they would be bringing bottles along with them in the lost weekend.

Mr. Robson: We would all go to camp.

Senator Fergusson: According to the biographies we have here, Mr. McGowan is a permanent resident. How many permanent residents do you have?

Reverend McCarthy: Between ten and fifteen, but it varies. We have a few that are permanent, and there is no way we can put them out. Neil contributes from his pension money a certain amount to stay in the mission, but there are others who have no income whatsoever and we take them on. For example, we have one retarded chap who has been with us ever since I have been there, and that is 1956.

Senator Pearson: Would he be entitled to welfare?

Reverend McCarthy: Certainly should be.

The Chairman: I am glad you raised that, Senator Pearson, because I notice in the report the words that they do not receive welfare.

I think we had better have an understanding on this, Mr. McCarthy. Under the Canada Assistance Act there is no residence clause. A man formerly used to have to reside in the province for a period of time before he was eligible for welfare, but that was taken out in 1966. Every man in the country is entitled to have his needs assessed and his needs met; that is the law of the land. You may say: "I know the law, and you know the law, but does the fellow who is giving out the relief know the law?" He may not give it to you.

My advice from this committee to you is that you immediately get in touch with the legal aid department—there is one established, the Bar Association have advised us—and it is time that you institute a suit on behalf of someone to assert his rights once and for all. We have to know where to stand. There has been too much buck-passing, not on your part but on behalf of other people, in order to establish that right. You have a perfect case, and you can take it to court. The Bar Association of Quebec were here the day before yesterday, and they said they had a legal aid section. They gave us the impression that they were prepared to fight for social rights. Now, you challenge them very quickly. If you do not know who they are, we will give you their names. You make sure that you qualify somebody—50 per cent of your people are from Quebec anyway; so get someone, a Quebecker preferably but it doesn't make any difference.

Reverend McCarthy: A lot went for assistance and they said, "No way".

Mr. Dorrien: I had just come out of hospital and I went down.

The Chairman: I made it quite clear that you are not the first ones who have been refused, but it is something that we cannot do and that you have to do. Reverend McCarthy can do it on behalf of anyone, to have his rights established in the courts: are you or aren't you entitled? That is it.

Reverend McCarthy: We most definitely will pursue this matter. As a citizen I feel that in no way should we administer welfare to perpetuate drinking, that is my feeling; and that there must be check-mates on this and this thing can be worked. I have been sitting on committees in Montreal and I have been listening very carefully when people in high office have actually questioned the legal rights of our people because they knew that eventually they were going to have either a minority or a majority that was going to force something or other. We have sat and listened to people from Quebec City, to people from the City of Montreal, and we have made proposals on the administration of welfare to these people where it would be co-signed by the mission, and it might be administered weekly if the fellow could not handle it, or whatever it might be. It was still allowing him the selection of it. Everybody was in agreement that it fitted into the Canada Assistance Plan, until they got a judgment from somebody in the City Hall which said, "No way".

The Chairman: Mr. McCarthy, there is nothing in the law that says "worthy or unworthy", and it is not for me, it is not for you, and it is not for any of these people to say: "You are a drunk and you are not entitled to it", or, "You are a drug addict", or something. A person's needs, that is all there is. It is very important that we establish that.

Reverend McCarthy: Most definitely.

The Chairman: You are going to be our prime case on that, because you can do that better than anyone else.

Senator Inman: Of the total number of people that go through your mission, we will say, in the run of a year, how many do you think could be rehabilitated if they were gotten a job and a living wage? Do you think, any of them would come back into the stream of life to work again?

Reverend McCarthy: Could I be a little bit smart in a way, but rehabilitation means to restore someone to his former position.

Senator Inman: Re-establish them.

Reverend McCarthy: There is no way that can happen—re-integrate, yes. I would say there is a tremendous possibility for 25 per cent of our people within a year, if something constructive can happen to them; that there is a good possibility they will be producing again.

Now, there are many hang-ups on this. First of all, if a fellow made what Jimmie made, there is no way he likes to go and start work at $5,000 a year if he made $15,000 a year. His goals have to be re-aligned by him, not by a psychiatrist or social worker, but by him. He has to come to the point where he accepts something useful in his life, that there is purpose, that there is a goal, and that there is a new challenge for him—and, my goodness, there are challenges in this country, and I am glad to hear people saying it here in Ottawa even. There are challenges, there are possibilities, there really are.

The idea of when we were young people, idealizing and looking forward with dreams—these people all had dreams too, and I think they can be realized. If some cluck in bureaucracy, in government, says he is not entitled to welfare and he makes that stick, then if he says, "You are not entitled to welfare because you are a drunk", I say, he should then be in a position to say now: "Because you are a drunk, we have treatment resources available for you. If you take those treatment resources and if you show progress—" and the government is going to pay the shot on it because it is there, the money is set up, "—if you progress and then you find that you need some money to get yourself organized and to get out and hustle a job, we will keep you going for a couple of weeks after you are working, so that you can buy clothing and stuff like that." That is fine but, to point blank say, "No", and not offer any alternative, is sheer hypocrisy and robbing everybody of any rights that they ever had.

Senator Inman: At the top of page 5 you are talking about people being thrown out and you say: "But since we do not want to scare the public, nobody hears about it." Why do you feel the public should not know about these things?

Reverend McCarthy: I am not saying that. I am saying that that is a fact, that our newspapers do not publish these kind of things that happen; that they do not say that so-and-so got mugged downtown, because, after all, these are not nice things and that is not indicative of the overall population.

It was amazing last year—and we are partly to blame and we feel badly about it—when there was a fellow who was paying $35 a month to stay at the mission. He had his own bed and he got clothing. He got his pension which was about $95—I think it is $104 now or something like that—and he would pay the mission $35 a month, for which he got three meals, and they were good meals. At the end of the month he would go out and drink quite a bit, and they would put him to bed. If an ordinary fellow came in, there would be no way he could get into the mission because he would wake up the whole dormitory, but this old fellow they took and put to bed. Fine. We said: "Look, everybody else is paying $50 a month for their food and lodging." When I am talking about everybody, I am speaking of the 15 permanent guests that we have. We worked on this and we said: "Sorry, Alfred, but you have got to pay $50." He said: "Forget it." And he stayed right up until the last day of the month. He got his cheque about six days before the end of the month.

He went out and got himself a room and paid two weeks rent ahead, figuring that if he ran out of money he could come back to the mission on the 15th, which he always used to do before anyway. He went out and got drunk and somebody beat him up so badly that he could not see and he could not walk. Two days later they found him in his bed dead. They said he had a heart attack but, although I am not a doctor, I think he died of a broken heart.

That happens. It has happened to about five or six of our men where they have died as the result of these wounds, and that is obviously what it was. This is in the past few years that this has happened. Regularly people who cannot control themselves with their drinking, get robbed of their money. There is a crowd of leeches that hang around our environment. The Old Brewery Mission is not the greatest place in the world. We are at the bottom of the main street, St. Lawrence Main, and it is the sin strip of Montreal, it is bitter. We are afraid to work with the young people, because they muscle the older people. This is no joke, and we are involved in this all the time. We find that it works against the system, and we are really up against it when it comes to this kind of thing.

Senator Inman: When you say "But since we do not want to scare the public" you mean the papers do not want to scare the public?

Reverend McCarthy: That is right; it is general establishment policy that, after all, Mrs. Jones wouldn't walk the street if she read that she might get robbed, and the poor soul does get robbed; but it does happen and although I do not go along with the scandal sheets that do show it, they are the only people that say it and the police really aren't that concerned about this situation.

Senator Inman: One other question. I think perhaps Senator Croll touched on this and it may not be pertinent now. You say you interview these people who come to you, and you find out why they cannot get social aid.

Reverend McCarthy: We pulled the shot last year. We got forms from the city of information that they required. We mimeographed it and we said: "O.K., fellows, now it is going to happen." Rather than drive them crazy, we figured we would take ten up at a time, so we took ten and we got about three phone calls to the effect: "What is going on?" "Sorry, these people are entitled to relief." We filled out their applications because they can dazzle you with foot work up there and say that you have to have this and you have to have that. We had all the information that they required and there it was. They said: "No, we are going to work out something with you people. We are going to give you some help." I said: "Look, it is not me. I am concerned about the individuals."

So next day we sent 25 to three different offices in the city which were within the area. We are right on the borderline. So then they started phoning in and they said: "No way. Because they live at your mission, there is no way that they can get help." Their idea was that they were subsidizing the mission, which they were not, because I hadn't bothered to ask.

Senator Fergusson: In other words, that disqualified them.

The Chairman: You hadn't bothered to what?

Reverend McCarthy: I hadn't bothered to ask. The only solution therefor must be that we have to go to court.

The Chairman: Not only is it the solution, but it is important because you can strike a blow for every disadvantaged person across Canada. Once we get it established in one court, we have got it, and these people will know where they stand.

Reverend McCarthy: Senator Croll, what happens in this case? Obviously it is not nice to say, but certain people are shaky, and if we take an individual and we start processing the thing and right away they give him a cheque, what happens then?

The Chairman: You mean they acknowledge it, they give him a cheque, and you wouldn't take the cheque?

Reverend McCarthy: I wouldn't turn the cheque back.

The Chairman: But all you want is that when the cheque doesn't come that you get hot.

Reverend McCarthy: That is right.

The Chairman: They will hand you the cheque, I think they will, once you threaten to take action. They won't go to court if they have a head on their shoulders. Now, don't go to court with a bad case but make sure it is on a good grounds. When I say "bad" I mean one that for some reason or other gives them an "out".

Reverend McCarthy: What I was thinking of doing was that if a fellow makes application and they turn him down, we wait for a month and we say that we want that back month that he applied for; do it that way.

The Chairman: You make the application, go to legal aid and let them work out the mechanics, and keep us informed.

Senator Fournier: Is the Reverend Father aware of the legal aid that the Bar Association are offering?

The Chairman: I indicated that to them to-day and Mr. McCarthy knows about it. He is knowledgeable.

Senator Fournier: Because they were very open to what you mentioned this morning, and they are just waiting for the chance to do something.

The Chairman: He knows the people there.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk to Jimmie and Charlie again. Charlie, according to your biography, you got troubles, wife trouble, financial trouble and health trouble. I am wondering if you would tell me what you think is your basic trouble?

Mr. Robson: Drinking, I guess; that is about all.

Senator Hastings: You acknowledge that?

Mr. Robson: Yes, I acknowledge that.

Senator Hastings: And Jimmie?

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I would say that too; loneliness as well, and thoughts of the past. I cannot stay in a room by myself; I need to be associated with someone. If I had the proper type of job, and I realize now, as Reverend McCarthy says, that I cannot go back to where I was before, but I would say the past couple of weeks I have been trying very hard but I cannot find suitable work, and I am willing to work at anything at the moment. I hope that when I do start work, I can hold on to a little bit of money, and I will try my best anyway. I think basically it is dreams of the past and alcoholism.

Senator Hastings: About dreaming of the past, you cannot do anything.

Mr. Dorrien: I understand that.

Senator Hastings: None of us can do anything about that.

Mr. Dorrien: But when you are walking the streets and you are alone, you do revert back to the past.

Senator Hastings: When I asked you how we could help you—and we still haven't the answer—you replied by saying: "Give me back my self-dignity, give me my self-respect".

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Senator Hastings: I think Mr. McCarthy said we cannot do it.

Mr. Dorrien: He is trying to do that but...

Senator Hastings: He cannot do it.

Mr. Dorrien: No, but he can help me along the way if I can go to him and ask, but if a man has not got the wherewithal—right now he is doing a wonderful job and since I have known him he has done a wonderful job, and he has forgiven me an awful lot of tribulations; but I think if we had, as we were talking about, welfare, I went and asked for welfare. As I say, I cannot stay in a room by myself, but I want to stay in the Brewery Mission where I have friends.

Senator Hastings: Fellowship.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I have fellowship, and he says: "No, you can't stay in the Brewery Mission. You go out and get work." Well, in the city of Montreal right now you get $80 a month welfare, and a half decent room to compare with what is in the Brewery Mission—I mean, I can go in any night and have a shower, have a shave when I want. I can sit down and watch T.V. I can read newspapers, play cards, sit and talk with my buddies about different aspects of life if we want to. We can even talk about Mr. Trudeau and his trip out west. I can do all those things. Whereas I would say to get a room to compare with this I have to go to maybe $13 or $14 a week. That is to start with. After that I have to buy a little food and a little bit of tobacco. Then I find I am still walking the streets, because $80 is not sufficient to keep me. So I come down and revert back to my buddies and I say: "No use me staying in that room. I may as well stay in the Brewery Mission. I am with friends".

Then, of course, if you have a little of your welfare cheque left, you say: "Well, come on and have a beer, fellows." That is the way it starts.

If I was in the Brewery Mission and I was getting assistance, and it was being demonstrated to me by Reverend McCarthy and he says, "Here are so many dollars", I go out and get myself a job and I am trying and if I am thinking I am slipping I won't go to my buddies but I will go to him and say: "Rev.—", which I have done twice, I think it is...

Reverend McCarthy: Jimmie, I think we have gone and on, but what I want to say I have said to you for years now. You just said: "I haven't got the wherewithal." You are a liar. You have the brains, you have the intelligence, you have been blessed with that; you have the knowledge to be able to speak and to sell yourself and do all kinds of things. I have told you that, Donnie has told you that, George has told you that, and now Senator Hastings has told you that, and I am sure there are other senators who would. Who else do you want to tell you that you have the wherewithal to do it? All you have to do is to have the guts to get up and say: "To hell with the world. I am going to make it."

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, O.K., Rev.

Reverend McCarthy: And if you walked away from here this morning...

Mr. Dorrien: You go out on the street in the morning with not a dime in your pocket and look for a job.

Reverend McCarthy: I put a dime in your pocket; you have got money in your pocket.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes, I have. O.K.

Reverend McCarthy: I think you can make it, and, boy...

Mr. Dorrien: I am certainly going to try.

Senator Hastings: I think you can make it, and I think you have taken the first step towards it when you told me your trouble was alcohol.

Mr. Dorrien: I admit that, but I wasn't always an alcoholic. I did take a drink and perhaps I was a problem drinker, and there is quite a few in Parliament right now who are problem drinkers, perhaps quite a few alcoholics; but they can afford to have it and I couldn't.

Senator Hastings: There are a lot of alcoholics who cannot afford it either around here.

Mr. Dorrien: For instance, me.

Reverend McCarthy: Our problem is we are Irish.

Mr. Dorrien: Right.

Senator McGrand: Going back to group therapy you have said: "Give me back my dignity."

Mr. Dorrien: Right.

Senator McGrand: When you are with your buddies, why don't you try a little Cooeyism: "Everything in every way is getting better and better." If you keep saying that often enough, you are going to influence somebody to believe it really is getting better and better. Cooeyism has made great strides from 40 years ago.

Mr. Dorrien: There is the City Mission run by Mrs. Russell where we do stay on wet days. We don't have too much money. We have a few packages of tobacco. Perhaps we are a little bit cold and we wander around to the Brewery Mission and we sit down and there is a kind of comradeship forms there. You sit down and you say to yourself, you read a book and you say: "I will try better to-morrow." I mean, it is there, but then you go out and you make the effort. I went in, when was it, last week...

Senator Hastings: Just say: "We will do better to-day."

Senator McGrand: It is the sustained effort of that being repeated over and over again among yourselves, one saying to the other.

Mr. Dorrien: I think sometimes you form this in the back of your mind; like, for instance, sometimes you walk down the street and you see one of your buddies who is really under the weather—and I mean under the weather—and you say to yourself: "Thank God I am not like that to-day"; but the point is we might get a couple of dollars and we will be like that to-morrow. This is the main problem, I think. I know it is not laughable, doctor, believe me it is not.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, could we hear from the other two witnesses, because this could go on all day.

The Chairman: Yes, I was going to suggest that perhaps we might hear from Neil McGowan. Have you got anything to add or that you would like to say?

Mr. McGowan: I have never been so well treated in all my life since I came to the Old Brewery Mission. After my mother died I was sent to this home, and I had three years in there and I was all alone in my room, and I got so darned lonesome I used to go to bed crying at night.

Anyways, I was getting $17.57 from the provincial government which turned my affairs to $105 a month.

Anyways, the home I was in they wouldn't keep me no more because I was too old and I was sent to hospital in Montreal North which I didn't like, and when I was sent out there the Monday after I left there I got a letter stating that they couldn't grant me relief.

Anyways, I said "O.K.," so I stayed out there a whole year, until one morning there was this social service worker from the province or something walked in and came up to me when I was sound asleep in my bed, and he said, "Get up". I jumped up and I said: "What's the matter? Who are you?" He said: "Don't you remember me?" I said, "No". He said: "I am your social service worker." He said to me, pointed to me and said: "You know what I told you last week?" I said: "What was that?" "I told you to be down to my office at 8.00 o'clock Tuesday morning." So when he came pointing at me with his finger

I made a grab for him, and he was right by the second story window. Anyways, the matron called the police and the police came and they took me to the station. Then they took me to Royal Victoria Hospital with trouble with migraine headaches and Parkinson's Disease.

I spent the whole day in the Royal Victoria Hospital until about 7.00 or 8.00 o'clock that night. They wouldn't keep me any more, so they sent me to Sally Ann.

I went to the Sally Ann and I was sent down in the dungeons down at the Sally Ann, in the cellar. That was the most horrible experience I ever had in all my life.

Anyways, I left the Sally Ann next morning and I didn't even have the bus fare on me, so I got on the street and I asked the driver if he would drive me up as far as Pine Avenue. He said, "Yes", so he drove me as far as Pine Avenue.

I got off the bus and started to walk up Pine Avenue towards the Royal Victoria Hospital, because I had an appointment. All of a sudden my feet wouldn't come any more and I knew it was the Parkinson's Disease. So I took small steps and I was running for about 25 or 30 feet and I fell flat on my face. I went right up to the door of this big apartment. I asked them to call the police, that I was sick. So he looked at me and he seen I was sick and he took me to the General Hospital. He called the police and the police took me to the General Hospital, which I told them of my appointment with the Royal Victoria Hospital for 8.00 o'clock that morning. They phoned the Royal Victoria Hospital and the social service worker says, "Yes, we have an appointment for half past 12.00 today." So they made me lie down and rest and they sent me over by taxi from the Montreal General over to Royal Vic. and there shown the doctors what happened.

Then the worker from the Montreal General Hospital sent me down to the Old Brewery Mission and I have been there ever since.

Senator Fournier: That is a very complete story, Mr. Chairman. I think we have heard all we wanted of the sad story, but we are glad to hear it.

The Chairman: We have Mr. Jean Marie Pilote. We do not have the simultaneous translation this morning because they need it upstairs, but Mr. McCarthy can interpret for him. He does not speak English very well and he is a little hesitant.

Senator Fournier: Especially when you were driving a truck, I suppose? [Text]

I can tell you that he was born on 22nd November, 1923, and is 46 years of age and single. He says he had six years of education; two years in the Canadian Army from 1944 to 1946. He is a labourer in construction and has worked for various companies. He was a labourer on trucks for three years in Montreal. He came to the city in search of a better life. His problems are, first, education; second, rural life habits; third, unemployment; fourth, alcoholism; fifth, no financial assistance; sixth, no assistance from the welfare services. That is what is set out in there as I have it translated. Now, find out, Mr. McCarthy, whatever he has to say here.

[Translation]

Mr. McCarthy: Do you have anything you can tell the senators?

Senator Fournier: There are several of us who understand French. So you can talk in French; don't be shy.

Mr. Jean-Marie Pilote: Right now, I'm looking for work. I'm a laborer. I asked for help from the Social Welfare, but they turned me down because I'm able to work. So I'm forced to stay at the Mission in the meantime.

Senator Fournier: If I understand properly, you say that you are able to work?

Mr. Pilote: Yes.

Senator Fournier: In carpentry, plumbing, anything at all?

Mr. Pilote: Yes, anything at all; general work.

Senator Fournier: In construction?

Mr. Pilote: Yes.

Senator Fournier: You agree that right now, in Montreal, in construction, things aren't very good. You're not the only one. You know what happened with that so-called Expo boom. Everybody knows.

Mr. Pilote: It's a shame.

Senator Fournier: Have you been short of work for long?

Mr. Pilote: I haven't worked since last fall.

The Chairman: We are getting it all on tape. Go ahead and hold your conversation; keep talking to him as long as he wants to tell us something. It will all be on tape, so it will be on the record.

Senator Fournier: I am just asking a few questions.

The Chairman: You go ahead.

[Translation]

Senator Fournier: Are you all right at the Mission?

Mr. Pilote: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Now, this problem of drink, do you have it under control, or...

Mr. Pilote: As they say, it's hard to control; sometimes, I let myself go.

Senator Fournier: What province do you come from?

Mr. Pilote: I was born in the Lake St. John district.

Senator Fournier: Is it a long time since...?

Mr. Pilote: I've been in Montreal five years.

Senator Fournier: Have you been an alcoholic, if we can call it that, for a long time? Have you had a problem for a long time? Did it begin when you were young?

Mr. Pilote: Yes, it began at 18.

Senator Fournier: Do you drink beer or hard liquor?

Mr. Pilote: Beer; no hard stuff. I don't care for that.

Mr. McCarthy: Was it before the Army, in the Army or after the Army that you started to drink?

Mr. Pilote: I started drinking, taking beer before I went in the Army.

Senator Fournier: And then, in your occupation, did drinking cause any problems for you? Have you ever been punished for it?

Mr. Pilote: Well, a little; I lost some steady jobs because I drank.

Mr. Pilote: No. I worked in the paper mills. I worked for the Aluminum Company. All jobs I could have kept, if I didn't have that problem.

Senator Fournier: Now, this drink problem, have you made an effort to straighten out? What kind of efforts have you made?

Mr. Pilote: I go to meetings, I listen to them talking, I try to tell myself—the temptation is there all the time.

Senator Fournier: Now, when you've been two months without taking a drink, is it hard to control?

Mr. Pilote: Yes, it's always there.

Senator Quart: During the time you were in the Army, did you go overseas?

Mr. Pilote: No, I was always in Canada.

Senator Quart: Good.

Mr. Pilote: Valcartier, Nova Scotia.

Mr. McCarthy: Do you think there's any difference between Montreal and Lake St. John for finding work?

Mr. Pilote: Back home, it's even worse; there's absolutely nothing. Everybody is on Social Welfare.

Mr. McCarthy: But you lost work in Lake St. John because of drink?

Mr. Pilote: Oh, yes!

Mr. McCarthy: Well, here you haven't worked in construction as you did back there?

Mr. Pilote: I worked six months at the Châteaueau Champlain, and I worked at Expo before it started.

Mr. McCarthy: And now, you're working as a helper on a truck?

Mr. Pilote: All kinds of jobs; whatever I can lay my hands on.

Mr. McCarthy: You didn't try to get help from Domrémy?

Mr. Pilote: Yes, I've been to Domrémy, already.

Mr. McCarthy: Yes? It's a clinic for alcoholics?

Mr. Pilote: Yes.

Mr. McCarthy: Did you take two weeks there, or three weeks, or what?

Mr. Pilote: I went several times. The first time, I was there six months.

Mr. McCarthy: Six months. And there was no change?

Mr. Pilote: It's very hard.

Mr. McCarthy: If you say you're an alcoholic that's not enough. If you say that you want to try to get back on your feet again, that's another matter. If you don't want to, you can take help for six months, ten years, no matter how long, and it won't work.

Mr. Pilote: All I want is to find a job. First of all, I can earn a living honorably.

Mr. McCarthy: You want to find a job and then drink like that?

Mr. Pilote: Yes, that's right.

[Text]

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, this is a young man of 46 years of age and single. One of the things he tells us is that he came from a small town. Find out where his family is and find out why he doesn't go back there to try and rehabilitate himself. Will you see if you can get something on that line of questioning?

Senator Fournier: I think as far as the second question is concerned, it has been answered. They moved out because there was no employment.

The Chairman: In the small town.

Senator Fournier: Yes.

The Chairman: Find out what family he has. There is no employment in the big towns, so what difference does that make?

[Translation]

Senator Fournier: Why didn't you go back to your Lake St. John region? Weren't you tempted?

Mr. Pilote: Well, my parents are dead. And I don't get along with my brothers.

Senator Quart: Your parents are dead?

Mr. Pilote: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Now, I'm interested in knowing, your stay at Domrémy, six months, that's pretty long, eh?

Mr. Pilote: I wasn't there for six months. It was twenty-one days. I was six months without taking a drink.

[Text]

The Chairman: All right, we will leave it.

Reverend McCarthy: He took 21 days treatment, and he went 60 days dry, which is the longest dry period he has had for a long time.

Senator Fournier: He did very well, you know. He was six months.

Reverend McCarthy: I think so.

Senator Fournier: I am quite familiar with this Domrémy, which we have at home, and I took an active part in it. That is why I asked him a few questions.

[Translation]

What made you fall after six months? I'm sure you were proud of yourself, eh?

Mr. Pilote: Well, I don't know; I took a drink.

[Text]

Senator Hastings: Mr. McCarthy, I wonder if I could ask you one quick question?

The Chairman: Just a minute. Have you finished?

Senator Fournier: I was going to ask him why he fell after six months. He is going to give me an answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Pilote: I was never accepted in my family because of my taking a drink. It caused resentment, and it made me mad.

[Text]

Senator Fournier: There was always some resentment within his family.

The Chairman: I gathered that. Senator Hastings.

Senator Hastings: With respect to the operation of your mission, you have the board of directors, but are the men represented on the board of directors at their meetings?

Reverend McCarthy: No, we have group therapy meetings where they make presentations, and we forward them. In fact, I usually act on their presentations before they go to the board. If it is a red hot thing, bang, we do it.

Senator Hastings: But in the administration they do not sit in on the decision-making.

Reverend McCarthy: No.

Senator Hastings: The men themselves.

Reverend McCarthy: No.

Senator Hastings: I think you mentioned there was a staff of 24, yourself, and it says here that you have two interviewing. How many professionals are there on the staff?

Reverend McCarthy: None.

Senator Hastings: Who are doing the interviewing, who are these two you mention?

Reverend McCarthy: I have two assistants who are pretty tremendous guys that I have worked with for years. We found out they had leadership qualities. They worked within another environment, and I saw them function, and they could relate to men and were interested in helping men. We tried one of them and he did a tremendous job. Another fellow, sitting right there, came in and he is doing a tremendous job, and they handle most of the load, not so much administration but maintenance and operation of the mission along with the interviewing and feeling out, doing the work in the mission. These guys get their hands dirty.

Senator Hastings: That is just three of you in this category?

Reverend McCarthy: That is right. Then we have a maintenance man also whom they call "mother" or "father".

Mr. Dorrien: Father.

Reverend McCarthy: Who is a father to these fellows.

Mr. Dorrien: Yes.

Reverend McCarthy: We used to employ the men for $35 a week as cleaners; this is years ago. We found out that on Saturday, as soon as they could get to the bar, they were there; and we, not being there normally on Saturday and Sunday, found that there was chaos in the mission. So we decided we would do something different, and we hired the men for $10 a week, and we hired five times the number of men. We ministered to them, and they build themselves up to $20, $35, $45 a week. Our main goal was that once we got them up to that level of handling that kind of money again—because this is a big problem that they do not know how to handle money and they can make a hundred dollars and they will blow it; but we had them handling $45 a week and hoping to feed them into other jobs out in the community. Sometimes it works; sometimes it doesn't.

Any time you contacted a person in the mission, the first time the man came into the mission it was a traumatic situation. You would take off his clothes and put them in the fumigator, because you didn't know where he slept. The mission could walk away. So you take everything that he owns, put it in the fumigator, and give him a hospital nightgown, a bar of soap and a towel and say, "Take a shower". The guy is pretty shaken up, so we felt that we had to have somebody there that could pass cigarettes around, talk to him, feed him back to my assistant Don in the morning, or George. We have followed through this way so that we have contact with the men.

I am not saying that works all the time, but that is our goal, to be that close to them so that we can pick them up and do something with them.

Senator Hastings: You said we should encourage them to help themselves. The purpose of my question was whether you were encouraging them to assume responsibility, as you obviously are, but they are the best ones to help themselves and should be encouraged. Along with that I think there is ability here that probably could be used in the decision-making and in the board of directors of this organization.

The Chairman: Senator Carter, Mr. McCarthy, who is the executive secretary of the Old Brewery Mission, has given us a very enlightening morning. I know you have some views on these matters. The questioning here has been pretty thorough this morning, but is there anything particularly, off the top of your head, that you would like to ask? He is a pretty knowledgeable fellow.

Senator Carter: You say everything was pretty well covered. I read the brief last night for the first time, and there were two or three things stuck in my mind.

The Chairman: Go ahead and ask him, and we will see.

Senator Carter: Reverend McCarthy did not seem to be too happy with the A.A. group, nor with the mental health group. They have covered that, have they?

Reverend McCarthy: No, mental health wasn't.

The Chairman: A.A. was covered.

Senator Fergusson: Mental health, that is one thing I was interested in.

The Chairman: Go ahead.

Reverend McCarthy: We have been having quite a few problems in Montreal with alcoholism. There has been no force behind it; there have been no people involved in getting some progressive work done. There has been a tremendous amount of pockets of work by various psychiatrists, medical doctors and social workers, all in their little empires spread around. We got them together one night and we had 200 people in a meeting, and we said to the government of the Province of Quebec, through their Optat, which is the comparative group to the Ontario Research Foundation, and we said: "Look, we want something done." They said: "Fine. Now that you have organized maybe we will get something done"; except in this group we also had the guy that paid the pay cheques, and he said, "I want something done tonight", and it was.

Then the Canadian Mental Health Association got on the band wagon with this drug thing with young people, which is a tremendous problem, and they said: "If you are going to a program, we are not going to wait for six months but we are going to do it now. We are going to do it our way."

What I am saying, in an Irish way perhaps, is that for many years we have been hung up with people who are mentally ill in our mission. 35 per cent of the people in our mission are mentally ill who need treatment. I say: Where have these people been? We cannot get treatment for them. 35 per cent of 3,500 men is about a thousand at least, 1,500 maybe, who need treatment. How in the world are you going to get them treated? Where are the clinics? What is involved? No, people are glory-seeking and getting involved in things that everybody is getting involved in today, while these guys sitting down in the mission we will write them off. There is only a certain amount you can write off, and then they are going to become the majority.

I wrote that brief about six times in six different ways. In one of them I said: "As a husband and as a father, I am not too happy about having these kind of people walking our streets." I think this is a very serious problem that people just do not seem to want to get involved in.

Senator Carter: You did not seem to have too high an opinion of professional social workers either. Have you had any experience with them that accounts for this?

Reverend McCarthy: You got the message. Actually, there is a big problem and perhaps it is a dichotomy. Through the volume we are restricted to maintenance. We have to deal with the people the best way we can, and we cannot be involved in lengthy projects of treatment; whereas with the professional social worker, if the thing is going to work it has got to be on a treatment basis where they see results. You get hung up when you go to an organization which has a thousand cases with only ten workers, and what they do then is to say: "Only the best prospects are the ones we are going to work with; the others we are going to maintain." So there is a frustration, because I do not believe maintenance is the answer, but it is only part. That is the rule of our mission, but as a priest I feel there is more than maintenance, and that is my hang-up, I guess; but when you see the social worker saying: "You can't do anything with those guys", I say you can and I really believe you can.

Maybe from their example of isolating and doing something, what I say is, "O.K., fine. We will isolate. You take them, because we figure that something can be done with them, and we will maintain the ones that we have left here."

Senator Carter: Do you do that; do you bring people along to the point where they can benefit from professional assistance?

Reverend McCarthy: In the City of Montreal there are no men's organizations. We used to have a men's section of the Red Feather where you could deal with men. The only time we can get people involved in hospitals is in emergency situations, and we try not to abuse that because when we do need it we might not have it.

We work very closely with the John Howard. That is only for a limited number of people, and we have a tremendous response there, but where can we feed men in our city? There are not many places that we can feed them.

Senator Carter: Do you ever follow up on people who have passed through, that you have brought up and rehabilitated and who have gone out and who have then come back with success stories; have you followed up cases where they have really gone out and become integrated in the community again?

Reverend McCarthy: Let us say we know of a few, and that is the straight truth. There are many who, once they make it, there is no way that they want to be associated with the mission again; they are afraid to come back for fear that they might fall again. I think that is a genuine fear that they have, so that we do not hear from them.

I used to say that if you did not see a fellow, it could be one of three things: either he made it or he is in the canal or he is in the bucket. I used to be a prison chaplain, so I used to find them up there. If you didn't see a fellow, it was one of three things, that either he made it, he died, or he is in gaol.

The direct answer is that follow-up we do not really have. We do hear success stories. We know of one fellow who was an engineer and who is now a truck driver; he is very happy, he has no responsibilities.

Senator Carter: You make one interesting recommendation to my mind. You pick out D.V.A. hospitals and suggest that they be set up for treatment of this type of people. Why do you pick the D.V.A.?

Reverend McCarthy: For two very subtle reasons, and they are about as subtle as a pair of army boots. One is that the D.V.A. is federal, which you people are involved in. Secondly—and I mentioned this earlier—in the D.V.A. hospitals they do have treatment for alcoholics but it is under the table. Alcoholism for a veteran is considered a self-inflicted wound. He is either dismissed from the army as unlikely to be an efficient soldier; his term is up and he is let go; or, if he is a veteran and he comes back with alcoholism, they do treat them in the hospital but it is under the table.

The Chairman: What do they call it?

Mr. Robson: M.I.

Reverend McCarthy: "M.I.", that is the term for the O.A. ward, mental ward actually.

The Chairman: But it is alcoholism.

Mr. Robson: It is outside the city.

The Chairman: They do it at Sunnybrook too.

Reverend McCarthy: What I do say there is that in Quebec lately we have heard reports—not lately, but I guess about two years ago—that the government was considering getting rid of the veterans' hospitals, until all the noise came up; but they find that in Montreal they are going to use one ward for paraplegics, and that is set up by a private organization in Quebec. The provincial government, I guess, is renting it for a dollar a year and the organization is funding it.

Also, in talking with some of these people, the same thing could happen with alcoholics. It could be a model, because they have the experience, they have the know-how, they have been doing it and they know how it should run. They could be a model in the community. There could be a ward set aside very easily for it and then say: "O.K., here is how it is done." Knowing our government the way they are, if it runs very good, they will want a part of it; if it fails, they won't want a part of it. What I am saying is that they are trial situations which will prove...

Senator Carter: You mean, the federal Government could set up a sort of experimental ward which, if successful, would eventually be taken over by the provincial authorities?

Reverend McCarthy: That is right, and I am sure they will gladly take it over.

Senator Carter: Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Anything else, Senator Carter?

Senator Carter: There are a lot of things but they probably have been covered.

The Chairman: Is there anything special? We can tell you if they have been covered.

Something you asked was special and there may be something else. We have had a good morning.

Senator Fournier: I think everything has been covered.

The Chairman: Will you take our word it has been covered, Senator Carter?

May I say to you, Reverend McCarthy, that you have made an excellent impression on the committee, which has heard a great number of briefs and has had the opportunity to pass judgment on persons and their knowledge of the subject. We are particularly appreciative of your dedication and your humanist approach. That you are trying to help people that need help. We think you are on the right course. If we can help, just call on us, because we want to. We are very much impressed by the fact that if you rehabilitate one or ten or twenty, they are saved, and that is the important thing.

We want also to thank you gentlemen who came here and gave us your point of view this morning, which is very helpful to us. You were open, you were clear, and in that way what you told us becomes very useful to us. Thank you, sir, and thanks to the people that you brought.

Mr. Dorrien: You are welcome. The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

WHO ARE THE HOMELESS?

A Brief submitted to the Senate Committee on Poverty—Ottawa—May 14th, 1970

By: The Rev. J. W. McCarthy
Executive Secretary
The Old Brewery Mission Inc.
915 Clark Street.,
Montreal 128, P.Q.

The Old Brewery Mission was founded in 1889 for the purpose of distributing charity and providing for the spiritual and temporal needs of the poor of the City of Montreal and for other benevolent purposes of a like nature. This is the objective of most rescue missions across the country. Some are strongly evangelical, others provide Christian work without proselytizing. The Old Brewery Mission falls into the latter category.

At present there are four rescue missions in Montreal, with a total bed capacity of 800 beds. During the course of a year, The Old Brewery Mission served 3,500 different men and, while there is duplication in other missions, we feel there is an average of 7,500 different men who utilize the various mission services each year. It is also reasonable to assume there are 20,000 men and women on the fringe of mission care. These people live in despicable cheap rooming houses and call upon our resources from time to time. It is only a matter of time before they cross the line to complete destitution. The Old Brewery Mission offers 190 beds per night and in 1969 we supplied the following: 56,737 nights lodging; 104,316 free meals; 6,239 temporary jobs; 2,540 interviews; and 79,529 articles of clothing given free. Our annual expenses have climbed from $65,000 in 1965 to $105,000 in 1970, basically due to larger facilities and increased costs. The Administration, Maintenance and Operation of a mission our size forces us to limit our services to those of maintenance. By that we mean food, lodging, clothing, temporary employment, transportation and financial assistance.

We have attempted to interview each man who comes to the Mission for any one of these services, but we find that the intake alone would require five to ten interviewers per night and two fulltime workers. We feel this kind of interviewing is essential: it gives us insight into the type of people we are serving and helps us to fill the most serious types of need. We presently have two workers (one daytime and one in the evening) pursuing this study.

There are two reasons for restricting this procedure. First—money. It would cost $30/50,000 annually (that money could buy some pretty fancy food) and the other is—“What is the good of knowing what is wrong with people or what their needs are, if there are no resources for treatment or assistance.”

When people find themselves as destitute as our people are, society deems them hopeless. Hopeless because Skid Row automatically infers “Rubby Dubs,” but that is not true and our intake interviews denounce that proposition.

Approximately 35 per cent of all men who come to The Old Brewery Mission suffer from various forms of mental illness or deficiencies and that is their only problem. These 35 per cent are basically non-drinkers; they are the mentally retarded children of yesterday; they are the people the Canadian Mental Health Association have a mental block on: they do not exist. These men exist on garbage pails, on rag picking, on butt trapping and are happy to come home at night to the Mission. Because they are docile, passive and can function, they are free to roam the streets and maybe if they are lucky deliver circulars from door to door. Technically they require a small dose of maintenance and perhaps slight medication, but since these people are so unstable, it is difficult to get them to keep appointments in a General Hospital (Psychiatric Sections) and since medication can produce uncertain reactions to these confused people, generally they are not given any. In some cases, a homeless man may be incarcerated, screened prior to trial, and dispatched to one of two mental institutions. While he is there for a sojourn of one or two months, he longs for the comfortable surroundings of The Main Street, where he has conditioned himself to function. His progress amazes the doctor and he is released with a bag of goofballs, and we mean a bag, and he is a marked man. Marked in that one goofball and a glass of beer means oblivion, so the more nefarious element moves to purchase or steal his medication. By the second or third time of treatment, he realizes that if he takes enough pills he feels nothing, no headaches, no problems, just nothing. When he is coming close to the end of the pills, he panics, he is agitated and unsure, so he takes them all, becomes unconscious and if someone notices him, his stomach is pumped out and he is saved. For what?

Now these things have happened, they are not fabrication. We know that these 35 per cent need help and care and the best that we can offer is a bed, food, clothing and a sympathetic ear. Surely we must be concerned about this, because for every man like that in our Mission, there must be ten others on the street. During the course of 1969, it would be safe to say the three downtown Montreal rescue missions have served a minimum of 1,000 mentally disturbed people and we say again, their major problem is mental illness added to that of rejection by their families and their present homeless condition.

Running a close second to mental illness is alcoholism. In our society there are sociological categories of alcoholism:

1. Problem drinker—rich
2. Alcoholic—middle class
3. Chronic alcoholic—low class—unemployed
4. Skid Row alki—unemployable, brain damaged Wineo, Rubby—lower low class

Generally speaking, alcoholics at the Mission can be classified into every known class of alcoholics and if we haven't seen one it hasn't been classified yet.

Alcoholism presents a serious problem to our society. The general accepted level of alcoholics in Canada was 2 per cent to 2.5 per cent of the adult population ten years ago; today it is 5 per cent; will it be 7.5 per cent or 10 per cent in 1980? At The Old Brewery Mission, alcoholism represents 30/35 per cent of our community. Some have complicated alcoholism in that they also suffer from acute forms of mental illness, others physical illness, caused not only by heavy drinking but by serious accidents which contributed to their drinking and some others had serious accidents as a result of being intoxicated. Currently there is a serious incidence of T.B. among alcoholics and over the past three years we have had 45 men admitted to the Royal Edward Chest Hospital for treatment in their sanitorium at Ste. Agathe, and there are men who refuse treatment and continue to share their bottle with unsuspecting pals.

Eventually we hope to see treatment centres in Montreal for alcoholism, but preliminary investigations lead us to believe this treatment will be centred upon middle class areas. As much as I like A. A. and its programme, it is a known fact that they have gone into the comfort of the middle class where the percentage of redemption is better. So, who cares about the wealth of talent that is reduced to destitution in the Metropolitan areas? The municipal authorities are aware of our plight, but they refuse to administer welfare to men who live at the Mission. We realize that welfare is not intended to perpetuate drinking and we can control that problem by recommending they be cut off from future payments if they abuse the privilege. It is our feeling that our people have contributed to society and given a chance they can contribute again. Welfare cheques are only to help them reorganize and get started again and if a man quits he could be subsidized on a smaller scale to force him to compete. There is absolutely no coordination or concern about the plight of the castoffs of society.

About 10 per cent are the transients or drifters who move from place to place. The other 20 per cent are men who are physically incapacitated and temporarily unemployable—they are the true victims of misfortune. A small number are old men who were freezing in cheap sinful rooming houses (flop-houses), and towards the end of the month they wandered out to the Mission for food. Providing they could walk, we invited them to stay over the winter months on the top floor of the Mission.

It may be strange or ugly to you, but when a man has spent seventy years on the Main Street, his roots and heart are there and he wants to live there or as close as possible.

Gradually the city began to renew itself. Houses and homes were demolished and the old men moved. Gradually they formed a core in a central area. They became marked men,—they liked a beer or two on Pension day; why not? On the way home, a punk would beat him and rob him. When he returns from the hospital, the landlord throws him out. This story happens quite a few times each month, but since we don't want to scare the public, nobody hears about it.

We operate a summer camp for needy families. During the course of a year, we take approximately 500 families to our Laurentian camp site called Camp Chapleau. Here too we see the damning effect of poverty. Mothers have thanked us with tears in their eyes for the wonderful food that they and their children have received and they cry when they leave because they are returning to nothing. One of the main medical problems in camp is upset stomachs and they are upset because of the rich food—food that their poverty has deprived them of. Here again, the only thing we have to offer is a temporary reprieve. Temporary because the average family stay in camp is approximately two weeks. It is our feeling that camps like ours could be the beginning of a new life for poor people. It can give them something to look forward to. We could, in cooperation with welfare agencies, public health people and industry, get to the mothers and children with in-camp interviews. We could stimulate interest and action on the home front. Referral resources could be made come alive. We feel that a summer camp situation can provide the opportunities of hope and salvation for broken and crippled families.

But just how do you go about organizing such a thing? How involved can a mission get when professionals say you are all wrong. We have found that by entering into the domestic situations of camp families that we were once again being involved in stop gap measures and that handouts of groceries, clothing and money was the order of the day to tide them over until welfare help came through. We agree that this kind of work is essential, but without professional referrals and advice, without treatment and care before the next pittance comes due, Mrs. Jones has a gas or oil bill that has to be paid. The budget for such upkeep is beyond our means and we had to cut back to camp expenditures only, with the exception of a two week supply of groceries to 150 desperate families at Christmas. The professional social work agencies say this robs them of their dignity. We say the money they could use for groceries can be used by them to buy presents for their children.

It would seem that our Mission cuts across the grain of our existing resources. It meets crying needs and it does something with a large number of people. We do not yield to the temptation of treating or caring only for the most promising prospects—that is the job of the professional. We take each man, woman or child for what they are. A child of God who needs help and that child has the same potential for good or bad as anyone else. It is up to us to try and make them exercise their powers of good to overcome the sin and stigma of poverty to help them help themselves.

Gentlemen, for a group of people who are not professional, who have no referral resources, who can do no more than help where we can, we say thank you for being kind enough to listen to us and we say thank you to the thousands of people who support us and believe we are doing a good work. It is our profoundest wish that by baring our souls that professionals in all fields may open the doors to the sick and helpless people that we minister to.

PREFACE TO THE SUPPLEMENT

We believe that by continually reexamining ourselves and our work that we can isolate the immediate needs and direct our efforts in that direction. Since the original 1963 Survey proved so popular, we decided to bring it up to date by taking 100 case histories for each successive year.

As in the original Survey, the following samplings and documentations are from consecutive case histories and no attempt was made to segregate anything. The same procedures were strictly adhered to and we therefore have an up to date survey on 100 men who came looking for help to The Old Brewery Mission each year.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES

The Honourable C. P. (Cy) MacDonald

Honourable C. P. (Cy) MacDonald, B.A., B.Ed., Minister of Welfare, October 17th, 1966, is the member of the Legislature for Milestone constituency. Mr. MacDonald is also Minister in Charge of the Saskatchewan Youth Agency.

Born in 1928 at Humboldt, Saskatchewan, he attended public and high schools in Saskatoon. He received his B.A. degree from Notre Dame College at Wilcox, Saskatchewan, and his B.Ed. degree from St. Francis Xavier University, Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

Mr. MacDonald was elected to the Legislature in 1964. In 1965 he was named Legislative Secretary to the Minister of Public Health and given special responsibility in the field of youth. THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY HEARING

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, May 21, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9:30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I will call the meeting to order. There are a few preliminary matters that have to be dealt with.

Next week we have a very heavy week. Monday we have Ontario, Tuesday we have New Brunswick, and on Wednesday we were to have Alberta. Alberta heard that we were coming to Edmonton and Calgary they asked to be heard in Alberta. We have to go out there in any event so I think we would have to agree with that. On Thursday we have the Canadian Medical Association and so the week is a very full one.

Now, all of you have seen a copy of the Canadian Agriculture in the '70s. That is a report of the Federal Task Force on Agriculture which has just been tabled. Chapter 16 of that report is in my view one of the most up to date studies on rural poverty that I have seen in some time or I think that any of you have seen. It is pertinent to our investigations I believe it is essential for our consideration and I am proposing that we incorporate Chapter 16 and the recommendations of Chapter 16 as part of our record. So as to have it all available to anyone who is concerned with poverty and I hope everybody will be.

We are in this fortunate position. We have a large distribution and a very wide reading public. This will give them a view of the rural aspects that I don't think have appeared in our records. Thus with your permission I would ask for a motion that it be incorporated in our proceeding.

Senator Pearson: I so move, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: This morning on my right is the Honourable C. P. MacDonald, the Minister of Welfare for the Province of Saskatchewan. He has been minister since 1966. His curriculum vitae will appear in the proceedings. With him is Mr. William K. Morrissey, director of the Program Development Division, Saskatchewan, Department of Welfare. His curriculum vitae will also appear.

I have asked the Minister to make a statement and then leave himself open for questions.

The Honourable C. P. MacDonald, Minister of Welfare, the Government of Saskatchewan: Thank you very much Senator Croll, senators and madam senator. It is a privilege for me to come before such a distinguished Committee to discuss the problems of poverty in Canada and in particular to the Province of Saskatchewan.

You have received a copy of our brief and it is not the intention of our brief to present solutions for this complex problem but rather to make you aware of our concerns in a variety of fields. We hope to put forth our definition of poverty, the prospective that it should be considered in, the components of poverty, some strategies that should be developed, and outline some attempts of the Province of Saskatchewan to attach this dilemma.

Let me begin by saying that the Government of Saskatchewan is very much aware of the fact that there is a need to re-organize Canada's social security system or program. We strongly suspect that a great deal of money is currently not being spent in the way it should. Our Government stands ready to co-operate in the fullest degree in re-examining Canada's social security systems to make it more effective and more workable.

We recognize to date that existing programs have not solved many of the basic problems of poverty. We also recognize that today in Canada, we have a vast patch-work of existing programs such as family allowance, old age security, unemployment insurance, as well as a vast array of provincial programs provided under the Canada Assistance Act. However Mr. Chairman, I want to say that Saskatchewan and the Saskatchewan government is not enthused with the concept of a guaranteed income. Many people, politicians, social workers, economists, sociologists, are holding up this concept as a magic formula for the problem of poverty. We do not believe that a guaranteed income is an overall solution. Income maintenance programs will not by themselves solve poverty. They will only establish some absolute minimum level of income below which no individual or family disposable income will fall. To suggest that this in itself will be a solution is to completely misunderstand the nature of the poverty problem.

The reason why people are poor are many and varied. Environment, low motivation, physical and mental handicaps, insufficient employment opportunities, not enough training and education, poor housing conditions, inadequate social services, inability to budget wisely and indiscriminate use of credit are all components of the cause of poverty. If we are to be successful in attacking the causes of poverty we must aim our ammunition at these basic causes. Our emphasis must be directed to rehabilitation and elimination of these factors if we are to be successful in providing future generations with a better way of life.

The financial implication of the guaranteed income could seriously jeopardize the financial input required to solve these basic causes. If the financial estimates of the program are anywhere near accurate, from one thousand million to three thousand million, depending on what level the basic is set at, it will place serious strains on the ability of the Canadian taxpayer to pay. A very basic question arises. How are these costs to be met? The cost of welfare services in Canada has been rising rapidly over the past decade.

The guaranteed income could put an overwhelming burden on the taxpayer. What is more serious is that it could destroy his capacity to provide services in many other vital areas. Housing, upgrading, training and rehabilitation, and a wide variety of essential services. Especially, we have a great concern about the impact of such a program on work incentives. One of the basic dangers of any welfare system is the possible effect on personal initiative and ambition. A chronic welfare family of the second or third generation is a serious concern to all Canadians. New programs must be evaluated in relation to their influence to make all Canadians productive members of the community.

Certainly, we are concerned about the lack of knowledge related to this program. Limited experimentation has been carried on in this field. A major change of this type requires more study and more knowledge. In discussing poverty, we believe it is important that poverty in Canada be placed in its proper perspective. First, there is no doubt that poverty does exist in Canada but it is not the absolute poverty commonly understood in various parts of the world. Present programs have generally overcome starvation and malnutrition, etc. However, we do have relative poverty in Canada. Poverty in relation to low income, unemployment, lack of housing, insufficient services, and general alienation of any of our citizens.

Who are the poor in Saskatchewan? It is like most parts of Canada, our poor fall into the following categories; those on fixed incomes, including many of our aged and disabled, one parent families, the sick, and poorly educated and the untrained, the unemployed and the under-employed. Why are they poor? For a very wide variety of reasons which I have already indicated. I would like to point out that Saskatchewan has probably two problems that are of greater magnitude and are greater in our province than in other parts of Canada.

First of all, I refer to the problem of the people of Indian ancestry. Saskatchewan has 8 per cent of our per capita or population of Indian ancestry. 15 per cent of the Indian population of Canada reside in Saskatchewan. 25 per cent of the dependent Indians of Canada reside in Saskatchewan. In other words, Saskatchewan has one of the highest per capita Indian and Metis population in Canada and Northern-Saskatchewan has one of the highest birth rates.

The Chairman: When you talk about Indians, you mean Metis too?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, these are straight Indians.

The Chairman: I just wanted that clear.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Fournier: Would you repeat those figures please?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: 8 per cent, 15 per cent—the Indian population and 25 per cent approximately of the dependent Indians.

Senator Fournier: Thank you.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: The problem is compounded by the fact that many Indian and Metis people live in the north-western area of the province where there is little economic developments. Many lack education and necessary skills. Unemployment and under-employment are widespread, resulting in nearly $5,000,000.00, and this is a very conservative estimate, being spent annually on welfare and services.

Often welfare assistance is more profitable than employment. In addition, the problem is further compounded by the fact that a large portion of the native population in the north still speak dialects. We have attempted many avenues of trying to eliminate this problem or to tackle this problem. We have established a Provincial Department of Indian and Metis Affairs. We have established a Task Force made up of government, the public sector, the private sector made up of business and industry, university and education people, and we have attempted to provide adult education courses. Many such courses are being offered in Saskatchewan including basic literacy, junior and senior up-grading, high school courses, and technical vocational courses which can be taken at various provincial centres. Top priority has been given to provide education and training for our native population on an overall basis. Adult education courses are outlined in the proceedings and are actively encouraged.

In addition, the integration of native children into our provincial school systems is proceeding rapidly. Efforts are also being made to develop courses more suitable to our native children of the north. We have also taken another step that has been rather different perhaps than most other provinces. Saskatchewan has felt that there has been an over emphasis on credentials in job placement, particularly in relation to our poor.

There is now an over-emphasis in obtaining credentials in order to obtain certain jobs. We feel that in many such cases, such credentials are not necessary as far as our native population is concerned. Both we and the government and many of our private industry have re-examined the qualifications for jobs with the result that a great many native people have been hired who at one time would have been turned down.

In addition, training on the job is provided where needed. Very simply, this means that disadvantaged people should be given temporary incentives to enable them to get on their feet. In Saskatchewan we provide special incentives for the construction of houses, for sale or rental to native people. We have required our departments and government contractors to hire a certain percentage of people of Indian ancestry and we have established an Indian and Metis department whose function is to find jobs for native people.

In 1969 we estimate that approximately 5 per cent of the Civil Service in Saskatchewan is made up of native people. We have an ultimate goal of 7 per cent and we have asked industry to set the same target. In reference to Indian and Metis government employment policies, we have set a target by saying that at least 7 per cent of our total service, are to be staffed by people of Indian ancestry by 1971, either in training or in permanent positions. At the present time there is close to 450 provincial Civil Servants of Indian ancestry in Saskatchewan, representing a little over 5 per cent of our total Civil Service staff complement.

With regard to our policy concerning government contracts, at least 5 per cent of the total work force of all contractors, doing work involving the use of public funds, must be of people of Indian ancestry.

I would like to very briefly point out one other rather unique and a temporary problem that is now in the province of Saskatchewan. We are now experiencing an economic slowdown that is perhaps one of the most unique in Canada's history. It is an economic slowdown caused by surplus, abundance, and lack of international markets. I am referring of course to the Saskatchewan agricultural situation. All of us have heard of the wheat crop, the difficulty in international marketing and most of us are aware that Canada has one of the biggest surpluses of wheat, or storages of wheat in the history of our country and of course when we say that this is a temporary and rather unique situation in Saskatchewan; we refer to the agricultural crises and the well known fact that many of our farmers can not sell their grain. This is a situation that causes poverty problems not only among our farmers but has serious ramifications for our whole population.

On the one hand many farmers find themselves possessing large assets but on the other hand they have little cash. This is primarily an agricultural and economic problem rather than a welfare problem. While traditional welfare programs can cope with the farmers needs on a short term basis, they are not designed to provide a permanent solution to this type of poverty problem. A rather peculiar problem associated with the farm sector relates to the fact that many of our smaller communities are finding themselves hard pressed as farms grow fewer and many farmers travel greater distances for services.

Substantially lower grain prices combined with soaring production costs have produced a situation by which vast numbers of farmers are finding themselves in an extremely precarious financial position.

Gentlemen, I think now I will leave that as my opening statement and see if there are any questions which might arise.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Minister. I believe the questioning this morning will begin with Senator Fournier.

Senator Fournier: Well, Mr. Minister, I will start off with a few questions to get the ball rolling. I would like very much to question the unemployment in your province. What is your rate of unemployment?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, to be accurate—I believe it is about 5.5 per cent at the present time.

Senator Fournier: How many people are employed in farming operations? Is this a high percentage?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No it isn't, senator, and I couldn't give you the exact figure on that, but just talking off the cuff I would think in the neighbourhood of 80,000 farmers.

Senator Fournier: 80,000 people involved?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, senator, but that is off the top of my head.

Senator Fournier: How many farmers employ other people? If I were a farmer and I needed a few hands to work with me?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, in Saskatchewan because of a technological advance in farm equipment and larger tractors and combines and so forth, the number of people employed indirectly or working directly for a farmer, as a hired man if you want to put it, now is substantially reduced and there are very few people. The majority of farmers in Saskatchewan do their own work except for perhaps the harvest situation.

Senator Fournier: Would you know your percentage of employment through industries? I understand you are not an industrial province?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, senator, and I couldn't give you the figures on that.

Senator Fournier: How is your welfare operating? Do you have many people on welfare at the moment?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Our caseload would probably number at this time 45,000 men, women and children.

Senator Fournier: 45,000?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Of that number of people what would be the percentage descended from Indian or Metis descent?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Unfortunately, senator, in Saskatchewan under the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan we do not categorize people by ethnic origin nor do we categorize them as Canadians. We have no accurate figures on that basis. However, we would estimate that a substantial portion of that figure would be native Canadians.

Senator Fournier: Is the Indian population or Indian percent growing every year?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. Northern Saskatchewan as I indicated in the brief has one of the highest birth rates in the world.

Senator Fournier: And it is growing every year?

Mr. MacDonald: And it is growing rapidly.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Did you say that your caseload was 45,000?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Now, I have figures here that show in 1959 a total of 19,700?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: This would be individual cases and I said 45,000 men, women and children.

The Chairman: Just multiply it by three and a half.

Senator Sparrow: That is the case figures but would you be suggesting a figure of about 2-1.

Mr. William K. Morrissey, Director of Program Development Division, Saskatchewan Department of Welfare: The figure you would be quoting there would include single persons and infant families. The 45,000 would include all dependent people.

Senator Fournier: You mentioned something about having an Indian and Metis Affairs Department. Would you call that Municipal Affairs or is that a special . . .

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, senator. Two years ago, the government of Saskatchewan established a new government department in the province of Saskatchewan called the Department of Indian and Metis Affairs and this is a full department that has the same equality status as all other government departments in the province.

Senator Fournier: And would you please tell us a little bit more about the credentials that you said to be required? What was it before and what is it today?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, for example, senator, we have felt that one of the major solutions to the native population in Saskatchewan becoming productive members of the community is employment and because of the fact that many of our native people in Canada, not only in Saskatchewan, do not have the same skills, education or technical knowledge that the majority of other Canadians have, that it becomes then extremely difficult for them to obtain positions.

Therefore, we have in the Government of Saskatchewan reduced the qualifications for native Canadians to obtain positions in the Government and set up a position called "A Supernumerary or Training Position" within each Government Department.

For example, in the Department of Welfare, we have 145 as of the first of January out of a total of probably a little over a thousand employees of Indian ancestry.

These people might normally require a Grade 12 and 5 years related experience and with a native Canadian we might accept a Grade 8 or Grade 10 or Grade 11 education and we would put them in a training position for a year or six months or whatever it requires until they get the background and the knowledge which would make them capable then to carry off the task. Then they are transferred into a permanent position. In all of the Government Departments—we call them Supernumeraries positions—we have made a very major effort to expand the number of native Canadians in the Public Service. We have also gone out and asked the private sector to do the same thing. We set up what we call Indian and Metis Task Force of Saskatchewan whereby it was made up of Government Officials, Department Heads, Members of the University, Managers and Presidents of companies and we went out and asked the private sector to do the same thing; reduce the job qualifications and to train native Canadians on the job.

Senator Fournier: How do you work it out with Manpower or these type of jobs if you need Grade 12 and so on?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Our Indian and Metis Department have placement officers and when jobs become available, the Indian and Metis Department then would negotiate on training, etc.

Senator Fournier: Well, I was referring to training. According to Manpower if you don't have a Grade 12, they will hardly talk to you.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That's right. We have set up a special program in co-operation with the Department of Manpower. Perhaps Mr. Morrissey could enumerate a little further.

Mr. Morrissey: The question you are coming at is how do we overcome the fact that their qualifications state a Grade 12 and the individual we want employed hasn't got that. Is this what you are getting at?

Senator Fournier: No. I would like to get to the training first.

Senator Morrissey: Well, senator, we have basically the two programs. The up-grading is done in conjunction with Manpower and up-grading done under the Vocational Rehabilitation and Disabled Persons Agreement whereby we have an accelerated program for adults. This will take them right through basic literacy up to what we call vocational Grade 11. They could complete from Grades 1 to 11 in about 3½ years of continuous training.

Senator Fournier: Well, I think I will pass for now and then I will come back to ask some further questions.

The Chairman: Yes, senator, we will come back to you. Senator Fergusson?

Senator Fergusson: What is this Vocational Grade 11?

Mr. Morrissey: Vocational Grade 11 is a program that has really been designed by our Department of Education in order to give an adult who would not normally be part of the academic stream the same source of skills to function within the economy of the labour market as an individual with the equivalent. This is a compacted or telescoped form of training.

Senator Inman: I was interested in this brief, Mr. Chairman, and it sounds as though Saskatchewan is doing a lot but however I do have some questions to ask. I understand you have a large scale New Start Program and I am interested to know how you are getting on with that and how it is working out?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: New Start is a federally sponsored program.

Senator Inman: I know that Mr. Minister, but the reason I am asking is that we have it in my province, Prince Edward Island, and I am interested to know how you are getting on with this.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: From what I can understand and from what I gather, they are making some real progress in the last year. I think they had a difficult time in the beginning of the program in establishing just exactly what its function would be and where its area of activity would concentrate. It is located in the city of Prince Albert which has a very heavy or very large native population. It is the kind of city in northern Saskatchewan which is one of the Gateways to the North and they have now gone into, for example, teacher aides, welfare worker aides and they are providing a productive training program in this regard.

Senator Inman: Do you feel that it is going to be a help for these people in the lower income brackets?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, I do, senator. At the present time I have not seen any valuation of the program to date but I do know that graduates from New Start or people who have gone through the New Start Program are now actively working in our school systems and in our hospitals and so forth and I would presume that it will have an affect and impact on low income families.

Senator Inman: In fact, it should have an impact on the economy of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Inman: On Page 11, Paragraph 17, you speak of the young Metis people lacking socializing experiences. What exactly do you mean by that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I think what we are really saying is that many of our young people come from northern communities and have not had the experience of getting into the urban situation in the southern part of Saskatchewan and in many ways La Loche is as far away from the city of Regina as Regina is from New York, and these people when they do come to the urban situation, or the urban centre really have not had any experiences with it and sometimes the very basic uses of the telephone and the very basic uses of the street cars, budgeting, housing and so forth has become very major problems for them.

I think we are concerned about the fact that a large percentage of our native population is located in the far north and very rarely do they get out of that situation. First of all that environment, the economic situation and the social situation that is involved in northern Saskatchewan.

Senator Inman: On Page 18, Paragraph 34, you say that a large percentage of the poor families do not avail themselves of these services. Can you enlarge on this and tell us why they are not using them?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Would you like to comment on this, Mr. Morrissey?

Mr. Morrissey: These particular instances which the Minister has just outlined relate to these people in the north; their inability really to understand, if you want to call it, the institutional system and specific reference is made here to the Department of Public Health.

It is found that in the northern regions of the province that we do have several people going into these regions conducting immunization programs, dental clinics and so on and it is by virtue of the very lack of understanding of the benefits derived from these programs and the people will just not use them—they are fearful of them, etc.

Senator Inman: Well, you have welfare workers up there so could they not tell these people about these services?

Mr. Morrissey: I think it is a very difficult thing to comprehend unless you see how remote some of these families are in the north. They are not living in any sense under urban conditions. They are very much spread out and as an example we have 35 workers in our Meadow Lake region and to think that they have a contact with all families is just not true.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: For example, in very many of our northern communities in Saskatchewan there is no method of transportation except by air. There are no railroads, no roads, no regular air service; it is mostly by charter air craft and the only communications with these people is really with the odd visit of the welfare worker or a social worker who has to fly in on periodic trips.

Senator Inman: These are the people you mean then?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

Mr. Morrissey: I think another factor that is very significant in this, especially in the north-west, is that many of our native people speak in dialect and it is very difficult for us to get workers sufficiently well qualified who can function in the dialect.

Senator Inman: I noticed in your brief somewhere you did speak of the people not understanding English and I wondered about that. Are there no schools or not enough of them?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, the majority of the children speak English because there are schools in all the northern communities at this time. The majority of the people that we refer to are the older people who have not had the education opportunities of the young people and with many people who go into northern Saskatchewan, it is essential that they take along interpreters in order to communicate with many of our native people.

Senator Fournier: Do they have several languages among themselves?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Fournier: One group does not understand the other group?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, I think they pretty well understand each other, but I think somebody who is skilled in semantics of language understands the dialects better of the different tribes.

Senator Inman: On Page 24, Paragraph 48, you speak of small farms. How small are these farms and what type of farming is done?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, in Saskatchewan, when we speak of a small farm we are usually referring to a half-section farm or perhaps a 3/4 section farm.

Senator Inman: And how many acres would there be?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, a section of land is 640 acres and this would be 320. The majority of these small farms are involved in mixed farming operations. They have cattle and pigs and chickens and so forth as well as grain and in certain areas or part of Saskatchewan there is quite a high percentage of small farms.

Senator Inman: And they buy these small farms . . .

The Chairman: They are not small farms like Prince Edward Island!

Senator Inman: No they are not because in Prince Edward Island we would call that a big farm.

The Chairman: I would think so.

Senator Inman: I was just wondering how these people did get along but you say they don't get along and of course it is difficult but I would say . . .

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, the straight grain farmer that is on the small farm is having a very difficult time at this stage but the mixed farmer in many ways still a very independent creature in Saskatchewan and many of them, because of their own initiatives and so forth, are doing quite well.

Senator Inman: On Page 41, at the top of the page, you mentioned "Training courses in vacancies purchased by Canada Manpower at technical and vocational centres in the province". Would you enlarge on this a bit because I didn't quite understand it.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, Manpower—and I believe I am correct in saying this, senator, but Mr. Morrissey can correct me if I am wrong,—has a budget of so many dollars which means that they can train so many people and of course we use the services and the positions are related to the budget and the number of people that they can train per year.

Senator Inman: Well, I just didn't understand this part about vacancies purchased by Canada Manpower?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, in our technical schools we might have room for 100 students for a certain course in a certain field of training and Manpower might purchase 50 of them.

Senator Quart: How do you choose these 100 people if the number is limited?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, when we talk about the number being limited, there are a wide variety of courses. There are several thousands that are trained in this way. The majority of them are selected through our vocational and rehabilitation programs and social workers would refer them or Department of Indians and Metis Affairs officers would refer them.

The Chairman: Senator Fergusson?

Senator Fergusson: I think we certainly want to thank the Minister and Mr. Morrissey for coming before us and they have brought forth a lot of information about the native people; and we have had many other presentations but I suppose it is because they have a much larger proportion in the province of Saskatchewan. One of the things that I was interested in is on Page 12 of the brief, Paragraph 20 where you say:

The Saskatchewan Government recently established an Indian-Metis Department to help people of Indian ancestry to establish themselves in to the mainstream of provincial life.

This is something that I would like you to elaborate on a little bit because when we had the Saskatchewan Metis Federation before us, we were rather given the idea that they didn't want to establish themselves in the main stream of provincial life.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am just not sure exactly what the Metis society for the Province of Saskatchewan indicated, but we are certainly . . .

Senator Fergusson: Well, we have had opposition to this from the Metis people themselves?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I think what they are really referring to, senator—I can't speak for the Metis society and Dr. Adams, and I don't want to put words in his mouth and I didn't hear what his presentation was—but I think they are very concerned with retaining their culture, retaining their background and history and giving their people a certain pride in belonging to the native Metis community and their pride in their Indian ancestry. However, when we refer to the main stream of Saskatchewan or provincial life, we mean that they should be given the same equality of opportunity to find a job and to have decent housing and provide for the other amenities of life as any other citizen. Of course, this will require, we feel, for a number of years special concessions or we call it a positive discretion on their behalf until such time as their education and training skills are acceptable or lifted to the level of the competitor from the other side of the community.

We feel, for example, that we have got into a housing program in relocation of purchasing housing for them when they come to an urban centre to find jobs and we find that there is a great deal of urbanization going on among our people of Indian ancestry that are coming now to the urban centres in large numbers, and this does require effort because they have to first of all integrate into the community, be accepted in the community, find housing in the community.

For example, our Indian and Metis Task Force got the churches involved so that when they came to the community they would be made welcome and made part of the section of the community so they could participate in community life.

Senator Fergusson: Well, did you have to persuade the churches to do this?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No. The churches certainly volunteered their services but it was an attempt of the Task Force to emphasize the need in this regard and to organize it.

Senator Fergusson: Do you help them with their attempts to bring back their culture and to learn about it? Is this part of what your department is doing?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, I think we could classify it as that. For example, we assist them in the establishment of Indian and Metis Friendship Centres in urban areas whereby members of their culture can go and meet with friends of the same background and the same culture.

We provide grants to their societies to help them organize and to help them carry on their functions and activities. We have a special advisory branch in the Department of Education which is working towards developing a school curriculum which would be particular to the north, which would be productive in expanding their own pride in their culture.

Senator Fergusson: Would you tell me if your Department of Education has done any review in text books to be sure that there isn't the old picture of Indians being savages and this type of thing?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: As I just pointed out, senator, they have just now established an Advisory Board on this and I would presume a part of their task and part of their function would be to do precisely as you have indicated.

Senator Inman: I have often wondered if there is any interest in getting the Indians themselves to help their own economy such as the Eskimos are doing with their sculpture. I was thinking of wood carving and bead work and things of this nature.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. For example, another function of the Department of Indian and Metis Affairs is to help establish native industries.

For example, we have a steel plant in the city of Regina called Ibscoe and we have now just set up a new company which is strictly of Indian and Metis to provide scrap. At the present time it is just being established through a government loan and a grant from the Indian and Metis Department and the native people in the city of Regina will organize, manage and operate that company. Initially, as I say, it will be about 40 employees and we expect it to expand substantially more.

We have also given grants in other areas to develop a native industry.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, I recall the Department of Indian Affairs in talking about the northern part of the country and we asked them what they were doing about the "Mary and Jane books" for the Indians in the farthest north. They said to us "Oh, yes, we are looking after that now". Well, that was three months ago and I find you in almost a like position today when Senator Inman talks about education and have you changed the books and you say "Yes, we are getting at that right now".

What arises in my mind, Mr. Minister, is what have you been waiting for all these years. This isn't a new problem and it is not even a new government in the Province of Saskatchewan. Why haven't you been attending to some of these things long before this? By the way, the Newfoundland government said the same thing to us when we talked to them last week—they said "Oh, yes, we are attending to this right now."

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, as a matter of fact, senator, when I said we are attending to this matter right now I think it is a continuing process. This has been going on for some period of time and there has been a northern curriculum branch for some years and they have been examining text books and the "Mary and Jane" concept several years ago. I am not suggesting that that is just now coming into effect.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Morrissey, in reply to another question, said Adult Education Courses are offered and encouraged. I think this is wonderful but are they accepted? Do the people pick them up?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, you will notice on one page of the brief there are some figures on the expansion of Adult Education Courses in Saskatchewan which might give you in a capsule form the information you need. On Page 43 the figures are given, which indicates the substantial growth and expansion of these courses. You will notice on the bottom of Page 42 it says:

Technologies—1,212 in 1969 compared to 324 in 1964; Educational upgrading 3,653 in 1969 compared to 108 in 1964; 1,944 in Trades Apprenticeship in 1969 compared to 924 in 1964; Training in Trades—Pre-Employment—1,697 in 1969 compared to 696 in 1964 and so on, so there has been a marked growth.

Now, these of course, do not all refer to people of native ancestry but there has been a substantial growth.

Senator Fergusson: Well, I was wondering about this and I was wondering if the people of native background were accepting these offers?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. I believe that approximately 3,000, if I am correct, last year took advantage of Adult Education Courses in the province of Saskatchewan which is a very substantial expansion in the last two or three years, and they are now going out to many of the native communities and up-grading them and so forth.

Mr. Morrissey: Just further to that I would say that one of the difficulties with the education of the native population is that education in any form for these people is considered to be sort of an urbanizing experience and one of the things we have discovered is to bring them to a training centre, even if it is very close to their own place of residence so that these people may stay in the course for two or three weeks and then leave.

You have to give them a period of time back in their own home so that they will come back and you will find that they will leave two or three times before they will finally stay and follow through with the course. Our activity centres at Meadow Lake and Prince Albert are designed to overcome this.

The Chairman: Are those adults that you are talking about?

Mr. Morrissey: The whole family.

The Chairman: Now, we are not talking about school age children; we are talking about adults?

Mr. Morrissey: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: If you will notice in the brief we do mention that we have established two work activity centres—one in the community of Meadow Lake which is northwestern Saskatchewan, and another in the city of Prince Albert. We are now in the process of bringing in a third this year in the city of Yorkton.

These were the first two work activity programs established under part two of the Canada Systems Plan and they are designed specifically to take people of native ancestry and not only of native ancestry but chronic welfare cases—people that have had difficulty in holding and maintaining a job and so forth—we are taking the whole family in, bringing the whole family into the community and providing housing for them; taking the women in the evening and providing training in domestic and budgeting and so forth. The man during the day, upgrading and work habits and so forth so we are finding that we consider them two very successful projects.

Senator Fergusson: There was another point that I was interested in. On Page 11, Paragraph 18, about the middle of the paragraph you say:

In addition northern Saskatchewan has one of the highest birth rates in the world.

This of course contributes to the poverty amongst those people and perhaps to some extent the solution we have been hearing so much about but has the government done anything to give birth control information out or do they leave that to private agencies?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I am not really a specialist in the field of birth control so I would hesitate to reply but I would say though that in northern Saskatchewan we don't have very much pollution. We have a very great deal of good clean Saskatchewan air and a great deal of good clean Saskatchewan water.

However, the birth rate is very high and I believe that birth control information is available through the Department of Health on request. I don't think that there is any positive program of education of this type.

Senator Pearson: Just following along on that birth control situation in northern Saskatchewan—isn't it right that the Indians that have a greater number of children receive a greater amount of relief in welfare and isn't this one of the reasons why there is such a birth rate in that country?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I wouldn't say that that was one of the reasons they have large families. I have a large family myself and it isn't because of the welfare payments!

Senator Quart: It is the cold nights!

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I think that there has been a history of large families and I think the improved health ability and health care the lack of early death at birth and so on—the improved health facilities and I think health care and treatment are responsible to a degree to it and I think it is perhaps the cold Saskatchewan winters!

Senator Pearson: In that case the Eskimos should have still more! I notice that you are not much in favour of the guaranteed annual income but on the other hand you have quite a number of social services in Saskatchewan. Do you not think that something like the gross annual income would somewhat offset all of this necessity of a variety of welfare programs?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all senator, I do not think it is synonymous to streamline welfare programs or to streamline the patchwork of the social security system in Canada with the implementation of a guaranteed income program. I certainly think that there is a need for re-assessment and a re-organization of the social security system in Canada, but this does not suggest that the guaranteed income is the only solution to the problem and the reason I say that I am opposed at this time or that I have doubts about the feasibility of the guaranteed income program is because I have a very serious reservation of the ability of the provincial tax dollar to support this program.

The Chairman: Mr. MacDonald, let us just understand each other. No one in this Committee and no one coming before this Committee has said that the maintenance income or guaranteed income in itself will solve our poverty problem. The serious discussion in this Committee has been that it was a first step towards solving the problem and what the Committee is thinking about is that the constitution provides that income comes from the federal government, the services from the provincial government and the Canada Assistance Act is a method of delivery.

Now, having that in front of you, what do you say to that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: In context also, senator, under the Canada Assistance Act the provincial government provides half of the cost.

The Chairman: Well, I started out by saying that when they conceived the constitution, income from the federal, services from provincial—you are not getting off Scot-free. You do have services to provide under the constitution, as you know. It would cost something, sure it will. It might cost you considerable, the umbrella is the Canada Assistance Act. In that context we are doing some thinking. What do you think of that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all, I think, speaking from a provincial point of view that any time the federal government agrees to pick up the cost of a program we would welcome that. I don't mean to be facetious, Senator Croll, but my reservations about the guaranteed income and I think the Province of Saskatchewan's view is that they still come from the taxpayer, regardless who it is, the provincial taxpayer or the federal taxpayer. They still have to pay and I am concerned that poverty is not related entirely to economic problems.

In fact the basic causes of poverty are anything but economic or certainly in addition to economic problems. I do agree that an economic income base is certainly a very important step in this problem but at the time my concern is that is this going to cost the Canadian taxpayer so much that perhaps other very vital priorities that would be required to eliminate poverty—I am thinking of housing, I am thinking of education, and I am thinking of upgrading and I am thinking of all the other areas and avenues—that if the costs are so high and estimates that I have seen have been rather astronomical,—and I don't know how accurate they are because I don't think anybody has done that good of research—but would this limit for a period of time the provision of other vital services and other vital priorities?

I am also concerned as I indicated about our lack of knowledge in regard to this program and I do know that there are some experimental programs going on in certain areas of the United States but to date they have been rather short-lived. I don't think we have the knowledge or the research to make this kind of a decision and I only speak on my own reservations.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, while we are at it we have had 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969 and 1970—it sounds like 4 or 5 years of experience on the guaranteed annual income supplement in this country. The old age security and it has worked well. You must agree that it has worked well—

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: It sure has, senator, but there is a basic difference. The guaranteed income supplement is related to needs.

The Chairman: Yes. So is this. Under the Canada Assistance Act the most important word is the word "need" so there really isn't any difference. However, we will get back to that. Senator Pearson?

Senator Pearson: Why did you divide the province into two as far as these two programs were concerned? Why did you divide the province into two as far as the welfare programs are concerned—the south and the north?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, in saying that we divided the province into two, I don't really think we have divided the province in two; but what we have done is because—as Senator Croll has indicated Saskatchewan Assistance Plan is a neat test program and we try to relate it to the community, to the locale of the need of the individual involved.

For example, our rental schedules are based upon the community level, certain rental levels in rural Saskatchewan are not the same as they are in the cities and so forth so we have tried to relate our program to these communities and the local needs. We haven't drawn a line.

Senator Pearson: It wasn't the necessity of being closer to the work that was available?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No. As a matter of fact, Saskatchewan is now one of the few provinces where we have uniform services and uniform implementation and the provincial government has assumed the responsibility of administering the welfare program throughout the entire province with the exception of two municipalities—the city of Prince Albert and the city of Moose Jaw.

This was implemented in 1966 and we have one comprehensive needs test program under the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan. It is administered on a provincial basis; not on a community or municipal basis in the province of Saskatchewan and I don't know of any other province that has finally succeeded in this endeavour.

Senator Carter: Do you have the same rates all through the province, in the north as well as the south?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: What we do, sir; we make provisions within the Saskatchewan Assistance Act in relation to local produce for a farmer or a fisherman or whatever might be the case. If a farmer has cattle or sheep or chickens then we take that into consideration for this food allowance, we will say. We pay all of his cost allowances, such as rent and utilities and all of those things.

Senator Carter: Do you have a cut-off rate for families above which they don't get any more assistance? Do you have a cut-off rate despite the size of the family?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: The only provision we have in the Act is that if a person is employable and they are simply in need because they lack a job, we have a provision in our Act that we will not pay in excess of 95% of their normal earning capacity over the previous 3 years of employment. In other words, this is a factor of not making our program too attractive so that people will give up employment.

Senator Carter: The reason I asked that question, Mr. Chairman, is that I noticed in the brief you take issue with the Economic Council of Canada when they assessed the rate they said:

Well, it wasn't realistic because they were the same for all areas and they didn't take into consideration that in different parts of Canada, different levels of income wouldn't be satisfactory.

I was wondering if you were operating it on that principle in your own province?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No.

Senator Pearson: Why is the north west part of the province under-developed or not developed at all?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, sir, it is a geographic distribution of resources of the wealth of Saskatchewan.

As you know the pre-Cambrian shield does not involve the north-western sector and as a result we don't have the mineral exploration and the mineral activity in the north-western part of the province. As you know the federal government has just included Meadow Lake as a designated area and the Province of Saskatchewan is now negotiating for a major pulp complex and saw-mill to be located in this area of the Province of Saskatchewan.

This expenditure will be a very fantastic amount if the negotiations are successful, and we would hope that this would revolutionize the economy of the north-western part of the province.

Senator Pearson: This is the near north-west. I am talking about the real far north-west. Is it because of the communications?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I think when we refer to the north-west, we are not referring to the far north-west.

Senator Pearson: I see.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: We are referring to the Meadow Lake region, Ile-A-La Crosse, Buffalo Narrows, La Loche and that area of the province.

Senator Pearson: I was just wondering if the connection goes towards Alberta rather than the far north-west because of communications?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, this is true in Uranium City, senator, because as you know, most of the air transportation, for example, of uranium companies is flown out of Edmonton. However, we are not speaking of that one specific instance.

Senator Pearson: This is just the one specific instance?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. In the north-western Saskatchewan it means that when you get up to Buffalo Narrows and La Loche there is only a half-inch of soil. We are trying now to create farms for the Indian population in that area and the land can only be cleared in the winter time otherwise we would lose all the soil because there is so very little soil there. There is very little farming opportunities and the timber resources are limited in size in these areas.

We now find in doing the survey that there is ample now for having this very substantial pulp complex.

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: And many of the fishing lakes are now being depleted so really there is very little economic enterprise in that area of the province.

Senator Pearson: Are there Indians and Metis living in this area to any great extent?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: This is probably one of the heaviest concentrations in the province of Indian and Metis people.

Senator Pearson: So then really what is lacking are communications with those people?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, we have now developed a road system that pretty well covers that area.

Senator Pearson: Arising from where?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: From Meadow Lake.

Senator Pearson: Meadow Lake?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, up straight forward from Meadow Lake. I don't think it is really a communications problem; it is a development problem and we are hoping now that the structure of a new pulp complex and roads to the pulp resources and so forth in this area of the province, which has long been needed, will assist.

Senator Pearson: What about schools in that area?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, all of the communities have schools and fairly good education facilities.

Senator Pearson: Any vocational training at all?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No.

Senator Pearson: Isn't this more necessary for the Indian and Metis than actual education?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: There is no question, senator, that there are very few of our native people that go through the academic stream.

Senator Pearson: Yes, they get lost about Grade 4.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Or in the elementary level. I think you have a very good point but whether or not—yet, they are so widely scattered that where you would locate a technical or vocational school is another question. There is certainly one in Prince Albert and many of them utilize that facilities.

Senator Pearson: Well, the reason I asked that is because at Fort Qu'Appelle there used to be a school there so wouldn't it be possible to build a large school for that area?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, of course as you know the Department of Indian Affairs has not very firmly established a policy of integration with the rest of the students of the province . . .

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: And they feel that this is a very important facet of their education and it has been progressing extremely well and it rather goes against the principle that you have just enunciated.

Senator Pearson: Except that I don't agree with integration at all—I think it is the wrong step altogether.

The Chairman: Senator McGrand?

Senator McGrand: My first question was the question that Senator Pearson has just asked about the north-west part of the province having quite a number of Indian and Metis in the underdeveloped portion of the province. Now, you have said that there is no mineral wealth there and that agriculture is almost impossible because you only have a half and inch of soil, is that right?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator McGrand: You have timber which you hope to harvest and build a pulp mill there. I was wondering about the supply of timber in an area that does not produce and if you have only a little bit of soil you can't grow a tree or it won't grow very high or very fat. I was just wondering about the future of a pulp industry in that area?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, they have done it and they have just completed a very extensive survey, senator, and apparently there is ample timber there for a very substantial pulp operation. However, in some of the areas and in some of the community settlements the agricultural land is limited and the forest products are.

There are more located around the lakes for fishing, and so forth according to their cultural backgrounds but there is a very substantial stand of timber in that north-western area and we are hoping that the negotiations will end up successful.

Senator McGrand: Well, if you have a surplus of population there, the only thing to do with those people is to train them and move them out or move them out and train them, isn't that right?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

Senator McGrand: Now, you mentioned in one of your paragraphs in the brief—I just can't find it at the moment—about building homes for Indians. You mentioned the fact about building low-cost housing for these people. You don't contemplate building houses for these people in these undeveloped areas where there is not sufficient resources to carry on, is that right?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: On the contrary, senator. We have just built 300 homes in the north-western part of the province and as the senator indicated when the Metis Society from the Province of Saskatchewan was down here, one of the very great difficulties is the fact that these people want to remain in their native habitats and this, of course, has been one of the major exercises of the Department of Indian and Metis Affairs—to provide employment opportunities outside of that area for people who wish to go on training opportunities.

However, it just has been a declared special area under the regional expansion of programs of the federal government. Thereby we hope in this area now with the development of pulp and a sawmill complex through the regional expansion program, that there will be a development of services in that area and this will include homes.

Senator McGrand: I have read quite a bit about this mill, this scrap-iron mill and the Indians are operating it on their own and as quite a success. Now, when the Indian Brotherhood was before us, they suggested that the federal government grant them an enormous sum of money—it sounds rather large to me—and that they would, on their own, develop industries out of their own because they said "We have the expertise". Now, this program that you have is sort of part of that program of providing the Indians with the resources and the finances in an area where there are the resources to carry on . . .

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Economically.

Senator McGrand: Economically. You go along with that, is that right?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: Well, I have been interested, Mr. Chairman and Mr. Minister, in asking about the guaranteed annual income but that has been covered to a great extent. However, you mentioned in your presentation the fact that welfare assistance is more profitable than the work.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I said one of the dangers, or one of the difficulties in north-western Saskatchewan is the limited employment opportunities for any of our native people and many of our other citizens of Saskatchewan work part-time—it is seasonable—for example, fishing and some timber operations. And that because of the limited capability of earning in that area that sometimes it seems more possible—the circumstances on occasion would make it just more profitable for them not to work.

Senator Quart: Well, it seems to me that it may in many cases but now with the minimum wage going up, how would that affect it?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, as I indicated, one of the difficulties in that area is seasonable employment.

Senator Quart: Yes, sir.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: It is not year-round employment.

Senator Quart: You also mentioned lowering the qualifications or training under Manpower. Have you found that there was any resentment from non-Indians, let us put it that way, regarding giving the advantages to the Metis and the Indians? Has there been any resentment at all?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I think the people of Saskatchewan realize that this is one of the most severe problems in Canada, and certainly in the province of Saskatchewan. They also recognize that 8% of our population is of Indian ancestry and that it is going to be necessary—our target was so low for quite awhile—it was 5% now it is 7%—and I am sure—perhaps there may be a degree but it certainly hasn't been pronounced and both the private sector as well as the public sector has co-operated extremely well in this particular task and this particular drive of ours.

Senator Quart: Have the Indians shown any pride in the productions of Louis Riel for this Canada centenary?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: You are referring to the dramatic presentation?

Senator Quart: To the dramatic presentation of Louis Riel, yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I think that one of the things—and I certainly think that you have had a presentation from the Metis Society of Saskatchewan—you will note that there is a real marked growth of pride in their own affairs, in their own background and their own culture in Saskatchewan, and I should think that the production of Louis Riel would contribute to that.

Now, I couldn't make any valued judgement as to the extent, but I do know there has been a very marked and pronounced improvement in the pride of their own background in Saskatchewan.

Senator Quart: Well, I think Louis Riel's role was played by a relative and I believe I met him.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Mr. Morrissey tells me that that is correct, senator. I wasn't aware of that.

Senator Quart: Do you know whether it was a nephew or something?

Mr. Morrissey: I am not entirely sure of the relationship but the first year of the production during the Centennial Year—was the first three weeks of the production—the part of Louis Riel was played by a Metis chap whom I believe was related.

Senator Quart: Do you know anything about the library in Prince Albert especially set up for the Indians?

Mr. Morrissey: No, I don't, senator.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Unfortunately, senator, I don't either.

The Chairman: I have a couple of questions that I would like to put to you. First, just let me say this. Dr. Adams who appeared before us was here last week and had some meetings with members of the Government and in some notes I have here the main concern of the group appeared to be discrimination against the Metis people. That is not new because they have expressed that before.

As far as the placement services are concerned, the most repeated complaint was that the Metis people are only referred to casual or seasonal work rather of a menial nature. They find that even after training they cannot get what they call decent jobs.

Now, this is dated April so it is very current and then they say as to the Canada Manpower Training Program, that they feel that the present course doesn't offer the Metis people in northern Saskatchewan what they need. They also complained that the wide-range achievement test administered isn't culture free for the Indians.

Now, I bring these to your attention without any sense of criticism but merely to say. . .

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would like to comment on that if you don't mind—senator?

The Chairman: By all means.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Number one—I think that this is in all probability a truth when Mr. Adams says that, particularly in the private sector where a certain degree of skill and training is required; but the majority of jobs that might be obtained would be in the field of casual or temporary labour. As far as the government service of the civil service program—I am speaking in relation to my own department—this is anything but accurate.

We have many of our native people now who are welfare workers and doing a job in the field. They have a regular caseload of their own and we have them in clerical staff, and as nurses aides in georatric centres and we have them in practically every institution in the province.

They receive exactly the same salary. They go on a training period for a certain amount of time and then by policy of the Saskatchewan Government and the training program is complete and a vacancy occurs in a permanent establishment, they must be transferred to that permanent establishment on that job.

In relation to the Civil Service for that Province of Saskatchewan, it is not the fact that they do receive a different kind of a job or different kind of treatment. In fact, they receive the regular jobs and are doing a very commendable job. In my own department, in the Meadow Lake region, in one community out of 22 workers, we have 12 of Indian ancestry and these were doing a regular job.

However, in the private sector, this is one of the difficulties that we do have and that is getting them to develop the skills and the technical knowledge that would give them a better calibre of job.

In relation to the Manpower Training Courses which are not necessarily suited to the needs of northern Saskatchewan, I think in all probability this is true also, senator.

We have been attempting to concentrate in the north-western part of the province and in northern Saskatchewan on basic literacy upgrading and getting them ready for Canada Manpower courses so that they would be then available perhaps to take advantage of them, and I think it might be of real service if Manpower did examine the kind and type of courses that are available in order that people who are a disadvantage people, not only of native ancestry but right across Canada, could take advantage of the Manpower programs in a more efficient manner.

The Chairman: I believe you mentioned earlier—I believe it was for the year 1969 or 1970 that you had 40,000 people on welfare?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: 45,000.

The Chairman: What was that last year, do you know?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No. I would say that there was probably a three or four thousand increase.

The Chairman: This year?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: This year because of probably the wheat situation in the province.

The Chairman: Do you have the figures for the year before?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Our caseload has been very stable for the past few years until this particular wheat situation has come along.

The Chairman: What struck me was this. In 1965-66 you spent twenty-four and a half million dollars. When the Canada Assistance Act came into force in 1966-67 you spent 20 million and in 1967-68 you were 22 million and 1968-69 you were 27 million. What I don't understand is the drop from '65-66 when there was a change in 4 million when the Canada Assistance Act came in and you had a 50 per cent ratio, your cost dropped.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Senator, are those actual costs or estimated costs?

The Chairman: Those are actual figures.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I'm afraid I can't give you the reason for that except probably the general economic picture in Saskatchewan was very bright at that time.

The Chairman: When did you last revise your rates?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: In 1956 and the implementation of the Saskatchewan Assistance Act. There has been three revisions of rates, one in 1966, one in 1967 and one in 1970 that has just been completed.

The Chairman: Our information is that you have what you call a Provincial Rate and a Northern Rate—two different rates. A different rate in what you call a Provincial Rate and another what you call a Northern Rate.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: What we do, senator, as I indicated, is we take into account the local conditions of circumstances relating to the ability to get produce, whether it be fish or something else. This is taken into consideration.

The Chairman: Yes, but your northern rate is higher than your provincial rate.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: In what regard, senator?

The Chairman: In money. For instance, the information we have is that for one adult the provincial rate has a maximum of 106. For the northern rate the maximum is 132, then for two, it is 167 plus 209. Those are the maximum rates. One in the provincial as you call them and one in the northern.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I don't think those are really accurate. I don't know where you got that information but maybe Mr. Morrissey would like to comment on that.

Mr. Morrissey: I just don't know what to comment on that.

The Chairman: We received this information from your Department in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: May I have a look at those figures, senator?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Morrissey: There is a difference in the way our rates are calculated in Northern Saskatchewan in that we take into account local produce in relation to the food allowance.

Senator Sparrow: Would the reverse be true? Could the rates be lower?

Mr. Morrissey: It could be.

Senator Sparrow: But it would not be higher?

Mr. Morrissey: No.

The Chairman: Well, as I say this is the information that we obtained from the department. I think you could check that.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I will check that, senator, when I go home.

The Chairman: Please do.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Maybe we are losing some money.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Mr. MacDonald, your budget for 1970-71 is 24 million. Is that a correct figure?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That was for the past year. The estimated budget for this year is approximately 27 million.

Senator Sparrow: What is the total provincial budget?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: 405 million.

Senator Sparrow: And of that 27 million, what do you estimate the recovery will be?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Approximately 50%.

Senator Sparrow: How much money can a welfare recipient earn per week or per month without any deductions?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I will ask Mr. Morrissey to give you this. However, what we do is this. First of all, school children can work casual times. In other words, they can work Saturdays and Thursday nights and so forth without any deductions or anything coming from their welfare allowance. Adults 50% up to a maximum and up to a percentage of the total allowance. Actually this is not deductible from their welfare allowance.

Mr. Morrissey: They have no maximum on that. Basically we allow them 50% of their earnings up to a maximum total of 25% of their total budget deficit.

The Chairman: What do you mean by total budget deficit?

Mr. Morrissey: The total amount they can live on.

The Chairman: Well, let us take an example. Let us say $200.00

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: If a family receives $200.00, 25% of the $200.00 will be $50.00 and they are allowed to keep 50% of that 25% without any deductions.

The Chairman: And that would be $25.00?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. If it was three or four hundred dollars depending on the size of the family, it would vary in ratio. We are now, as a matter of fact, interested in having a look at that.

Senator Sparrow: To increase it?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, to re-examine it.

The Chairman: Well, you can't decrease it.

Senator Sparrow: You could! In your program, at a certain time of the year, are able-bodied men and women so called cut-off arbitrary from welfare, regardless whether there is a job available or not?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, but with qualifications. For example, what we do is: we have the policy and it has been in effect in Saskatchewan for many years. The first of May, or during the month of April we write every able bodied available person in the Province of Saskatchewan on the caseload a letter stating that jobs are now available in the Province of Saskatchewan and this is the season when employment opportunities are available and we would expect and anticipate that you would now go out and try to find a job to become self-sufficient and to get off the welfare caseload and if you are unsuccessful, you may re-apply.

This means that every employable or every able-bodied man must go out and demonstrate to us that he has made a legitimate effort to find employment in the Province of Saskatchewan and he must demonstrate through Manpower or the employment office and employers and so forth and if he is unable to obtain employment and has demonstrated a legitimate effort then he is certainly eligible again to receive assistance. We consider that excellent therapy.

What it does is one year it takes an able bodied person and it says to him—re-examine your position. Are you to be a permanent case member of the welfare role or are you now going to take this position and re-examine your position and go out and make every effort to become self-sufficient?

For example, if there are no jobs available and he comes back and re-applies he demonstrates that he has made legitimate effort, the assistance is provided.

Senator Sparrow: And what time of the year does that letter go out?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: The letter is dated May the first and the cut-off is June 1st.

Senator Sparrow: Is that the only time then that so called able-bodied people are cut-off? I mean, not December 1st?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is the only time the policy is in effect.

Senator Sparrow: In all cases?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: If there is an able bodied person, an individual worker they feel the individual circumstances—that jobs are available and they refuse to take them—the individual worker may take take a conscious decision that she must force him to take that position or to take the rehabilitation process but it is not a general policy of the Department.

Senator Sparrow: How does the recipient appeal this decision?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: We have two levels of appeal in Saskatchewan. One we call the Local Appeal Board, which is set up in the region, which is a regional appeal board and there are 11 regions in the Province of Saskatchewan. If they are unsuccessful in their appeal at the local level, we then also have a Provincial Appeal Board, which is a further appeal. In the interim, during the appeal, the assistance is continued.

Senator Sparrow: How does the recipient get to the Provincial Appeal Board?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Merely by writing a letter.

Senator Sparrow: And do they attend or is this done strictly by a letter?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: They attend the Provincial Appeal Board and they can bring a lawyer, a consultant, an advisor, a minister, teacher or friend or anyone to speak on their behalf as well as themselves.

Senator Sparrow: To Regina?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: To Regina.

Senator Sparrow: And who pays the cost of that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: They do.

Senator Sparrow: The recipient does?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: You mean the welfare applicant?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I believe in most cases this is the case. What I am saying, senator, is we don't have specific provisions in the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan for this, but they could certainly apply for special needs.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Sparrow asked you if it was only in Regina and you said yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: Well, there are so many great distances in Saskatchewan but you did mention the fact that there was 11 regional appeal boards.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, we have a local appeal board.

The Chairman: This is a provincial board?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: And at the regional level—the 11 regional appeal boards—there is a voluntary group that serves on that appeal board?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. They are all independent people with the exception of the secretary, or the regional welfare director.

Senator Sparrow: Then, if they are not satisfied with that appeal they must go to Regina to appeal to the Provincial Appeal Board?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Correct.

Senator Sparrow: And they must pay their own costs?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Correct.

Senator Sparrow: How would a welfare recipient find the money to travel to Regina?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, as I said before, they could apply for special needs. I'm just saying that there is no provision in the Act for this at the present time.

The Chairman: Has anyone ever applied?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would presume so, senator.

The Chairman: Well, do you know?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, as I said earlier . . .

The Chairman: This is rather important because we have complaints here that they have to go from a welfare office to some other place in the larger cities and have to pay .25c for car fare or bus fare, each way and it adds up. 25 up, 25 down that's 50c—it adds up. But, moving on to Regina from—I don't know where—but it seems to me to be quite a colossal undertaking for a person on relief.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would suppose it is, senator.

The Chairman: Well, let us' just drop that for the present.

Senator Sparrow: Just one other question. Mr. Chairman, I just forget what I was going to ask . . .

The Chairman: Well, I will just put one in and you think about it. You said that while he is making his appeal he does not get cut-off.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

The Chairman: Fine. And now the man who receives a notice on the first of May, is told that he will be off welfare or assistance on the first of June—that is the way it is?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

The Chairman: At the first of June he is cut-off?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is right.

The Chairman: He is cut-off welfare.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

The Chairman: He has a wife and six kiddies, but that doesn't make any difference at the moment.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

The Chairman: He goes to the Manpower and he does every conceivable think that a' man can do and two weeks later he comes in and he says "I couldn't get a job". How does he live between the first of June and the 15th of June?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: He is paid his welfare allowance in advance from May 1st which covers the month of May and if he hasn't found a job by the 1st of June he comes back to see us on the first of June, senator.

The Chairman: Well, you say to him—"You are off on the first of June, go out and get a job".

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, senator. We say that you don't receive your June welfare cheque unless you come in and re-apply.

The Chairman: I see.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: He can come in and re-apply on the 20th of May or the 25th of May and say "Look, I have been unable to get a job. I have made every conceivable effort to find employment and now I have been unsuccessful and I am going to need assistance."

The Chairman: So you don't leave him out on the limb at any time?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No.

The Chairman: What do you call or what do you consider to be an effort or a reasonable effort on his part? An application to the Canada Assistance Plan or Manpower? That is the only outlets he has in general except on his own.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That's right.

The Chairman: He says "I have applied to Manpower and they couldn't find any spot for me".

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That's correct.

The Chairman: Is that the answer?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That's right. But we would expect him as well to give us a list of private people that he has endeavoured to contact and in most cases in the regional offices there would be a great deal of knowledge of employment opportunities and all we would expect him to do is to demonstrate that he has made a legitimate effort on his own behalf to do so.

I don't think there is any challenge made of what that legitimate effort is. If he is sincere, and in most cases most of our regional people know the employment opportunities and the available employment in that community—they are in contact with Canada Manpower and know if jobs are available and so forth—and we really have had very, very few—in fact I can't ever remember a complaint.

The Chairman: What has been your incidence of success?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would say that in a normal year in the Province of Saskatchewan we would probably drop 1500 cases.

The Chairman: For how long?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Probably until the fall, until the temporary or casual employment season is over.

The Chairman: Wouldn't you drop that normally because of the casual employment that you have at that time of the year in the farming district in particular?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I don't think normally we would drop that many at that specific time, senator. I think over the period of the summer months that gradually the caseloads would be reduced because people would be finding employment and searching for employment opportunities and they would gradually be reduced. We try to put a little onus on the individual.

The Chairman: Yes, we understand that.

Senator Sparrow: We found in most parts of the country the people who require assistance or who are on it, find it very difficult to find out what their rights are under the Provincial Act, such as the rates they are entitled to, and that there are in fact appeal boards that they can go to and so forth. Does your department inform the people, and if so, how?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, Senator Sparrow, I think this is a very legitimate complaint for welfare recipients across Canada including the Province of Saskatchewan. We have attempted to make a major effort to inform every welfare client about the appeal board and on every application and every refusal, whether it be for any specific item of these, we include in writing the fact that there is an appeal and the method by which the appeal is done.

We have attempted to do this through pamphlets, through education and various other devices to inform the general public about their rights as a welfare recipient. Of course, I think you can appreciate the problem of the welfare recipient in this regard.

If it is a deserted wife or a senior citizen or somebody that has been on welfare over a period of time, they are very familiar with the rules and regulations and they would make it a point to be—but if there is somebody who all of a sudden through a crisis situation comes and applies today, very often it takes them a considerable length of time before they do become familiar with their rights and their privileges and the Act itself and the regulations.

Even though you explain them and do your best, the interpretation and the understanding is often very limited so I think this is a legitimate concern across the country and I think it is a legitimate concern of every welfare recipient. I know it is of a concern to us and we are trying to make every effort to make sure that our caseload knows the circumstances involved.

We have attempted to set up a foster home group. We are encouraging our clients and our own social workers to go out and meet with the communities and so forth to expand upon this, but it is a very legitimate complaint.

Senator Sparrow: First of all I wonder if you would have any copies of your form with you today and, if not, if you could submit them to this Committee?

The Chairman: Application forms?

Senator Sparrow: Application forms and the brochures to which you refer.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I certainly will, senator. We haven't got them with us but we will make a note of it and forward them to your Clerk.

Senator Sparrow: Under the welfare, do you have much organization in the Province of Saskatchewan of associations of welfare recipients such as mother's on allowance that are organized groups?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: We are actively at this time promoting foster parent associations in all the regions of Saskatchewan. We have now one "SAP" or what we call Saskatchewan Assistance Plan or public assistance planned group in the city of Regina which has been actively working with our own social workers in the regional offices.

This is a relatively new phenomenon in Saskatchewan as it is across Canada, but I do anticipate that there will be other client associations which will develop in the future and as far as I am concerned—for example, we had a Child Welfare Client Conference last fall. We were interested in re-writing and examining the Child Welfare Legislation in the Province of Saskatchewan so we restricted it and we didn't invite any social workers except resource people and they couldn't speak. We invited foster parents, parents that had adopted children or former wards of the government and former adopted children and they made up the conference and they gave us their thoughts and views in relation to this so as I say, we would welcome this.

I am not thinking of an activist group or a demonstration or parade and I don't particularly want that but I think that client participation and the opportunity of people to feel that they are participating in the decisions that affect them and that they are having an influence on policy and that their thoughts are being made known is becoming more important.

Senator Sparrow: Well, you have answered very well and what you are saying is that you are encouraging this type of thing?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Are you prepared to encourage these organizations to the extent of helping them as an organization financially?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: We have had no request at this time, senator. I have personally considered a ramifications of this and the possibility of it but we have not had to make that decision yet and I presume that that would be a government decision that my colleagues and myself would have to make.

The Chairman: I am informed that the Metis have asked to provide 10 Metis social workers to cover their own people in Saskatchewan, and are asking you and the federal department to provide the money. They haven't any idea of how much it would cost but there was some figures given on it. They made the application for your department and the federal department to make that available.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, as a matter of fact they haven't approached me for a financial request to this date. I do wonder—that they have approached the federal government and I am hoping your good colleagues down here will pick up the whole tab.

Senator Fergusson: I think it is interesting the organizations that you have been encouraging but do you have any organizations of tenants in public housing?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No. As a matter of fact, senator, I don't believe we have to date to my knowledge. Public housing is a relatively new phenomenon in Canada and I would presume that this may well develop.

Senator Fergusson: We have come across some of it.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I haven't heard of it.

Senator Inman: I was wondering if the welfare recipients attempted to take any part in community life and did you encourage that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: What we are attempting to do now is we have planned representation on our provincial appeal boards and I have asked all the regions in Saskatchewan to put client representation on the local appeal boards. I do believe that this depends to a great degree on the clients themselves and some of them are quite active in the community.

The Chairman: The farmers participate in Saskatchewan up to the Parliament Building!

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, on occasions. On the whole I think that there is a feeling of alienation upon most welfare clients, but they don't actively participate in all community affairs. I would think this would include our own province.

Senator Fournier: Well, most of my questions have been answered and pretty well discussed about welfare but I would like to know how do you find the needs and essentials?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I beg you pardon?

Senator Fournier: How do you define the essential needs?

The Chairman: Define—is that the word you mean?

Senator Fournier: No.

The Chairman: Differentiate?

Senator Fournier: Yes.

How do you differentiate between the need and the essentials? We have found out that welfare groups are limited to the essentials and there is a big difference between the essentials and the need.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I think this an accurate interpretation of our own program. What we do of course is our allowances are related to essentials—to rent, lights, utilities, clothing, household goods, comfort allowances and so forth, and are set out in the program; but we do have a provision in the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan whereby it is possible for any client to apply for a special need related to furniture, improvement in housing, repairs and this kind of thing.

It is a rather substantial portion of our expenditures. I couldn't tell you really or evaluate just to the degree in which this satisfies the desires of the clients themselves.

Senator Fournier: Another question has to do with the north. In the far north and that rugged country which you mentioned, what would be the population of that particular area?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: My confrere tells me it is approximately 60,000.

Senator Fournier: How many would be white and how many would be of Indian descent?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: As I say, senator, I can't be accurate on that particularly in relation to our own role—

Senator Fournier: Is it mostly of Indian descent?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Quite a substantial majority would be of native population.

Senator Fournier: Well, here is something to think about. Let us take it on a 50-50 basis—say there is 30,000 Indians in that region on which we have been spending a lot of money. They have been living quite happily until we disturbed them and now we are spending a lot of money trying to educate them and once they are educated we bring them to our cities, Regina and Winnipeg, etc. where they are not wanted in the first place and where they are not required because these centres are already overpopulated.

They become public charges in many cases and cost the government and taxpayers more money until they have their first and possibly last ride in the Cadillac, and so wouldn't we be better off to leave these people alone and pay them above the poverty line and keep them the way they have been living?

Wouldn't it be better that way to keep them living where they are, where they are happy and not disturb them too much? Is the effort worthwhile trying to bring them to our level, which has been most unsuccessful so far, and I don't think in our civilization we have anything to be proud of and don't you think we should do it the other way sometimes?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all senator, I don't think we can build a wall and shut the door. I think in Canada that our people of the north Saskatchewan and native people in all parts of Canada have the right to move into the cities—

Senator Fournier: I was not thinking of building a wall, but what we are doing now is spending a lot of money to encourage them to move down.

How Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all senator, I would think that this is a wise expenditure. The increasing population, particularly in my own province—we haven't been very successful by setting off our native people in whatever you want to call them—reservations or whatever they might be—we haven't been very successful in solving the problem.

I do believe that we have to give them access to our own communities and our own way of life, if they so desire. We have to provide a training in skills, particularly for the young people. We have to provide for them a standard of living and we have to provide health privileges, education and so forth.

I do think it is worthwhile. I do think that this is the only solution to the problem and I think at the same time we have to try and retain their culture and background to their own desires, their own aspirations, but I certainly think it is worthwhile and I would hate to say that we would leave them and not include them, and discourage them. And not encourage them. I'm not sure whether or not that answers your question, Senator.

Senator Fournier: Well, it does and I was interested in your views on that but I don't agree with you when you mentioned about building a wall.

I would agree, however, that we should bring them above the poverty level so I am thinking whether it is all worthwhile.

I had the opportunity to visit some countries of Africa who were spending fortunes in trying to develop these different countries, like the Congo, etc. and since I have come back I don't know whether or not it is worth all the effort. When you read what is happening in the Congo and some of those other places I don't know whether it is worthwhile and maybe we have the same situation.

I wouldn't leave them starving by any means, but just put them above the poverty line and leave them happy.

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Fournier, you have made that very clear.

Senator Pearson: I was interested, Mr. Minister, in your statement on Page 58 of your brief when you talk about the sale of farms—the number of farms has gradually been disappearing in total number but getting larger and larger. You get down to commercial farms there and you have 2,800 sales in 1966. At the present time in what area do you find the greatest number of half-section or quarter-section farms in Saskatchewan.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would say the north-eastern part of the province.

Senator Pearson: The north-eastern?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. I am thinking in around Yorkton, Kenora, Kamsack, Wynyard, in that area of the province.

Senator Pearson: Is this where the biggest sale is going on of these small farms?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I would say this year, senator, that it is very difficult to sell any land.

Senator Pearson: At the present time?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes. I think the small farmer has remained more stable in that area of the province than in other areas. It seems to have been more diversified and the sales have been going on in other parts of the province and that section has remained more stable.

Senator Pearson: I see. I understand that a number of these small farms have been having difficulty in buying machinery now and that they are getting to the point where they are not going to be able to function on these farms.

The question is what is going to happen to them? Are you going to be able to take care of all these people who move into the cities? This is a hypothetical question but still it is a possibility if this thing continues.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all senator, we will have to look after them—number one and number two is the question today whether or not it is desirable to move the small farmer in—particularly if he is 55 or 56 or 57 and he doesn't have the academic background or the technical skills whereby he can become a citizen, so perhaps it is better off to leave him in the farming area and help him in that situation.

These are part of the problems that we are having to face in Saskatchewan in relation to the farming community. I would hope that the farming situation would improve in Saskatchewan and that we will sell some wheat and this situation will be short lived. However, we may well have to face the situation to which you have referred.

Senator Pearson: In your potash plants that have been scattered around in Saskatchewan, a great number of the people employed at those potash plants have been local farmers. Has a shutting down or the slowing down of the potash industry, thrown a monkey-wrench into the business there and caused unemployment?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, as you know senator, we have put potash exporting on a pre-rationing basis—

Senator Pearson: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: —Which has really reduced very substantially the employment locations of the slow-down in the potash development. I think you are probably aware that there is an expansion each year on potash sales and marketing. The last 18 months there has been 7 new mines on screen in Saskatchewan—6 or 7 mines but the majority of the new mines have come on-screen and all of a sudden from 3 mines we have jumped to 10 and the production has out-stripped the market.

We do anticipate that this is going to be short lived—certainly we hope so—but pre-rationing has certainly removed a great deal of the serious employment implications for the mines and now most of them are producing and they are all working—not to full capacity—but they are working on a year-round operation and employment lay-offs have been very limited.

Senator Pearson: Does that hold true also with the pulp mill in north Prince Albert way?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: The pulp mill in Prince Albert is going like a house on fire, senator. It is setting new records in production and selling every ounce of pulp that has been produced.

The Chairman: Do you know to whom you are reclaiming that!

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is why I said it, senator.

Senator Pearson: The last question I would like to ask you is, how is my good friend Father Murray?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Very good, senator.

Senator McGrand: I was going to ask the question that Senator Pearson asked, but he got ahead of me. Saskatchewan is not a heavily industrialized province and heavy industry is usually located in urban areas. Can this industrialization in the larger centres meet the needs of expanding population, both from the number of your native people that you are training and take into the city to look for jobs, and from the farmers in the low income areas that are moving in at the present time? Is the capacity for industrialization in Saskatchewan capable of meeting those two forces coming at them?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I certainly hope so. I think the future of Saskatchewan is a very closely related to resource development and there has been a very major expansion in resource development in the past few years; as you know in the potash industry, in the pulp industry. Simpson's timber mill in Hudson's Bay has just expanded and McMillan Bloedel is going in there and in the north—the timber now for the first time in many, many years in Saskatchewan is being harvested.

We have a great deal of mineral explorations in the north. We do have some very serious problems in relation to industrialization and I refer to freight rates, large distances from markets and this type of thing, but we do hope that Saskatchewan has the opportunity.

Senator McGrand: On Page 61 of your brief you say that in comparing the income of a farmer with a salaried worker, the farmer starts out with a 30 p. cent advantage because of a lower cost of living.

Now, where you have low-income farmers with that 30 p. cent advantage in the cost of living as compared with a salaried worker which do you consider the best way to fight low-income or poverty, which ever you want to call it? Would it be number one—by giving these people on the low income farm, which is usually I should say a mixed farming proposition,—a cash subsidy—I won't say annual income but I will say cash subsidy to say there or to pay him to be trained or retrained or move him to a large centre? Which is the better way or can you use both?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I would hope, senator, that we would use both. It would depend upon the age and the background of this particular individual and his capacity for re-training and re-learning and also it would depend upon his capacity for rehabilitation in the farm life itself and so forth. I would hope and suggest that we would use both in the future.

I would hate to say that we would be restricted to one and say to every farmer you know "You have to go" or that we would have to say the reverse.

Senator McGrand: Personally I don't see any objection for giving a person a subsidy to stay on the land if it solves the problem. People object to subsidies but we all get by on subsidies, don't we? The re-training of a person is a subsidy, and under unemployment insurance a man is getting a subsidy; workmen's compensation is a form of subsidy and even people on holidays with pay is even a subsidy and member of Parliament and some of the rest get increases in salary—not because they do more work—it is a subsidy to meet the cost of living, isn't it? I don't see this objection to subsidies.

The Chairman: What's this strange thing, talking about members of Parliament getting more pay? That was in 1963 and there is no use dreaming!

Senator McGrand: However, Mr. Chairman, I don't object to this word "subsidy".

Senator Inman: On Page 33 you speak of unwed mothers. I was connected with a hospital for three of four years and from practical experience I know that sometimes it is a very sad thing to see these girls bitterly weeping about having to give up their babies but you say you are exploring supportive services. I'm interested to know what you are thinking of doing?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I would tell you, senator, that we are just beginning this program, as of the 1st of April. I have come to the conclusion and I think my department has come to the conclusion and I think the advice we have received from clients or unwed mothers has indicated that there is a changing attitude toward the unwed mothers in Canada and in society as a whole.

Where it used to be the policy of most areas to actively encourage women to give up their children—for example, we have just put in a new policy in Saskatchewan of accepting applications for single parent adoption. If we are going to accept applications for single parent adoptions then certainly unwed mothers should have the same right and privileges to keep their children.

Now, if this is going to be possible then certainly supportive services are going to have to be developed to make this possible. We have just gone into a new program on Day Care Centres which is one supportive service we hope will assist in this regard.

We have given one region of our province the responsibility of developing an experimental program in this regard and to report back to us in a few months so that we can consider it on a provincial basis. As I say, we are just beginning to get into this and it is a philosophical change in our regard, acceptance on our part and we are interested in expanding and exploring supportive services for unwed mothers so that they may keep their children.

Senator Inman: Are you going to try to get employment for these unwed mothers so they can try and keep their babies?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Absolutely, and training if necessary.

Senator Inman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Assist them in getting training and providing home-maker services and things of this regard. I think these are the kind of things that we are exploring.

Senator Inman: I think that you should be congratulated on that.

Senator Sparrow: Under your Assistance Plan to make monthly payments at the beginning of the month, that is one cheque to which you were referring?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: The majority of people in Canada are paid either weekly, bi-weekly or half-monthly. I appreciate that there would be greater administrative costs by issuing more than one cheque per month but isn't expecting a great deal of people who are on welfare with that limited income to have to budget for the full month?

I ask this question in relation to a possibility of provincial transfer. It is on a wider scale and is it really fair to issue one cheque per month and can they really budget that way?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I think you have brought up a very legitimate point but we perhaps shouldn't expect these people to be able to budget this way, but I think as you have also indicated it is strictly an administrative technique at this time because cheques are knocked out by a computer and so forth. Perhaps it is too much to expect but at this time our payroll is one cheque per month.

Senator Sparrow: Has there been any consideration to change that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: At this time, no, we have not considered that.

Senator Sparrow: Would it be advantageous if it were changed?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I think you have a good suggestion and in all probability it would be. I am not sure what the complications administratively would be. I think it might be possible.

Senator Sparrow: The rates were increased, and I will just use this figure of food raise for adults from $28.50 to $32.50. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Exactly when was that?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I believe it was effective in the fiscal year and the first payment would be the first of May.

Senator Sparrow: This is rather a difficult question but do you feel that the rates are adequate that are being paid in the Province of Saskatchewan? Now, I ask this in relation to the incentive aspect because there must be an aspect between pays and incentive, but at this point in Saskatchewan are those rates high enough?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Senator, I would think that they were adequate to meet the basic needs. For example, I think two people now receive $60.00 a month for food. Now, I know that they are certainly not going to live in luxury. They are not going to be able to eat steaks and things like that but I do believe they can get by and the very great difficulty is, of course, the correction of incentive and what about the fellow that has the large family and is independant and works hard and doesn't make more?

I do believe that we have attempted to examine our schedules periodically and they are now very comparable with our sister provinces of Manitoba and Alberta so I would say they were adequate. However, they are certainly not generous.

Senator Sparrow: Are there people in the Province of Saskatchewan then who should be receiving some assistance who aren't receiving any? Are there some groups of people that are not covered under your system?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I think certainly people on the minimum wage, if they have large families. There are people that are in need. I do believe that certain groups of the workers—and I can't give you a salary schedule and I can't think of anybody except perhaps in this area that would depend upon the size of the family and so forth—it is always very easy to say a person can get more on welfare than they could on something else but you have to pick out the exceptions—the person with the large family because welfare allowances are directly related to the size of the family but it also works in the reverse.

Senator Sparrow: If a man who is on the minimum wage who is working now for $1.25 per hour—you won't supplement his income if he has been on that minimum wage for 3 years?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: No, we wouldn't.

Senator Sparrow: But if he is part-time or seasonal then you would, is that correct?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Absolutely.

Senator Sparrow: So that that person, who has five or six children and his income level is $1.25 per hour, would be better off on welfare?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Not of necessity, Senator Sparrow. It would depend upon where he lives, the amount of rent that he has to pay, the amount of utilities and what his specific allowance is. Not only that but we have a policy as Mr. Morrissey has indicated, which I think is one which is acceptable that we would only pay 95% of what his normal earning capacity would be.

Senator Sparrow: Even though his earning capacity was in fact $1.25 an hour?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

Senator Sparrow: Now, in other words you feel that the assistance is in fact adequate and would you be suggesting that no other transfer type of payments are in fact required for the Province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, I just want to make sure I don't turn down any money! Certainly I think that there is an area whereby people who are getting established on low income, that incentives to a certain degree—in other words I am thinking of the welfare client, the person on a low income with supportive services for a period of time—would be advantageous and I would think that these should be explored.

I am thinking of an unwed mother who is going out and getting a job and this unwed mother getting a job, for the first period of time until she receives adequate training—and they only earn $200.00 a month and yet she is working full time for $150.00 or whatever it may be.—I think supportive services should be paid to her until such time as she can get on her feet and get established. They should be in the relation of support rather than permanent.

Senator Sparrow: Your budget for welfare is about 7% of your provincial budget but it would appear that a number of the provinces—although we haven't seen them all—are higher than that. Nova Scotia for example is around 11% of the budget and so on. Is that because they have more people at that lower income level or do you have facts and figures from all of the provinces in this regard?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Traditionally Saskatchewan has had a very low unemployment rate, as you are aware, they have probably over the past 5 years on an average, they have probably had the lowest unemployment rate in Canada, and this is with the exception of this year, even though at this year I think our unemployment level is not higher than other provinces in Canada.

I think this is related to it as well. There are areas of chronic unemployment in parts of Saskatchewan but not in comparison to other parts of Canada. Our employment picture seems to be more steady, more stable.

Mr. Morrissey: The figures you referred to there, senator, represent our Saskatchewan Assistance Plan Budget but the budget for the Department of Welfare is about 10%.

Senator Sparrow: Where do you get the total of 10?

M. Morrissey: The total for our Department is about 10%. The total budget for the Department of Welfare is about 10%.

Senator Sparrow: This would include jails?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Jails and correctional services, child welfare services and other programs.

Senator Sparrow: 7 p. cent though on the public assistance plan as such?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Under the jail system in Saskatchewan, you developed a new program you have a name for it which just escapes me—

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: There are many names for it!

Senator Sparrow: I don't mean the difference between good and bad and so on but perhaps you might just explain it for a moment and how it is working?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, senator, I would be glad to. It is called a Family Therapy Unit. What we have conceived in our correctional program is that one of the major difficulties is that when any individual is sentenced to a correctional centre in the province of Saskatchewan there is a family crisis that is generated and if there is a hope to rehabilitate him and get him back into community, it is also very closely related to the family situation.

We have built a duplex on the grounds of the Regina Correctional Centre, which is a very modern home, whereby it permits a wife and the children to come and visit the inmate and the inmate then is permitted to go and visit and live with his wife and his children or his mother and father—not necessarily the husband and wife but it could also be a young inmate of 15, 16, 17 or 18 who has a family breakdown with his parents or parental authority and his parents are permitted to come and visit with him.

While that visitation is taking place, we have a family therapist, who is a social worker, who then counsels and works with the inmate and his wife and his children or the inmate and his parents in trying to bring them together and make it possible for them to return to a normal family situation when he leaves the correctional centre.

We have considered this a very successful program. It has been in operation now for about 18 months and we are now in the process of building a new unit on the Prince Albert grounds, where the majority of our married inmates are located, because the Regina Correctional Centre is mostly young inmates and not too many of them are married and we decided to start it off on a limited basis. We are encouraged with the program and we are moving it now to the other correctional centre in Prince Albert and we think we have had some very positive results although it may be a little early.

Senator Sparrow: Have you established a direct relationship between poverty and crime as such in the Province of Saskatchewan?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I certainly believe that there is a degree of relationship between the crime and poverty. However, I haven't seen any authoritative sources for it or specific surveys done in this province.

Senator Fergusson: I also had in mind when you speak about the unwed mothers—I was interested in a plan to provide supportive services for them and I think we would be very interested to find out how this works out and what you really develop in your plan.

I also would like to have you elaborate a little bit more on the Day Care Centres. This idea of having day care services included as a basic need under the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan—I don't know if we have come across this in other provinces but I think it is wonderful that the Canada Assistance Plan is wide enough to take care of this; and I am so glad that you have accepted and made use of it because I came across a group of women who had an organization and who were taking summer training and they were receiving some assistance under the plan and it made all the difference to the world, because otherwise they could never have possibly attended these courses without having these day care services paid for because they just couldn't leave their children.

You say you are giving some help to these day care centres so perhaps you know—or perhaps you don't—that a great number of the briefs that came to the Status of Women Commission stressed the need for day care services. You say you are providing starter grants and operational grants.

Are these to private enterprises who are setting up day care centres or are you setting up day care centres of your own?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: These are to private and volunteer agencies who have established day care centres. At this time this program is also a brand new program announced on April 1st and we are now drawing up regulations and hope to make it operational on the 1st of July. Number one—our intention is to provide a starter group which would encourage the initiation of day care centres.

Senator Fergusson: They are large enough to be an encouragement, are they?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I don't know exactly what it is but I think it is up to a maximum of $40.00 per child and this is for equipment, for chalk, for blackboard and pictures and so forth but it is not intended to build a capital facility in any way, shape or form.

The operational grants are in two areas. First of all, we are providing a universal grant to every day care centre for every child space. In other words a grant of $5.00 a month—it isn't intended to be a major grant—which will then permit us to set up a standard, inspection and supervision of it then in order for them to qualify and to license them.

Then we are setting up a third aspect of the operation that we then subsidize according to needs. Any family whether they are on welfare or not, up to 50% of the total cost.

In other words if any family receives $5,000.00 or $6,000.00 then it is a little too much for them to qualify for public assistance and yet they don't earn enough money for them to use the day care centres, then we would through a simple disposable income chart, which we are giving to the day care centres to administer, they could get them up to 50% of the cost of the day care centres.

This is the way we are operating it. At the present time we have approximately 400 spaces,—day care space in the province. We would hope that in the first year that there would be an expansion of about 75% of those spaces.

Senator Fergusson: I am certainly very interested in the plan. I have just one other question, Mr. Chairman . . .

The Chairman: Please go ahead.

Senator Fergusson: Well, I realize it is getting late.

The Chairman: Please continue.

Senator Fergusson: I like very much your statement on Page 54 and 55 in Paragraph 91. You say:

No one approach is the long sought after panacea.

You also say:

"Many things make up part of the answer" and then you go on to say:

"A very big part of the answer is changing public attitudes. Unless the public is behind the attack on poverty, the attack will fail.

Do you think we are making any advance in changing public attitudes and are you making any effort particularly in your province to changing the public attitudes?

I would like to say that even now after all the publicity that has been given to poverty and that sort of thing many times when I am talking to my friends and even those who are not perhaps, they ask me "Well, what are you working on now?" and I say "Well, I am working on the Poverty Committee" and they say "Well, you are crazy". The public attitude towards it is "Well, you can't do anything about it so why waste your time?" What can we do to change the attitude of the public? We are all convinced that it must be done but—

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, we also make the statement in the brief that we are making war on the poor, not on poverty. This has probably been one of the biggest things that has concerned us most in my tenure as Minister of Welfare in Saskatchewan and that is: that the great vast majority of people have a very negative attitude about welfare.

They feel that everybody on welfare is a bum, a tramp and so forth and we have tried to provide statistics to show that only a very small portion of the public systems recipients are potentially employable and that the vast majority are the aged, the senior citizens, the sick, the disabled, physical and handicapped people.

Unless we can get people to recognize that—Certainly abuses exist in welfare on occasion. We know that very often there is a lack of incentives and ambition on the part of certain recipients across the country but the social workers are doing every possible thing in their power to see that this is reduced to a minimum, to encourage these people to get back to work, under very adverse conditions because of the public attitude.

I really don't know what the answer is myself. It has given me a concern and I would hope that the committees of this kind and the publicity that they receive would make contributions in this regard.

The Chairman: I have a question just to follow along with what you have said. In speaking to Senator Sparrow you spoke about the adequacy of the allowance in the Province of Saskatchewan. In part of the brief you took note of what the Economic Council has laid down as a poverty line.

A man working in Saskatchewan, earning the minimum wage, would earn approximately $50.00 a week—that is at a $1.25 an hour. Take necessary deductions if you like and what do you have left? Do you say that he can get along on what is left and is that adequate?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: I said it was adequate for the bare necessities, senator, I am not saying that this is generally so and that it shouldn't be re-accessed and periodically improved as often as possible.

The Chairman: When you say that this is adequate for the bare necessities—What the Economic Council is saying is that which was normal in the environment in which they live and under the circumstances in which they live.

Do you realize that in your province at the present time, two adults have a maximum of $167.00 which is approximately $1,000.00 less per year than the Economic Council recommends. How, in the light of that, Mr. Minister, can you talk about adequacy?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I don't want adequacy misinterpreted. First of all, senator, I think that public housing, good housing and things of that kind are very important and when you start evaluating a standard of living and living allowances and we turn around and look at public housing in the aspects of this kind which are going to improve the lot, they are also pretty important.

The Chairman: They took all of that into consideration when they made up their budgets. They took all of that into consideration and then fixed a sum which, as I say, is far above what you say is adequate.

Let's put another question. Under the Canada Assistance Act the real basis is need. That is the word they used that is the word they put in it.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes.

The Chairman: There is a uniform tax rate across the country. Everybody pays the same tax rate federally. How do we justify a uniform tax rate without at the same time justifying a uniform need rate? The basic needs we were talking about—food, clothing and shelter—are not luxuries. We pay the same taxes so how do we justify the lack of uniformity in the basic needs of these people?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: First of all, senator, aren't all taxes in proportion to the income that you are earning?

The Chairman: Yes, but we pay the same uniform rate. You pay the same thing on your income as I do. We are both in need; you are in need and I am in need—I live in Ontario and you live in Saskatchewan. We have the same size family and same circumstances. Why do I receive more in Ontario than you do in Saskatchewan since it is a basic need for food, clothing and shelter. I am not talking about TVs or anything else but just the basic need?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, first of all senator, I don't know if they would receive more in Ontario than they would in Saskatchewan, so I will be on the defensive there. You may be correct but first of all even in the Province of Saskatchewan, if you live in a rural community, the federal allowance and the rental schedule, of $40.00 may be adequate to accommodate 4 or 5 children whereas in the City of Regina that same living quarters might be $125.00 or $150.00 a month.

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about food and clothing. Forget shelter for a moment. I know shelter is an item and varies somewhat but let us take food and clothing. Actually by the last reports, your food and clothing costs less than it does in any other place in Canada on the last months' system by D.B.S.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: You mean the total?

The Chairman: There was a smaller increase in the consumer index in Saskatchewan—

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: That is correct.

The Chairman: It has smaller than any other place for the the last index. Let us assume that that is correct. That it costs less in Saskatchewan—infinitesimally less for the same. Surely you are not suggesting that you are paying out the same allowance that Ontario is or Alberta is for people in similar circumstances? All I want to know is how do we justify it?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, senator, I would think that first of all I agree that it would be nice to have a national standard but I think that any national standard must also be related to a region. I think the shelter costs for example, in Prince Edward Island or the food costs in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are not the same in Saskatchewan and it is nice to see that Saskatchewan had the lowest increase in the price of living because, under normal circumstances, that has not been true.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, the price of food across this country is infinitesimally different from one place to another. We have been around and you can tell that that isn't important at all. You talk about regional differences. Let us just examine it for a moment. There is no variation in our family allowances. There is no variation in our old age security. There is no variation in our unemployment insurance. Medicare comes to us the same in all provinces and hospitalization comes the same to us in all provinces on a uniform basis. Aren't those important services?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: First of all senator, I will agree with you that food costs should be uniform, that clothing should be uniform but that doesn't necessarily mean that the total allowance should be uniform. Utilities, water, sewage costs, shelter costs—there are many things that make up an allowance over and above food.

The Chairman: But really the difference in hy-drates and the difference in gas rates across the country aren't that great. The only difference that we can see is the difference in shelter. There is a difference in shelter depending upon whether or not you are in a tight boning area or a loose area and the kind of shelter you have. These are the things that we have to grapple with and we say on a uniform basis. It points out to you the uniformity that we now have and it works well too.

All of these things are working well and yet when we come to the matter of food and clothing, such basic essentials of all life, we start varying it depending on where you live in the country. We get the same medical attention, the same hospitalization, the same in everything else with the exception of food and clothing. Isn't there something wrong in our thinking?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Yes, senator, I would say that you have a very legitimate argument for uniformity, very legitimate.

The Chairman: And you see, Mr. Minister, we have to get it across to people like you. If we can't get it across to you we can't get it across to the public at all. That is our problem. If there are holes in the argument punch them—but what we are trying to do is come to some kind of solution to break the back of poverty.

Senator Fournier: Well, I think I will follow this line of questioning. I come from the Maritimes and we say very often that we give everything to the west and very little to the Maritime provinces. As far as I can see we have two problems; one for the Minister and one for me.

I see your farming problem but in trying to make a long story short I think you did very well for a number of years until the farm machinery and different equipment came in and you called it progress and so on and so on in the early '30's; and really it has just been in the last 20 years when there has been a real boom in machinery.

When the western farmers went after new equipment and so on they called it progress and they were saving money and making money and a lot of people did and now we find that it has been a failure period. Most of your farms are mortgaged. You can't make both ends meet. You have unemployment and you have a huge pile of surplus wheat. Now, that is your problem and I will tie my problem to that.

In the Maritimes when my wife wanted to buy a bag of flour, we still have to pay $15.00. That is my problem.

Senator Quart: Mr. Minister, do you envisage any trouble—well, one shouldn't use the word trouble, but maybe demands for increased assistance due to the fact that the welfare cheques have been mailed out in order to cope with the impending—which we hope won't be—postal strike.

I understand, and I read a little article in the paper, that certain loan companies were discounting these or whatever they do at a certain percentage. Well, if they get this cash, do you think you will have some trouble?

The Chairman: The best thing you can do is take the cheque to the grocer who might say "Alright, I will take that in advance" but—I saw that newspaper story too, it is laughable.

Senator Quart: It may be, but I was wondering if the Minister had any opinion?

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Senator, you are referring to the fact that whether or not we are going to have difficulty in seeing that welfare clients get their cheques on time.

The Chairman: No. they have them on time.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Oh, in advance.

Senator Quart: Yes.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, pardon me senator, I misunderstood your question. The welfare client in Saskatchewan will not get their cheques in advance. We are using a package system and bus transportation and delivery service within the rural communities. The post offices are open and I think we are going to have to set up special offices in the city. We are going to have some problems, there is no question about that.

The Chairman: We are going to try to see that you don't. May I say on behalf of the Committee and tell you, Mr. Minister, that this is a thoughtful and constructive brief. You have done a great deal of work to put that together. You have made it interesting reading and it contains a great deal of information. In that way we think we have both profited. Thank you very much for coming down.

Hon. Mr. MacDonald: Well, Mr. Chairman, Senator Croll and ladies and gentlemen, may I express my appreciation to you for first of all the courtesy that you have accorded me and Mr. Morrissey and also not only the courtesy but a stimulating discussion that followed throughout the morning and I appreciated it and consider it our pleasure. Thank you very much for having us.

The Chairman: Thank you.

The committee adjourned.

CHAPTER 1

INTRODUCTION

"Have you guessed the riddle yet? " the Hatter said.

"No, I give it up," Alice replied. "what's the answer? "

"I haven't the slightest idea," said the Hatter.

"Nor I," said the March Hare.

Lewis Carroll, Alice in Wonderland.

1. By introducing the brief with the above excerpt from Lewis Carroll's delightful children's story, the Government of Saskatchewan wishes to underscore the fact that the subject of poverty is an exceedingly complex one, both in definition and in solution. Notwithstanding the complexity of the subject we have tried to explore it as fully as possible in the short time available for the preparation of this brief. In doing so we have discussed definitions of poverty, who the poor are, why people are poor and what can be done to alleviate and prevent poverty. Where appropriate, references have been made to poverty in Saskatchewan.

2. It is not the intention of this brief to present the committee with large amounts of statistical information. Statistics will only be utilized insofar as is necessary to give more clarity to a point, to assist in the understanding of situations, and to complement certain concepts. We are sure that any such detailed statistical information on Saskatchewan which the Committee may require, could be readily supplied by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics.

3. No matter how we define poverty, or what statistical manipulations we employ to demonstrate how much poverty we have, or whether poverty is increasing or decreasing, the fact still remains that we do indeed have substantial poverty. This is as true in Saskatchewan as it is in all provinces and territories of Canada. It is only right that we must all be concerned regarding the proportion of poverty that does exist in Canada. However, at the same time we feel it would be well to keep in mind that in comparison with the rest of the world we are not so badly off. Indeed, the proportion of poor people in Canada is far smaller than it is in 90 per cent of the countries of the world.¹ This statement is made with full realization of the complexity of semantics surrounding poverty definitions. The point to be emphasized is that, while we are becoming increasingly wrapped up in our own serious poverty problems, we must also be aware of the spectre of hunger and starvation which daily greets millions of fellow world citizens whose poverty problems are beyond anything within our borders. We do not wish to convey the impression that we are trying to de-emphasize the serious poverty situation that exists in all parts of Canada. But, we do wish to keep our poverty problems in perspective in relation to the rest of the world.

4. In focusing on Canadian poverty, a cursory examination reveals a fairly substantial body of literature on the subject. However, closer examination reveals very little understanding of the poverty situation in Canada, and even less agreement on just what poverty is. The existing anti-poverty policies and programs seem to consist largely of unrelated efforts initiated by all government levels, as well as by a great many private organizations. All sectors of the economy appear to acknowledge their concern with poverty, both as a social and economic problem, but there is rampant confusion on how to go about attacking this elusive and fluid problem. A major part of the confusion is a direct result of the lack of any hard and fast definition of the term poverty.

CHAPTER 2

DEFINITION OF POVERTY

5. In discussing definitions of poverty it is first necessary to distinguish between absolute poverty and relative poverty. People who do not have sufficient food, shelter and clothing to maintain their lives, may be considered to be living in a condition of absolute poverty. The end result of absolute poverty is death. Any society concerned with preventing poverty must of course first set itself the goal of eliminating absolute poverty. To all intents and purposes we believe it can be said that Canadian society has been successful in dealing with this kind of poverty. This has been accomplished through a variety with this kind of poverty. This has been accomplished through a variety of social and economic programs, some national and some more local in scope. It is true that even with such a vast array of social programs which do exist in Canada, there are still some individuals, that for various reasons, slip between these program supports, and experience absolute or near absolute poverty. The first priority then, is to seal such gaps. Everyone agrees that this must be done. The problem arises over the differences of opinion on just how this sealing can most effectively be accomplished.

6. Once having solved absolute poverty (which is the foremost problem as far as world poverty is concerned), we then enter into the very tricky realm of relative poverty. The Canadian Welfare Council's brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty defines poverty as a "relative deprivation of major physical and social needs and of the person's sense of perception of deprivation."¹ In presenting this relative definition the Council took the position that poverty cannot be defined as absolute. We would like to challenge this position and state that poverty can indeed be defined as absolute in the context of our previous discussion. The point is, all poverty cannot be defined as an absolute. In this respect the Canadian Welfare Council is quite right. However, we take the position that a great deal of Canadian poverty would be absolute poverty were it not for the supportive underpinnings that have been developed. Remove those underpinnings and there would be starvation. Therefore, let us not sell ourselves short. Our society has been fairly successful in alleviating absolute poverty. Of course, in an affluent society such as ours this is not considered to be enough and we then enter the confusing, controversial, and emotionally steaming jungle of relative poverty. One look at the Canadian Welfare Council's definition and it will become very obvious why relative poverty can be described in such terms. From the standpoint of such a definition it would appear that the only way we could ever wipe out poverty would be for everyone to have exactly the same things as everyone else. There will always be someone whose sense of perception tells him that he is deprived! Let us not make the mistake of the Marxian idealists and lower everyone to the lowest common denominator. There are very few Canadians who would be satisfied with such a grey world. We would only be replacing one form of poverty with another. Under such conditions the poverty of the spirit would render our society impotent.

7. In some ways spiritual poverty already seems to have established a firm beach-head in our society. Perhaps one of our main concerns should be with the poverty of the state of mind. In essence, many people no longer have the old anchors that gave their lives stability, frequently under the most trying of conditions. Perhaps part of society's present preoccupation with poverty is not so much a preoccupation with poverty as such, but rather, a preoccupation with trying to find a meaning to life. Even with a complete solution to absolute poverty, and a great deal of equalizing of circumstances of those in relative poverty, we would still be light years away from being a society of satisfied individuals. Unless people can relate their particular circumstances to a deeper, non-material aspect of their lives, then the spiritually poor will abound, and social problems will continue to increase.

8. The preceeding is in no way an attempt to make light of Canada's current poverty problems. It is our belief that they are serious problems and that effective solutions must be found. Our concern is related to the fact that many people and groups feel that the solving of poverty in a material way will result in a problemless society. We wish to emphasize that this is just not true. At the same time we feel that the alleviation and prevention of material poverty would be a giant stride forward in the development of a more civilized world.

9. Valentine describes the primary meaning of poverty as "a condition of being in want of something that is needed, desired, or generally recognized as having value."¹ The key word to note here is value. One's perception of his relative state of poverty depends on where he places his values in relation to the availability of all types of resources. Being poor in Canada means something different from being poor in India; being poor in Canada in the 1970's means something different from being poor in Canada in the 1930's. What are some of the differences? Among the more obvious differences are the total amount of consumable resources available in relation to the total population, how resources are distributed within the social structure, cultural standards of value and adequacy, the number of people whose disposable income falls below such standards and what differences exist between the higher and lower socioeconomic strata in relation to the availability of community resources.

10. It now becomes obvious that poverty must be perceived as a continuum, and not as some point on an absolute scale. Poverty can only be defined in relation to quantitative and qualitative criteria which vary as societies and cultures change. Poverty expands and contracts depending on what criteria are used to define it.

11. What most people are talking about, then, is a relative deprivation, and the essence of relative deprivation is inequality. Not only is it economic inequality, but also, and perhaps more important, it is an inequality of occupations, of education, of housing and the lack of participation in shaping the policies and programs that affect people's every day lives.

12. The Economic Council of Canada defines poverty as "an insufficient access to certain goods, services, and conditions of life which are available to everyone else and have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living."² The Economic Council then set to work and compiled poverty lines as a statistical embodiment of the definition. This certainly was an admirable and no doubt difficult undertaking. While the poverty lines established by the Council would certainly seem to be reasonable, we must take the position that such income levels can only be described as artificial in that they do not set minimum budget requirements for commodities and services for particular family units living in particular areas. We are fully cognizant of the many problems associated with establishing such a budget approach on a regional basis. However, if we are ever going to find the solution to poverty in Canada we must somehow establish regional definitions that take into account certain goods and services and conditions of life which have come to be accepted as basic to a decent, minimum standard of living. Such a "social accounting" system would necessarily have to have built in methods for regular re-evaluation of what goods and services are basic, together with regular re-evaluations of the purchasing power of the dollar.

CHAPTER 3

WHO ARE THE POOR

13. It is obvious that the poor can only be identified in relation to the particular definition of poverty that is being used. As previously indicated, except for very extreme conditions, one cannot define poverty in absolute terms. Therefore, any discussion of who the poor are must necessarily be primarily a discussion of the relatively poor.

14. Who are the relatively poor in Saskatchewan? Again, this depends on what kind of poverty you are talking about, economic, social, political or spiritual. For the purpose of this section, most of the discussion will centre on the economic poor and, by implication, the social and political poor. As a point of clarification, when we speak of the politically poor we are referring to those people who have little or no sense of participation in the decision making processes which affect their lives. It is impossible to make an estimate of the spiritually poor, except to say spiritual poverty respects no socio-economic level.

15. Unfortunately the only truly authoritative source on the extent of poverty and the characteristics of the non-farm poor in Saskatchewan is the last census to record any income data, i.e. that of 1961. Perhaps the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has more up to date figures which would be more revealing. On the basis of the 1961 census, and defining the poor as those with less than 30 percent of their total money income available for other purchases after paying for food, clothing and shelter, Saskatchewan is among the six Canadian provinces with the greatest proportion of non-farm poor in the population.

16. In a survey carried out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics the minimum income for family size was established as:

(a) one person	below	$1,500 a year
(b) two persons	below	$2,500 a year
(c) three persons	below	$3,000 a year
(d) four persons	below	$3,500 a year
(e) five persons	below	$4,000 a year ¹

On the basis of these statistics, the prairie region had a ratio of over 27 percent of poor families to total families (includes individuals) Saskatchewan's ratio of poor to total families (includes individuals) came to about one-third of the total families in the province and was about double the ratio for Ontario, and almost ten percent more than the national ratio.² Undoubtedly if Saskatchewan was divided into northern and southern geographic sections, the north would have a much higher proportion of poor. It must be pointed out that the effective date for these two figures was June 1961, a particularly poor year for Saskatchewan agriculture. No doubt as a result many farm incomes were reduced below the poverty line, thus resulting in an increased proportion of poor for Saskatchewan. In the intervening years since 1961 Saskatchewan experienced rapid economic growth and undoubtedly the proportion of poor people diminished considerably. However, given the current depressed nature of our economy, it can be speculated that present economic conditions are having effects similar to those of 1961.

17. Like other areas of Canada, we have some people who are more prone to poverty than others. The poorly educated and the untrained, the aged, one parent families and those living in uneconomic areas are more prone to poverty. We also have a number of particular factors that intensify the problems of people living in the aforementioned situations. Perhaps the largest of these complicating factors is the ethno-cultural one as it pertains to our Indian/Metis people. Insufficient education or training and lack of skills is still widespread among people of Indian ancestry. At any one time there is a disproportionately high incidence of people of Indian ancestry who are the responsibility of the Department of Welfare. Social workers who are employed in our welfare programs are constantly telling us that many of the young native people they come into contact with suffer from inadequate socializing experiences which would militate against making them competitive members of society.

18. The weight of the poverty problem among people of Indian ancestry in Saskatchewan is more severe than in other provinces. We have the highest per capita percentage (8 percent) of people of Indian ancestry in Canada. We have only 4.5 percent of the Canadian population but 15 percent of its registered Indians and 27 percent of its dependent, poor reserve Indians. In addition, northern Saskatchewan has one of the highest birth rates in the world. The fact that most of our Indian/Metis population live in the economically underdeveloped North-western regions further compounds the poverty problem. Another complicating factor is that a high proportion of our northern Indian/Metis people speak little or no English, being able to communicate only in dialect.

19. The high dependency rates of our native people results in a very heavy financial burden for the province, with about five million dollars being spent annually on Welfare services. Unless this dependency trend can be reversed, future financial and social problems can be expected to escalate at astonishing speed. It has been estimated that at some not too distant date that the Indian/Metis population will grow at a fantastic rate, not unlike the time path of the compound interest curve. It is apparent, then, that we are on the brink of an extreme crisis in relation to our native people.

20. To prevent such a crisis officials and departments of the provincial government are working in close cooperation with each other and with the federal government to provide and finance numerous programs to aid the provinces' Indian and Metis people. The Saskatchewan Government recently established an Indian/Metis Department to help people of Indian ancestry to establish themselves into the mainstream of provincial life.

21. In addition, the provincial cabinet has established a Task Force on Indian Opportunity, composed of business and industrial leaders, local and provincial government officials, Indian and Metis organizations, clergy, educators, and labour leaders. Sub-committees of the task force are working to find ways to improve the level and quality of education, to increase employment in both the private and public sectors, to upgrade housing facilities, and to find out what skills are available among native people, training requirements, and jobs desired.

22. Now that Saskatchewan is in the process of urbanization and technological change, it is apparent that it is becoming increasingly difficult for the small farmer to make a decent living. On the other hand, many of those who do decide to leave their small uneconomic farms and try their hand at non-agricultural jobs, frequently find themselves seriously disadvantaged by reasons of their age, lack of education or training, and social and psychological handicaps in making an effective transition from rural to urban life. In a 1966 study of a grouping of off-the-farm migrants in Saskatoon it was noted that 66 percent of the male migrants had grade 8 education or less, compared to 36 percent of Saskatoon's total males. In addition, the migrants were consistently older than the male labour force in Saskatoon, many had physical disabilities, and about one-third had no non-agricultural work experience.¹ Many of the migrants suffered psychological problems due to the difficulties of leaving the farm coupled with associated problems such as low incomes, sporadic employment and poor housing. Of this sample 57 percent had incomes of $5,000 a year or less. In our opinion the steady trend toward larger farm units, coupled with the severe marketing crisis which Saskatchewan is currently experiencing, cannot help but increase this kind of poverty.

23. The heavy dependence on agriculture as the mainstay of Saskatchewan's economy has both direct and indirect implications for our current poverty problems. The fact that there is a very restricted grain market causes detrimental economic reverberations throughout our entire economy. Very simply, if a farmer cannot sell his grain, his income goes down. When his income goes down he doesn't buy goods and services and cannot meet his credit obligations. When he doesn't buy goods and services or meet his credit obligations, the income of our merchants and industries are adversely affected. Less capital for our merchants and industries means less employment for our work force. Others are forced onto our social assistance roles. The farmer may find himself in the rather peculiar position of possessing a great deal of valuable grain, equipment, and land, but not having enough cash to maintain his family. In short, our current agriculture situation places many sections of our economy in an economic straitjacket. On the one hand, many farmers find themselves in the position of possessing large assets but, on the other hand, they have little cash. This is primarily an agriculture and economic problem, rather than a welfare problem. While traditional welfare programs can cope with the farmer's needs on a short term basis, they are not designed to provide a permanent solution to this type of poverty problem. Welfare is not intended to be an agricultural support program.

24. The continuing trend toward larger farm units means fewer farms. Fewer farms means that many farmers travel greater distances for goods and services. This in turn causes extremely serious problems for many of our smaller communities which have relied on the farmer for their economic existence. As a consequence, low income, low wage employment, and unemployment grows.

25. Figures provided by our Department of Agriculture indicate that during the past 15-20 years agriculture cash receipts have dropped from approximately 23-24 percent to 20-21 percent of the Canadian total. This year, due to poor markets for wheat, Saskatchewan's share will drop to about 18 percent. Although 1969 was a record year for wheat production in Saskatchewan, exports in the 1968/69 crop year were only 306 million bushels, the lowest since 1956/60. This left Saskatchewan farmers with over 700 million bushels of wheat on hand, worth over a billion dollars. As a result of declining sales, farm cash income dropped to $725 million, a 20 percent decrease from 1968. Realized net farm income was 37 percent lower in 1969 than in 1968. The following figures further indicate the seriousness of the farmers' plight:

Year	Price per Bushel of Wheat	Average Cost of Production*
1949.....	1.61	204.1
1961.....	1.75	282.1
1970.....	1.40	410.7

*Based on a 1939 index = 100

The combination of lower grain prices and increased marketing costs places a large number of our farmers in extremely precarious financial positions.

26. The marketing of cereal grains is the most perplexing problem facing Saskatchewan farmers today. We are concerned that our share of the world marketings of our wheat and coarse grains has been declining. The reduction of our wheat acreage will not solve this problem. More aggressive selling is needed if Saskatchewan farmers are to not only maintain, but—most important—increase their share of the world's markets.

27. At his point we would like to refer to Appendix B, P. 57. Submission of the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture. It is felt that this is a particularly good analysis of poverty in Saskatchewan in relation to the farm sector, and we are therefore including it in its entirety.

28. There seems to be a growing conception that most of Canada's poor exist in some isolated "culture of poverty". We feel that this term is extremely misleading in that it implies that the poor have certain ethnic, racial and social traits and ascribe to a particular value system entirely separate from society as a whole. This type of thinking leads to the conclusion that the poor have a particular and distinct way of life and are without middle class values and aspirations. This is not borne out by investigations. On the contrary just the opposite seems to be true, i.e. the cultural values of the poor may be similar to middle class cultural values, merely modified in practice due to situational stress.¹ In fact, many of the modifications could be viewed as positive adaptations for the survival of human dignity.

29. The chief point here is that poverty is part of our culture. It cannot be discussed in isolation by conveniently stating it is some sort of culture or subculture wholly distinct from the broader culture. Even though some groups of poor apparently have certain characteristics that one could label as quite distinctive and somewhat like a subculture, the fact of the matter is that these groups are still embedded within the total society. Any society has certain differences as well as certain commonalities. Our socio-cultural system has its own coherence to which subsocieties and subcultures contribute even with their distinctiveness. We are all "brothers under the skin". When we talk about the cultures or subcultures of poverty, we are speaking about integral parts of our own culture.

¹ Valentine, Charles A., Culture and Poverty, University of Chicago Press, Chicago, 1969, P. 17.

30. It has been estimated that of Canada's total poor, about one-quarter are over sixty-five years of age. It is clear that these people cannot be helped by committees, new approaches, or discussions. Another group, estimated at fifteen percent of the total, comprise a group who cannot earn enough money to lift themselves above the poverty level. This category would include many deserted mothers with children, the disabled and the sick. Such programs as retraining, work programs, etc. would be of little help for many of these people. The remaining sixty percent of poor could be broken into two groups. One group are those working full-time all year round but who are poor simply because their wages are low. These are the working poor. The other group is working part time when they should be working full time.

31. The poor of Saskatchewan, are the same people, with some local modification, as those who are vulnerable to poverty in all areas of Canada—those on fixed incomes (including the aged) the small farmer, the one parent (usually female) with children, the poorly educated and untrained, those suffering from illness or incapacity, the under-employed and the unemployed. In most instances, we are told they are people who have very little feeling of a sense of participation in the decision making processes of society and generally feel alienated from the wider society. In other words they are a part, but apart!

CHAPTER 4

WHY ARE PEOPLE POOR

32. Why are these people poor? This is a very complex question that cannot be answered with any one sweeping generalization. Like all other questions concerning human life the answer to poverty is comprised of many permutations and combinations, involving numerous factors in the psychological, social, economic, political and cultural spheres.

33. Many causative factors are involved in poverty and usually no one factor, is the whole cause. Lack of intellect, heredity, lack of motivation, inadequate services, not taking advantage of established services, poor housing, cultural deprivation—any number of lacks can feed into a general poverty syndrome. A serious lack identified by our Department of Health pertains to insufficient programs for young children. The lack of programs for pre-school children, particularly the "poor" can have profound limiting effects on a child's development—physical, emotional, social and intellectual. Our Department of Education has also pointed out that opportunities for learning are hindered when children come to school hungry, when home conditions are such that children lack privacy that ensures adequate rest, when the home does not provide an environment for learning (books, newspapers, magazines, a place to study), and when the parents themselves lack an appreciation of the role of the home in motivating learning.

34. The Department of Health has also pointed out that a larger percentage of poor families do not avail themselves of the services of Well Baby Clinics. Therefore, at least in this instance, we seem to have a problem of the poor not making use of available resources. There are also indications this is happening in relation to other community services.

35. The question, "why do we have poor people in our type of social system?" is somewhat easier to answer than the general question, why are people poor? The free-enterprise market-economy nature of our society quite logically results in certain people achieving more through their particular work and efforts than other people do. This is part of the very essence of our freedom. A pyramidal structure quickly develops with individuals "earning their positions" at various levels by virtue of numerous factors that are valued in present day terms, including education, earning power, employment position, nature of employment, sex, school ties, and yes, even family name. The particular nature of such factors or combinations of factors determines which status level of the pyramid a person occupies at any one time.

36. Some people, for various reasons, are unsuited to effectively participate in a competitive way in our society and therefore, become alienated from the main stream of life. Because they are unable to compete on society's terms, society leaves them behind and, in effect, lets them sink to the bottom of the pyramid. Unless there is a radical change of attitude toward people who are living at the lower levels of the pyramid, the debilitating effects of poverty will always be with us. In some cases there is also a need for a change in attitudes by the people who live at the lower pyramidal levels. These aspects will be commented on at greater length in the next section.

37. How have we treated the poor? Unfortunately we have tended to make war on the poor instead of making war on poverty. We have assumed that if we improved the character and motivation of the poor, we would no longer have poverty. How naive such thinking is, especially when viewed against the pyramidal structure of our society. Even if society succeeded in improving the motivation and character of all the poor and made every last one of them productive members of society (an even more naive thought), many of them would still have to live at the bottom of the status pyramid and they would still be looked on as the poor.

38. Our policies and programs have failed to eliminate poverty. In making observations and comments on this fact, many present day pundits are quick to condemn the various public welfare systems for this. While there is no doubt some truth in this we believe public welfare and social workers have been used as convenient scapegoats by society for far too long, and this type of thinking must stop. Problems of poverty are too widespread to think that public welfare alone will provide the answers. Answers lie in all facets of society including the home, education, health, trade and commerce, industry, and in public attitudes. If people really want to know why public welfare has failed, it is because community people have not been willing to let it succeed. Perhaps the greatest indictment that could be directed towards public welfare personnel is that they have continued to serve at the command of society, fighting a battle without adequate personnel or tools, and without a clear statement of objectives.¹

39. In the broader context, policies and programs to eliminate poverty have failed partly because they were designed and launched without knowledge or understanding of what poor people really want, and what they are willing to do to get what they want.

40. Valentine feels that this lack of success is analogous to the earlier failure of colonial regimes whose knowledge of their subjects was both superficial and distorted.² It is equally apparent that any uniform anti-poverty policies, without respect for regional differences and different characteristics and needs of different people cannot succeed. An historical parallel presented by Valentine drives this point home: imperial confusion and failure stemming from stereotyped thinking about primitives and savages.³ It is clear from the mass of material written about the poor in recent years by people purporting to be experts, that we really know very little about the poor. Before we even hope to solve the "problems" of poverty we are going to have to get to know poor people. More will be said about this in the next section of the brief.

41. It is true that as a society becomes more affluent and more and more goods are available for consumption, people's aspirations rise and many people who at one time would not have considered themselves to be bad off, suddenly want goods they cannot afford to buy, and begin thinking that they are poor. The mass media and the fantastic communication systems that now exist have been a major factor in this development. In other words many people who now consider themselves poor and who are considered to be poor, would at one time have been fairly content with their situation in life. Therefore, in a sense, our complex of communication systems coupled with the production of numerous gadgetry must be considered as factors in causing, at least, relative poverty.

²Valentine, op. cit., p. 149.

³Valentine, ibid. p. 150.

42. Unfortunately many people on low incomes frequently succumb to the pressures of contemporary advertising, obtain numerous purchases on credit (usually expensive credit) and soon find themselves with monthly financial obligations in excess of their monthly incomes. Because of the impossible pressures of these financial burdens numerous other social problems may develop—delinquency, separation, divorce (which usually is too expensive), child beating, poor diets, lack of sufficient clothing, the necessity to obtain poorer housing, the loss of employment, general apathy, hostility and extreme spiritual poverty. What may have started out as a low income family adequately getting by and making ends meet has degenerated, through unwise credit buying, into a multi-problem family whose style of living has become so debilitated that only great effort may save it and its future generations from years of public dependency.

43. Both the inability to handle money and irresponsibility in the granting of credit can cause serious problems in relation to poverty. We wish to emphasize that we are not attacking the credit system as such, for credit buying can be very positive if handled wisely and granted responsibly.

44. A recent report by the Credit Union Research Council takes the position that poverty develops as a result of certain social and physical environmental characteristics and value systems, rather than as specific conditions or situations such as ethnic or racial background.¹ In other words there are certain universal variables of poverty which cut across ethnic, racial or other social characteristics. This would support the view that poverty, in part at least, is caused by certain types of social organization. What are these universal variables? One would be education. Education (including all types of training) is necessary for effective employment in our society. Without adequate education, no matter what ethnic background or other factors exist, one cannot make a decent living in our market economy. People with marginal skills are the first to be laid off during periods of restricted unemployment; they are the first to be laid off as industry becomes more technical. Such people will have little accumulated capital and will therefore be prone to spending periods of time on the public assistance roles. Other factors such as racial or ethnic background, prejudice and apathy, may certainly be important in determining the level of educational attainment or making it more difficult for a person to get a job, but they do not by themselves cause poverty. In spite of such drawbacks, a higher educational attainment will result in an individual being more competitive in holding a job.

45. Another universal variable in poverty, is age. As indicated in the Economic Council of Canada's Fifth Annual Review, both the young and the old are prone to receive low incomes.² Many of our aged are tied to small fixed incomes and are completely at the mercy of rising costs. In addition, it is a well established fact that as people get older, it is more difficult for them to secure steady employment if they lose their jobs.

46. A third universal variable is sex. It has been extensively documented that the income of women on the average is well below that of men. Widows and deserted wives are particularly vulnerable to receiving low incomes. Again, this is tied into level of educational attainment. Most women just are not trained for the higher paid occupations in our society.

47. A final universal variable is that of place of residence. The economic base of certain sections of the country is such that it cannot support high wages. Groups of provinces, individual provinces, or particular areas of provinces may be involved. For example, in Saskatchewan much of our north country does not have a sufficiently developed economic base for the creation of large numbers of steady jobs. In addition, most Indian reserves are not economically viable.

48. Farm poverty may be viewed as a special sub-type of the universal variable of place of residence as indicated previously. Saskatchewan has many small uneconomic farms that seem to be doing nothing more than perpetuating poverty. In addition, when the owner of a small farm sells and moves into town he is faced with a myriad of new problems which very often lead him once again into a poverty situation.

49. We have touched on a number of variables in discussing the reasons why people are poor. Notwithstanding the importance of these factors, probably the largest single reason why we do have poverty is simply because we do not as yet have an agreed upon definition of poverty. Without an agreed upon definition of poverty we will never be able to formulate effective plans to combat poverty.

CHAPTER 5

STRATEGIES FOR MAKING WAR ON POVERTY

A. Public Attitudes

50. Notwithstanding the uncertainties surrounding the definition of poverty, who the poor are, and why they are poor, it is quite apparent that there is a substantial number of people in Canada who, for one reason or another, do not have sufficient resources to adequately meet their basic needs and, therefore, need some measure of help from the community. Some of the help needed is in the form of direct income maintenance but, perhaps what is needed most is a change in public attitude by the "non-poor" toward the "poor".

51. We feel that we cannot emphasize this point enough. Public attitudes must change in order that less fortunate people are given a chance. Government programs can only do so much. The good will and the resources of the public must be tapped, or the degrading and debilitating nature of poverty will never be solved. The public must want to help. All too often, attitudes of the community seem to push people further into poverty. Many people still view poverty as something immoral, something that the individual could avoid if he would only so choose.

52. If this country is to survive as an affluent, democratic society, our people must commit themselves to helping one another, as well as helping themselves, for it is a process of self-treatment. Admittedly the techniques and tactics of treatment will be complex, but we will never find them until we have a national commitment.

53. In our fight against poverty we must content ourselves with interim successes, just as we must accept inevitable intervening failures. We must not be demoralized nor rendered impotent by such failures. We must not use them as excuses for re-trenchment but, rather, we must look on them as inevitable landmarks along the uncertain path toward the achievement of our goal.

54. We must stop using the poor and programs associated with the poor as scapegoats for our own imperfections. This means that not only must we alter our attitudes toward poverty, but we must also change our attitudes toward ourselves. For, very often it is likely, because we have negative feelings about ourselves, that we direct them onto other less fortunate individuals and groups. In many cases it is a simple matter of people not accepting their own imperfections. If we could accept our own imperfections we would not need to have readily available scapegoats such as the poor. We could then direct positive energies toward our fellow countrymen rather than, as so often is the case, negative energies. In this way a positive national commitment could be made to wage war on poverty.

55. If and when such a national commitment is made, then it will be much easier to arrive at acceptable definitions of poverty, to arrive at systems of social accounting, to define objectives, to proceed in matters of broad social planning, and to formulate and carry out necessary programs.

56. As indicated previously, it really is a fallacy to think that we will ever be able to eliminate relative poverty. No matter how sophisticated, efficient, generous, humane and all embracing our poverty programs become, there will always be a substantial number of people who, by their own standards, will consider themselves to be poor. The pursuit of more material goods can frequently be an abortive attempt to pursue the attainment of a more meaningful life or a more peaceful state of mind. There certainly is ample evidence today that many of Canada's citizens hope to make their lives complete through the addition of more and more material possessions. Our advertising media has a certain responsibility to bear for this as do a number of our politicians, who on occasion have been known to make unrealistic promises, thus, feeding into the general syndrome of unrealistic aspirations. Along with fighting poverty, we must develop a deeper, more intangible, inner meaning to our lives to complement the material acquisitiveness side of our natures.

B. Basic Needs for a Decent Minimum Standard of Living

57. We now come to the question what goods, services, and conditions of life are basic to ensure a decent, minimum standard of living? Everyone of course, needs sufficient food, clothing, shelter and medical care to keep body and soul together. What does everyone need and have a right to over and above this to ensure a decent minimum standard of living? We feel that such a question must be answered on almost an individual basis and it must relate to the ability of society to meet certain standards.

58. The discussion of relative needs inevitably leads to a discussion of rights and values. Human needs and rights change as the circumstances and values of society change. Values may be looked on as expressions of ideal situations. Rights may be viewed as particular points on a value continuum. For example, we may value education very highly, but the right to a certain amount of education will be dictated by what the country can afford. However, this does not preclude us from working towards increasing the rights of the population in so far as attaining higher levels of education are concerned. Therefore, in discussing rights we must always have certain ideals or ultimate values in mind. We believe such basic values to be the following:

- (1) Society should try to create conditions which permit the greatest self-fulfilment for individuals.
- (2) Society should provide opportunities for mutual assistance and common action through which individuals may achieve their own self-fulfilment and the common welfare of all.
- (3) Society should promote co-ordination between individuals, groups, institutions, and organizations to ensure maximum co-operation and collaboration for individual self-fulfilment and the common welfare.
- (4) Societal institutions and organizations should be adapted to changing conditions through the democratic process in which both rights and obligations of the individuals in society are respected and recognized.

59. We believe that the vast majority of Canadians would subscribe to these values. They have been elucidated in various ways on a number of different occasions by a number of different organizations and individuals. One of the fullest discussions has been developed by the National Association for Social Workers of the United States.¹

C. Some Saskatchewan Programs

60. While we do not wish to discuss all Saskatchewan programs in detail we would like to refer to the following as having special relevance in relation to strategies for making war on poverty.

(1) The Saskatchewan Assistance Plan

The Saskatchewan Assistance Plan is founded on a belief in the worth and dignity of the individual and the recognition that:

- members of society are dependent upon one another and,
- the welfare of each individual is essential to the total welfare of the community.

The purpose of the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan is to make provisions for adequate financial assistance to persons in need, and to do so in such a way that their capacity for self-respect and self-dependence is maintained or strengthened. While our sense of purpose is high we also are excruciatingly aware that the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan is not perfect, but it is an honest attempt to alleviate the debilitating effects of poverty. We do not wish to present the details of the Saskatchewan Assistance Plan but we do believe that there are certain unique features that we would like to touch on in our presentation.

(a) Aid to the Employed Poor:

The Saskatchewan Assistance Plan does provide for aid to the full time employed person on an extreme hardship basis, extreme hardship being when every available resource is considered to be totally inadequate in relation to budgetary requirements. The granting of this type of aid is up to the discretion of the unit administrator. If the application is refused the client is advised of his right to have his application reviewed by the unit appeal committee, and if he is dissatisfied with the decision of this body he has the right to a final review of his application by the Provincial Welfare Board. We feel that even with a guaranteed annual income there would still be a substantial number of the working poor who would qualify for this type of assistance based on their disposable income.

(b) Appeal Procedures:

When an applicant for assistance feels his treatment has been unfair he has the right to appeal through the unit administrator to a committee established by the unit. If the applicant is not satisfied with the decision of the unit committee he then has the right to appeal to the Welfare Board. This is a Board established under the Department of Welfare Act and is comprised of the Deputy Minister of Welfare and additional members not exceeding twelve. At the present time the Board is made up of the Deputy Minister of Welfare as chairman, a housewife, a solicitor, a representative of the Saskatchewan Urban Municipalities Association, a representative of the Saskatchewan Association of Rural Municipalities, an Executive Director of a private agency, and a client representative. The presence of a client representative has been very helpful in the overall deliberations of the Board. In fact we feel so positive in this regard that it is intended that such representation be extended to our local unit appeal committees.

(c) Public Assistance - Simplified Procedure of Determining Eligibility:

In recognition of the fact that many social assistance clients do not require intensive casework services our Department of Welfare is continuing to explore more streamlined means of determining eligibility for assistance. The ultimate aim is to develop a simplified method whereby the applicant can verify on his own behalf that he meets the condition of eligibility and continuing eligibility. Counselling and rehabilitation would be available for those who could benefit from such services, but there is very little point in pushing such services onto clients who obviously are not able to benefit from them. Recipients would only be required to report by mail changes in circumstances as they arise. In addition, they would be required to mail in a declaration of circumstances on a once a year basis.

(2) Work Activity Centres

As outlined in the Canada Assistance Plan the goal of a Work Activity Project is to rehabilitate the socially, culturally, and environmentally handicapped persons who are unable to obtain or hold employment and cannot utilize the traditional upgrading and vocational training courses. Two such projects have been established in Saskatchewan and another is being planned for this summer. We are very enthusiastic concerning these projects as they can help to rehabilitate the whole family. Not only are husbands upgraded sufficiently to allow them to take advantage of traditional upgrading and vocational training, but wives are taught homemaking skills, and children are introduced to various socializing experiences. Whole families are put in better positions to become competitive and socially well adjusted members of society.

(3) Day Care Centres

In recognition of the important role that Day Care Centres can play in alleviating and preventing poverty our government has recently announced grants for the establishment and operation of such resources. Basically, we will be providing starter grants and operational grants. Day Care services are also now included as an item of basic need for Saskatchewan Assistance Plan clients. We feel this will allow many clients who were unable to previously, to now be able to take advantage of rehabilitation and employment opportunities. Such centres can also provide important socializing experiences for young children. We feel this is another significant step in the fight against poverty.

(4) Unwed Mothers

For some time now our Department of Welfare has felt that much heartache and hardship could be prevented if many unwed mothers kept their children. Many things now militate against this, not the least of which are negative public attitudes and lack of financial resources. We are now exploring what supportive services could assist unwed mothers who are interested in keeping their children.

(5) Housing Programs for Low Income Families

The importance of adequate housing as a factor in alleviating poverty cannot be over-emphasized. In Saskatchewan, housing for low-income families falls into the following three categories:

(a) Low-rental housing (subsidized)

As at March 31, 1970, there were 1142 housing units under occupancy and 140 under construction in the Province of Saskatchewan, for the accommodation of low income families. These units ranged from the one-bedroom type, for the accommodation of senior citizens, to five-bedroom units for families with children. They were made possible under the provisions of the Saskatchewan

Housing and Urban Renewal Act and Section 35A of the National Housing Act. They were financed on a ratio of 75%/20%/5% as between Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Province of Saskatchewan and the municipalities, respectively. Subsidies are shared in the same ratio. Subsidies for the 1969-70 fiscal year averaged out at approximately $45.00 per month per unit. The rentals paid by these families relate to their income, according to a rental scale established for this program.

(b) Low-rental Housing for Families of Indian Ancestry

As a direct result of the recommendations made by the provincially created Task Force on Indian opportunity, the Province in co-operation with Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has acquired 98 existing houses in eight urban centres, for the accommodation of families of Indian ancestry who are placed in employment, or in educational upgrading or training programs by the provincial Indian and Metis Department. These units are financed on a 75%/25% basis by C.M.H.C. and the provincial government, respectively. Subsidies are shared in the same ratio. Families are required to pay a rent geared to their income, as provided in the rental scale for subsidized housing. The object of purchasing existing housing in established residential areas, is to permit maximum integration and adjustment in the community. Follow-up services, including counselling, are provided by the Indian and Metis Department to assist native people to adjust in an urban environment. The purchase of housing units is a continuing program as placements in employment are made in viable communities.

(c) Housing in Northern Saskatchewan

An experimental housing program for families of native ancestry was introduced in a specific area of Northern Saskatchewan in 1965 with the federal and provincial governments sharing finances on a 75%/25% basis. It provides for the construction of modest homes, which are sold to native families, subject to a 5% equity or down payment requirement. In certain instances, the Province has made a grant to assist the purchaser with his equity requirement. The purchaser is required to make payments on the home over a period of 20 years, in monthly instalments geared to his income. Subsidies are shared by the federal and provincial governments on a 75%/25% basis respectively, represented by the difference between the collections realized and the amount required to meet amortization payments on the partnership investment, property taxes, and fire insurance.

Approximately 300 homes have been made possible under this program in various far north communities.

(6) Adult Education Courses – Indian/Metis Education

(a) Adult Education Courses

Our Department of Education continues to place particular emphasis on conducting adult education courses. During the academic year 1967-68, many such courses were conducted. Particular emphasis was placed on the preparation and selection of materials suitable for adults at a basic literacy level. (Grades I to IV). These materials are now used in upgrading for Indian and Metis groups. In addition to the technical and vocational education offered by the Saskatchewan Technical Institute, Moose Jaw and the Saskatchewan Institute of Applied Arts and Sciences, Saskatoon, vocational training centres at Weyburn and Prince Albert accommodate Canada Manpower trainees in trades (pre-employment), educational upgrading, farm mechanics short courses, and commercial and domestic services.

Occupational training for adults has been carried out under the auspices of the Technical-Vocational Education Branch through vacancies purchased by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. Manpower training programs during the 1967-68 school year included Educational Upgrading, (Junior and Senior Courses), Commercial Preparatory, Commercial Basic, Construction, Domestic and Related Occupations, Basic Surveying, Heavy Duty Equipment Operator, and Dining Room Attendant. These courses were offered at eleven centres in the province in 1967-68.

In co-operation with the offices of the Provincial Co-ordinator for Rehabilitation, the Department of Education provides training programs for the rehabilitation of disabled persons who cannot qualify under Canada Manpower Programs.

During 1967-68 the Department of Education, by agreement under the Federal Agriculture Rehabilitation and Development Act, provided Junior and Senior Upgrading Instruction for persons of Indians ancestry in basic literacy. Under the agreement the federal authority paid the entire cost of allowances for registered Indians and shared the cost of Metis allowances. Training-in-Industry and Business Management Training programs are also provided under the auspices of the Technical-Vocational Branch. The Training-in-Industry is designed to provide an opportunity for workers to upgrade their skills and knowledge and for organizations to operate more efficiently. Employers may conduct the training or have their employees attend approved courses provided by other firms or training agencies. The Supervisor of Industrial Training assists in the development of training programs and monitors the operation of the program to ensure satisfactory instructional standards. Financial assistance to cover a part of the cost of this program is provided by the Canada Department of Manpower and Immigration. During 1967-68, fifty-two courses were offered in twenty-nine areas of instruction. The Business Management Training courses are conducted by sponsors throughout the province such as Chambers of Commerce, Boards of Trade, the Saskatchewan Construction Industry, the Federal Department of Manpower and private industries. New courses such as Computers and the Manager, Business Development, and Basic Financial Controls were introduced in 1967-68.

Our Department of Education is continually assessing educational methods and techniques in an effort to rationalize the educational system in relation to the needs of our students and the community at large.

(b) Indian and Metis Education

During the past five years our government has given top priority to the education of children and adults of Indian ancestry. One important aspect of this development has been the integration of white and Indian children in schools throughout the province. In the northern areas, for example, considerable progress was made in 1968 toward the integration of schools involving the transfer of many pupils to the jurisdiction of the Northern School Board. The provincial school curriculum has always been used in the northern Saskatchewan schools. Since the late 1950's there has been greater emphasis on English and Social Studies. The most notable area of improvement has been in the language arts that is, in various aspects of English, reading and oral language. In recent years I.T.A. (Initial Teaching Alphabet) has been used in Northern Area Schools and Indian Affairs Schools. This program emphasizes phonetics in reading and writing. In the field of social studies, attempts have been made to develop a course more suitable to the environment of Indian and Northern students. This modified program was authorized for use in grades I to VI. More recently a program using a multi-cultural approach has been developed. During the past six years an Advisory Committee on the Education of Children of Indian Ancestry, set up by the Department of Education, has been active in working with teachers, administrators and the Northern School Board to improve education of Indian and Metis children.

The Department of Education, through the Applied Arts and Sciences Branch, continues to expand and develop adult educational opportunities for people of Indian ancestry. Federal, provincial and private agencies work in close co-operation in developing and implementing the various cost-sharing programs that finance this area of education.

Indian and Metis, through their organizations, have become more and more involved in planning the types of programs made available and where they will be operative. Approximately 3,000 attended government sponsored programs in the 1969-70 year.

Special programs in Basic Literacy and occupational preparation, as well as grade twelve equivalency, are being prepared for future implementation. Technological, trade and occupational training, together with basic education (or educational up-grading) programs are available to Indians and Metis at the province's two Technical Institutes and its three Vocational Centres.

The following programs administered by the Department of Education could be of particular interest to people of Indian ancestry:

Occupational Training of Adults Program: Indians and Metis may be eligible for basic education and pre-employment training courses in vacancies purchased by Canada Manpower at technical and vocational centres in the province. Manpower also sponsors special projects such as Basic Training for Skill Development, and commercial core training courses for entry into such occupations as hospital ward clerks, clerk-typists, and retail clerks. Eligibility for these programs is determined by the Department of Manpower & Immigration, and application may be made at any Canada Manpower Centre.

The Federal-Provincial Indian Program: This program sponsored by the Department of Education in co-operation with ARDA and the Department of Indian & Eskimo Affairs, is designed for persons of registered Indian ancestry who are unable to enroll in Manpower's occupational training courses. Basic Literacy, and Adult grades 5-10 classes are held on reserves and in local communities. Application for training may be made through any vocational counsellor of the Department of Indian & Eskimo Affairs.

Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Program: A wide variety of training is available to persons with a physical or mental disability under this program. Basic Education (or educational upgrading) opportunities are available throughout the province. Courses in Domestic Science and Occupational Services provide training for persons unable to cope with the regular school system. In addition, this program sponsors individuals who qualify in trade, technological, and university training. All candidates must be referred through the Saskatchewan Indian & Metis Department which is a designated referral agency.

Non-registered Indian & Metis Program: Basic Education courses in this provincially-sponsored program, are available in a variety of rural and urban communities. The purpose of this program is to allow local people to upgrade their educational qualifications, and therefore, broaden their opportunities for further training and employment possibilities. In addition, the N.R.I.M. program sponsors individuals in trades and occupational courses at the various institutes and vocational centres. Candidates for training may apply through Indian & Metis Society representatives, as well as through field representatives and placement officers of the Saskatchewan Indian & Metis Department.

The following list of programs and the number attending them exemplifies the increasing emphasis we are placing on adult education for Indian/Metis people:

1. Technologies – 1,212 in 1969 compared to 324 in 1964;
2. Educational upgrading – 3,653 in 1969 compared to 108 in 1964;
3. Trades Apprenticeship – 1,944 in 1969 compared to 924 in 1964;
4. Training in Trades Pre-employment – 1,697 in 1969 compared to 696 in 1964;
5. Training in Industry – 1,697 in 1969 compared to none in 1964;

6. Business Management – 468 in 1969 compared to none in 1964.

New and exciting training programs that will enable each individual to make maximum use of his unique potentialities are being planned and implemented with the co-operation of all the various public and private agencies involved.

D. Present Social Service Programs

61. The Government of Saskatchewan believes that people are entitled to a sufficient income which would provide them with certain goods and services necessary to ensure a basic minimum standard of living. In order to do this it is apparent that there is a need to re-organize Canada's social service programs. Such a re-organization would be aimed at ensuring that the social service dollar is spent in the best possible manner. Our government stands ready to co-operate to the fullest possible degree in re-examining Canada's social security system to make it into a more workable and fairer system.

62. We believe that to establish a universal income maintenance program would be an extremely complicated undertaking, requiring the development of a computerized social accounting system on a regional basis. Prior to this being developed there would need to be common agreement among all government levels and the general public as to what constitutes a basic decent, minimum standard of living, for all Canadians. We do not believe that poverty lines can be established on a Canada wide basis for the simple reason that poverty lines will vary from area to area depending on particular social, economic, and cultural circumstances. We also do not know whether it would be feasible at this time for such poverty lines to be established on a regional basis. However, we do believe that the desirability of such an approach deserves careful study.

63. Comprehensive income maintenance programs will not by themselves solve poverty. They will only establish some absolute minimum level of income below which no individual's or family's disposable income could fall. In a sense, they would establish a minimum level of poverty. This of course is not necessarily a bad thing, but to think that it will in itself be a solution is completely misunderstanding the nature of the poverty problem. We submit that the poverty problem is not so much one of straight economics (although this certainly is important) but rather, it is more related to society's value of equality in an affluent society. Very simply, people want equality; not complete equality, but a much greater degree of equality than now exists. We are of the opinion that no amount of minimal income support can solve this basic problem of inequality. To solve this problem will require a re-thinking of our attitudes in relation to the decision making processes in society.

E. Participation of Low-Income People

64. What is meant by increasing equality for the poor? Does it mean "equal opportunity"? Yes, partially that, but it also means something much more. It means a feeling of equality—a sense of achievement and fulfilment, and the enjoyment derived from the rewards and satisfactions of living. Much of this is derived from being able to give of oneself through direct involvement in making decisions that affect oneself and one's community. In other words the equality of the individual must be expressed through his freedom to express his thoughts and ideas, and his right to take part in matters concerning himself and his community.

65. It is true that many of the poor, because of lack of involvement in such processes may at first be somewhat apprehensive, reticent, and suspicious, and will need considerable encouragement and support. In addition, agencies will need to demonstrate a great deal of patience in helping all strata of the poor to effectively participate. However, we strongly feel that once the poor are involved in the decision making processes, then we will find that poverty programs will develop more rationally, they will become more acceptable, and they will be more successful.

66. Participation by the poor must be sanctioned at the highest governmental levels and be genuinely supported at all levels, otherwise it will be an exercise in futility that will do more harm than good. Such a process must enable the poor to act on behalf of their own interests. They must have a voice that is listened to. Their voices must not be merely exemplifications of token "participation by the poor".

67. Some examples of where the poor can effectively participate are as follows: on welfare appeal boards, on welfare advisory boards, and on various program committees at all levels. The poor should also be encouraged to form their own self-help groups where the need is indicated.

68. As previously indicated in Saskatchewan Department of Welfare currently has client representation on its Provincial Welfare Board. In addition, the formation of self-help client groups are being encouraged in our regions. Furthermore, it is hoped that all regional welfare advisory boards will eventually have effective client representation. The present policy of the Department of Welfare is to encourage client participation as much as possible in all areas of program development.

69. Traditionally, almost all communication between Departments of Welfare and their clients have been through direct program service personnel, usually in the form of "caseworkers". While this approach is a necessary one and while many welfare workers have undoubtedly done remarkable work while up against heavy odds, it is a narrow approach. It is an approach that has certain drawbacks in so far as using all feasible avenues of dialogue, communication, and involvement with recipients. By itself it is an approach that also militates against involvement of the community in general in developing an awareness of programs and problems. In our opinion a much wider community approach is needed. Departments of Welfare should be given every encouragement to develop such approaches in keeping with the particular nature of the problems they face. One such approach would be the employment of community workers who would not have the traditional direct service responsibilities, but who would function as "channels" or "bridges" between their actual clients or potential clients. Briefly, the tasks of community workers would fall into four main areas. First, they would advise people of the services of Departments of Welfare as well as making appropriate referrals to other agencies. Second, they would function as sensitive receptors and recorders of the needs and problems of the area. Third, they would act as a liaison between the client system and community in general and Welfare Departments, and fourth, the worker would act as a catalyst in the formation of various types of client groups that may be developed from time to time.

70. The specifics of meaningful participation by the poor are many and varied. The important thing here is not so much the details of any particular undertaking, but the acceptance of the principle of meaningful participation by the poor in decisions that affect their lives.

F. Volunteerism

71. The development of meaningful and effective volunteer services on a national basis should be explored as a possible policy. To assist state and local welfare offices in developing volunteer services, the United States federal government recently established an Office of Citizen Participation headed up by a Director of Volunteer Services, under the Social and Rehabilitation Service of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. It is understood that each state has established or will shortly be establishing, Directors of Volunteer Services and that many local welfare offices are also developing positions to direct volunteer services.

72. The legislative basis for these services was made possible by the United States Social Security Amendments of 1967 which state that States plans must provide:

"for the training and effective use of paid sub-professional staff, with particular emphasis on the full-time or part-time employment of recipients and other persons of low income, as community service aides, in the administration of the plan and for use of non-paid or partially paid volunteers in a social service volunteer program in providing services to applicants and recipients and in assisting any advisory committees established by the State agency".¹

73. It is interesting to note that the legislation provides for volunteers to come from all segments of society by making provision for some form of subsidy. Such payments are designed to ensure for even the poorest of the poor to serve in partnership with more affluent citizens.

74. We feel that well developed volunteer services could contribute immensely to the general social betterment and uplifting of Canadian citizens. The volunteer can contribute in a unique and important manner. It is a contribution that will neither duplicate nor usurp the tasks, functions, or methods of the professional. The volunteer is not a substitute professional. His function is to complement, to supplement, not to supplant.

75. Wide spread volunteerism can be an effective way through which the more positive attitudes of the public can be developed. Firstly, the volunteer symbolizes the commitment and concern of the community. Secondly, as an aware and vocal citizen, he has a unique contribution to make as he identifies general needs through first hand exposure to individual unmet needs. Through friends, neighbors, fellow church goers and fellow club members he has his own particular way of reaching and influencing the public. More important, his public is one that is apt to listen because he is one of them. He reports first hand observations. He is not suspect.

76. Volunteers who participate as an integral part of an agency team can greatly affect community attitudes and behaviour toward poverty program services and goals, while at the same time adding appreciably in providing a better service.

77. A word of caution. If volunteer services are implemented without adequate supervision they will flounder and fail. Volunteer services are in every sense an extension of programming and require an ongoing and continuous process of recruiting, training, supervision, co-ordination, and identification of volunteer service areas.

G. Communication - Co-ordination

78. Both communication and co-ordination have already been alluded to. However, it is felt that the subject is sufficiently important to devote a special segment of this section to it. Probably a great deal more could be accomplished with present resources and programs if there was more communication and co-ordination among the various government and private services. We realize that it is a subject that has been extensively dealt with over the past number of years. The fact is, it is still just as valid for discussion today as it was ten years ago, perhaps even more so. For example, only during the past few years have our various provincial departments, concerned with providing services in the Saskatchewan north, started to meet together in various levels of interdepartmental committees. This developed primarily at the instigation of our Department of Welfare with the result that we now have three levels of interdepartmental committees meeting, with a two way flow of information between all levels. One level is composed of various senior staff at the provincial level, a second involves senior staff at the regional levels and a third involves field level staff at the district level. The next logical step we hope to develop is the involvement of indigenous people at the local level. The most effective means of co-ordinating northern services is a subject for continuing exploration. As our services are extended and broadened in the North it is imperative that effective communication be developed in order that economic and social development progress at an unimpeded rate.

79. The precise nature of communication structures must necessarily be dictated by particular regional situations. Again, it is not the specifics that are important, but it is the acceptance and implementation of the principle that is paramount. Many of our programs operate in isolation. The co-operation of numerous government departments, private agencies, and groups are needed if we are going to make any sort of meaningful attack on poverty. It is just this type of acceptance of a principle that has resulted in a great deal of co-operation between the public and private sector in Saskatchewan in developing employment opportunities for many of our Indian and Metis people.

H. Economic Development

80. While the Government of Saskatchewan endorses the present national policy of fiscal responsibility, we also recognize that, for various reasons, certain regions of the country need economic stimulus. Saskatchewan is now one of these regions. Our current wheat situation is well known, there is a restricted potash market, and there are American restrictions on the importation of oil.

81. Saskatchewan is a resource province and our economic health depends on our exports. Potash, uranium, oil, copper, as well as grain and cattle are the mainstays of our economy and many of them are experiencing temporary problems over which we have little or no control.

82. Saskatchewan, then, now faces a unique situation in its history. We are caught between the forces of local recession and national inflation. Our dilemma is that the cure for the first problem feeds and encourages the second. In order to fight our economic slowdown we are doing our utmost to prime the economic pump and bring help to every part of Saskatchewan.

83. Even given the present economic situation we believe that the almost blind pursuit of obtaining credentials has in some cases created artificial barriers that preclude many of our poor from what otherwise would be employment opportunities. We feel very strongly that many employers including governments, have set rather unnecessary levels of qualifications, and that all employers should be encouraged to carefully review qualifications for jobs, and decrease them if they are deemed to be unrealistically high. For example, the Saskatchewan Government actively encourages such a policy in developing employment opportunities for people of Indian ancestry. Such a policy is particularly applicable to employers who say they are having trouble finding qualified workers. If enough qualified workers are not available then unqualified ones should be hired and given on the job training. While the federal government, as well as other government levels and some private industries, provide on the job training, we feel that it is an area that could be greatly expanded.

84. Tied in closely with the subject of artificial employment barriers is the concept of positive discrimination in employment. Very simply, this means that the disadvantaged should be given certain incentives not available to the more successful, which would enable them to become economically productive. For example, in Saskatchewan we provide loans for the construction of houses for sale or rental to people of Indian ancestry. We also require government highway and building contractors to hire a certain percentage of workers of native ancestry. This may be looked on as positive discrimination. With reference to our Indian/Metis employment policies, we have set a target for 1971 of having at least seven percent of our civil service staffed by people of Indian ancestry, either in training or permanent positions. At the present time there is close to 450 provincial civil servants of Indian ancestry, representing a little over five percent of our total civil service staff complement.

85. With regard to our policy concerning government contracts, at least five percent of the total work force of all contractors doing work involving the use of public funds, must be people of Indian ancestry.

86. We have recently established a separate Indian/Metis Department, the function of which is to operate an employment placement service for people of Indian ancestry, to promote economic development projects, and to co-ordinate all government activities related to Indian and Metis people. This existence of this department may be looked on as another example of positive discrimination. In pursuing a policy of positive discrimination it is absolutely essential that all people involved completely understand that it is only a temporary policy in order to get people on their feet so that they can help themselves. It is not a policy that grants special privileges and considerations to particular individuals and groups on a long term forever and ever basis.

I. Research

87. The expertise of many disciplines is needed to help us understand and to help us deal effectively with the poverty problem. It is our impression that much of the research being conducted today is being used for rather narrow purposes. It is also our impression that some disciplines could be doing a lot more in the field of operational research. We believe, for example, that the field of anthropology could play a very significant role in helping us to answer many of the questions that we are currently grappling with. Anthropologists have been extremely successful in studying the life styles of exotic peoples in far corners of the world. They have also accumulated much data on many of our Indian tribes and have given us valuable insight into the cultural background of people of Indian ancestry. We would suggest that anthropologists could play an important role in poverty studies by providing more ethnographic information on poverty in Canada which would help us understand what poor people want and what they are willing to do to get what they want. Indeed, without such information policies and programs to "eliminate poverty" will continue to be launched on jelly-like foundations.

88. As indicated previously, the expertise and knowledge of a number of disciplines are needed. Anthropology will not solve it alone. Social Welfare will not solve it alone. Economics will not solve it alone. What is needed is a nationally organized research organization including all disciplines which would function as a co-ordinator of poverty research projects, a centralized information centre, and an interpreter of research findings.

89. We have tried to make our brief as balanced a presentation as possible. We fully understand that the poverty problem is not a simple one. It is even extremely difficult to agree on a definition. However, definition or no definition, it is clear to any observant person that poverty is a real part of this affluent society.

90. The existence of negative public attitudes is one of the largest single stumbling blocks in the way of mounting an effective attack on poverty. Far too many people still believe that the poor, including welfare recipients, are totally to blame for their circumstances. Poverty is viewed as something immoral and the individual is viewed with varying degrees of distaste. The fact that all studies indicate that the social assistance recipient had no choice but to apply for public welfare seems to have had little impact on the majority of the public. Such negative public attitudes toward the poor must stop. Somehow, the positive energies of Canadians must be harnessed into a national commitment, which would allow Canada to develop effective measures to solve the many problems associated with poverty.

91. No one approach is the long sought after panacea. It is a multi-faceted problem requiring a multi-pronged attack. Part of the answer lies in some form of a comprehensive income maintenance system; part of the answer lies in universal access to the judicial process; part of the answer lies in universal medicare; part of the answer lies in rehabilitation programs; part of the answer lies in increased co-ordination of programs; part of the answer lies in increased participation by the poor in decisions which affect them; part of the answer lies in co-ordinated research; part of the answer lies in a more rational economic system; part of the answer lies in increased public participation in our social programs; part of the answer lies in designing and implementing new approaches and programs; and a very big part of the answer lies in changing public attitudes. For, unless the public is behind the attack on poverty, the attack will fail.

APPENDIX B

SASKATCHEWAN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

POVERTY IN SASKATCHEWAN

The limitations of income, as a measure of poverty, are evident when comparing rural farm income with that of urban families. Variables in life-style, tax exemptions, cost of living, etc., complicate the establishment of a common measure of poverty. A further limitation to using income as a measure of poverty is that it fails to identify other significant factors in the poverty situation such as the relative quality of education, health, housing and aspirations. It has been said "Poverty is not just low incomes . . . it is poor housing and poor schools . . . it is fewer doctors and inadequate medical care. More important, it is discouragement in people, it is a decline in the social economic fabric of communities. These in turn breed continuing substandard education and levels of living in a cycle that is hard to break or reverse".¹ Therefore, poverty in its truest sense is more than mere monetary wants; it is wants mixed with a lack of aspirations.

The inability to identify objective criteria which would depict a minimum standard which would be acceptable in our society, in each of these areas, creates limitations as great or greater than those associated with the use of income as a measure of poverty.

If, as most people believe, people should have a right to an adequate standard of living, the Standard must be defined.

Statistical data do not adequately describe poverty. However, they are valuable in providing clues as to the amount, location, distribution and extent of poverty in Saskatchewan. With this end in view, the following statistics are outlined.

As indicated by the figures above, the trend would suggest that gross income is increasing for greater proportions of the farms.

To determine the quality of housing, data from seven towns ranging in size of 1,000 population to 3,500 were examined. The data was obtained from Urban Renewal Studies conducted during the 1966-1969 period for the Saskatchewan Department of Municipal Affairs. The building surveys indicated that of a total number of 4,621 residential buildings, 1,647 or 35.6 per cent were in good condition, 1,932 or 41.8 per cent were in fair to poor condition, and the balance of 1,042 or 22.5 per cent were in very poor condition. "Good" Housing included only those Educational Levels for the Saskatchewan population reflect similar patterns to that of Canada.

However, considering those people out of school, educational levels of Saskatchewan's rural population are significantly lower than for the urban population.

structures that met modern standards, while "Fair" to "Poor" would require some improvement to bring them up to modern standards. The "Very Poor" category is for dwellings that would require a large outlay for rehabilitation, or in many instances, should be removed from the housing stock because of dilapidation.

The foregoing statistics point up areas of concern when considering the poverty question. However, general statistics of this nature have limitations, e.g. certain characteristics of age, family size, place of residence, etc. but it was assumed that the incidence of poverty would be higher among the low income, lower educated and poorly housed.

Among the poverty problems in Saskatchewan is a heavy dependence on agriculture, both direct and indirect. The small communities find themselves hard-pressed as farms grow fewer and many farmers travel greater distances for services. As a consequence, low income and low wage employment exists in many of these communities.

How Many are Poor in Saskatchewan

In trying to establish the number of Saskatchewan people that could be classified as poor, it is very difficult to determine the poverty line for those in agriculture, even when utilizing income as the criteria. To date, the collection of data on incomes of families and individuals has not been extended to the farm population. Rather, an establishment of Saskatchewan farms by economic classes has been reported in the 1966 census of Canada, outlining the gross value of agricultural sales per farm. The proceedings of the Canadian Agricultural Congress 1969 estimated that 45% of the gross value of agricultural sales would give the approximate net income from farming.

Of further interest, "4 out of 10 Canadian farmers have some employment not related to their farming enterprise and one out of 10 carries a full-time (or near full-time) outside job".¹ It is important that a closer investigation of farm incomes, part-time farming, etc., be conducted in order to more clearly identify total income.

In establishing what an adequate income is, a common set of criteria is required for all people. The income tax statement should be able to facilitate this measurement. However, the present tax exemption allowances for farmers differ with those for salaried workers and as such, adjustments would have to be considered in order to equate living standards. In comparing the income of a farmer with that of a salaried worker having a similar family size; it was estimated that the salaried worker in the lower income groups would require an additional 30% net income to maintain a similar living standard with that of the farmer living on the farm. Because of the limited amount of data available and with the constant tax changes a more detailed study would be required in order to determine the income levels which would reflect comparable standards of living between farm and non-farm persons. Differences also exist between rural, urban and Provincial areas depending on the location of major community services, trade facilities, highways, etc.

Attempts have been made to measure the number of poor people through establishing specific income levels as the poverty line. In Canada, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics has defined the income level for different sized family units. The following table depicts their findings compared with estimated income requirements¹ for farmers.

Family Size	Income Requirements (D.B.S. Estimates)	Income Requirements Rural Farmers (Estimates)
2	$2,500	$1,900
3	$3,000	$2,280
4	$3,500	$2,650
5	$4,000	$3,000

Using the preceding income figures as a guide and assuming an average family of four, the data would indicate that at least a major part of the families on farms with gross income between $250 and $4,999 are poor.

Variations in yield and price make it difficult to identify trends from census data on income. Farm size is less subject to annual variation.

In 1966 there were reported to be 25,084 farms in the 1/4 section to 1/2 section category, i.e. between 70-399 acres. Assuming return to labor and capital of $10 per acre, it is obvious that most families on farms in this category would be classified as poor.

Thus, through these general estimates one would arrive at a figure of 25-30,000 of farms in the province that would be classified as clearly of insufficient size to support a family except at a poverty level. Among this group would be found various compensating factors—off-farm employment, bachelors, special farm enterprises, etc; which would reduce the number that would be poor. Factors that would increase the number would be larger farms of 480 acres to 640 acres, where by reason of poor soil, poor management, debt, etc; the families operating them would be at the poverty level.

With trends towards more commercialized farming, it is becoming more and more difficult for families to remain on sub-economic farms. In the fifteen years between 1951 and 1966, the number of farms of between 70 and 399 acre size decreased from 50,597 to 25,084.

Causes of Poverty

(a) Life-cycle Poverty—This is apparent in many rural throughout Saskatchewan. A case in point was an unpublished departmental study conducted by the Economics and Statistics Branch of the Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture in 1964. This was part of a larger study but point out the problem.

An analysis of 17 small size farms in close proximity to each other in R.M. #395 will be discussed. The overall appearance and general impression of the area was one of lack of progress and resource development and small scale, submarginal farming. There were very few large farms in the area. A considerable portion of the area was owned by absentee landlords or farmers living outside the area. Very few of the farms had electric power, and none had telephones. The average farm consisted of 409 acres with 166 acres cultivated. The average building, livestock and machinery inventory was valued at $3,419 per farm. The seventeen farms had an average debt of $1,323 per farm. The gross farm income for 1964 averaged $2,538 per farm and of this, 27 per cent was earned from off-farm sources. The average family size of the 17 farms was 4.2 persons.

(b) Depressed Area Poverty—This is a situation where a region depends heavily on declining of production.

It could be said that, relatively, income of agriculture in Saskatchewan is low because growth in wheat and other grain output has outpaced its growth in effective demand.

¹ These are estimated on the basis of lower property tax, imputed value of home produce consumed and allowable income tax deductions.

The most recent projects regarding the outlook for grain marketings indicate a shrinking market. However, the long term demand for livestock is and should remain favourable. The Saskatchewan government has in the past and is currently involved in initiating policies to promote a shift to livestock production.

However, with what appears to be a shrinking grain market and because of preponderance of grain in Saskatchewan, very indepth market knowledge is required so that a rational, long-term, agricultural policy is established.

In agriculture, technology in the whole field of production has made great strides in the past few decades. However, the farm settlement pattern of Saskatchewan was established under the Homestead Act which promoted the establishment of small-size farms. Many of these small farms exist today and as such are unable to take advantage of advanced technology. Farm size adjustment is required in many or most rural areas in Saskatchewan. A training program for persons moving out of farming is required for a successful adjustment. Alternative employment will also be required for this to be successful.

The ramifications of the suggested transition of a number of farmers to other occupations will likely cause a further hardship on the rural non-farm segment of the population than exists today. It is, therefore, important that a rational approach to the establishment of larger well equipped growth centres be undertaken throughout Saskatchewan.

To correct the depressed-area poverty people in this situation often require extensive counselling on all aspects of the transition; they need better information about the nature of jobs, training programs, life in urban centres, the problem of adjustment, etc. Broad vocational counselling, aimed at helping these people to use existing training and job programs is extremely important in the over-all program to improve their economic position.

CONCLUSION

A more concerted and purposeful attack on poverty in Saskatchewan is required. The challenge, in the short run, is to alleviate the conditions which today thrust many Saskatchewan families and individuals into involuntary poverty and hold them there. In the long run, the challenge is to prevent the development of these conditions. The aid should be to identify those measures that will meet this challenge effectively and economically, but also compassionately, taking care to preserve the human dignity and freedoms which our society cherishes.

To deal with poverty a more co-ordinated effort on the part of all governments and social services will be required. Of particular importance is the educational system. It is widely recognized that for alleviation of much of the poverty that exists today, educational opportunities are required.

It is ironical to note that most "experts" agree that people will require retraining for three different jobs during their lifetime and yet, society is not supplying a large percentage of its population access to a level of education deemed essential to accomplish this.

We agree that all persons do not have the same abilities. However, many of the available jobs in industry, etc. require trade skills and the ability to reason and not university degrees or high school diplomas.

It appears that a more concerted effort will be required in the field of education, utilizing more counselling at all levels, an incentive of some kind to try to keep children in school longer, increased number of vocational and trades training programs.

During the past 15-20 years, Saskatchewan's agricultural cash receipts have dropped from approximately 23-24% to 20-21% of the Canadian total. This year, due to poor markets for wheat, Saskatchewan's share will drop to about 18%. As a result of changes in world market needs and problems of our institutions in adapting to changing market needs and problems of our institutions in adapting to changing market conditions, Saskatchewan agriculture is witnessing an abnormally low income situation.

What will be required to improve the income position of Saskatchewan rural farmers and farm workers?

It is imperative that markets and market potential for farm products be established and this information be made available to the producers. A serious investigation should be made of Saskatchewan advantages, relative to other areas in Canada and throughout the world. Once this is established the entire agricultural and food industry must adapt if success is to be achieved.

CANADIAN AGRICULTURE IN THE SEVENTIES

Report of the Federal Task Force on Agriculture

THE LOW-INCOME SECTOR

INTRODUCTION

The most perfect of economic plans is impractical and unacceptable unless it fully takes into account the human factor. The really poor one-third of the farming population is the sector which puts to the test the humanity and perceptive sensibility of planners. Before committing plan to drawing board a difficult concept must be learned and subjectively evaluated; the concept is that of poverty itself. The economic measure of income is not a sufficient measure. The poor are deprived of many things taken for granted by society, let alone an affluent society. Money is a factor but for the poor so are warmth, the opportunity to talk and be listened to with respect by someone outside the family, or a dentist within reach. How does the community reach poor people? How effective are Canadian methods of trying to reach them? What better ways can be tried to reach and do something for the rural "economic drop-outs"? The answer is not simply economic efficiency, productivity and viability.

The view is widely held that, of 430,000 farms in Canada in 1966, only a third or so are large enough, by today's standards, for long-run viability. The remaining two-thirds are by no means homogeneous but appear to fall into two groups of about equal size—a "middle" stratum of the moderately well-off, and a bottom stratum of about 100,000 who live in poverty. The middle stratum includes part-time and full-time farmers of varying degrees of success and for whom the future holds many uncertainties. Well-designed long-term policies are needed to ensure that some, in the middle stratum, move up to full economic viability that successful part-time patterns endure and that those better suited to other occupations can make the transition out of agriculture. However, the only factor distinguishing this group from the "poverty" level group below is that most of the present needs of its members are met, at least at a minimum level. There is no guarantee that ability, initiative or the spirit of co-operation is any more prevalent in the economically mediocre group than among the still less fortunate in the poverty group.

Will Time Solve The Problem?

The continuing exodus from agriculture and in particular the declining number of small-scale farms (a drop of 100,000 in the five-year period ending 1966) encourages hopes that no special programs are needed to alleviate farm poverty. If one simply projects the 1961-66 trend, the number of small-scale farms remaining in ten years time would be very small. Unfortunately, a closer examination of the composition of this "trend" produces no grounds for optimism.

Roughly 50 per cent of the reduction in the small farm sector in the early sixties was due to expansion which placed farms into "sales classes" higher on the scale. This kind of upward mobility is very closely related to increasing sales in agriculture as a whole (from $2.3 billion in 1961 to $3.3 billion in 1966—an increase of 50 per cent). It would be most unwise to count on a 50 per cent increase every five years.

The other half of the decline in the number of small farms 1961 to 1966 represents the dissolution of farms as individual entities, as men quit farming altogether. While this group includes those farmers who left farming for other jobs, their numbers were relatively small. It is largely death and retirement of older operators which takes men out of agriculture. This means that, unless out-migration is greatly accelerated, the projection of further reductions in the small-farm sector is very closely related to age structure.

The analysis of census data is necessarily limited to the net change in numbers of farm operators between 1961 and 1966. One cannot know how many men left farming because the 1966 count includes men who entered farming in the five-year period as well as those who were farming in 1961. However, it can be shown that net withdrawals were limited to the age groups over 55 years in 1961: the latter showed a net decline of 62,000 operators whereas the age group under 55 years recorded a net gain of 12,000 operators. The calculation of net withdrawals is shown in the Task Force Position Paper.¹ The calculation is based on all operators but it is reasonable to suppose that the pattern for small-scale operators would not differ greatly.

Age of small-scale farm operators in 1966 is summarized as follows:

	No.	Per Cent
Under 45 years	84,277	36
45 to 54 years	62,032	26
55 and over	91,548	38
	337,857	100

Many of those in the third group (age 55 years and over) will leave farming shortly; using the rate obtained from 1961-66, one can predict the disappearance of approximately 40,000 small farm operators in the next five years. But what of the large group of under 45's and those in the middle years, the men who entered farming after World War II? Since both groups had a net gain between 1961 and 1966, it is evident that significant reductions in the under 45 years class cannot be predicted unless there are much more effective policies to take men out of farming; in fact, it seems likely that policies to limit entry would also be necessary. The middle category presents even greater difficulty. Still well below retirement age, these are men with low mobility into other occupations and it is difficult to see significant reductions in their numbers over the next 15 to 20 years.

In short, the "small-farm" problem will be present for some years yet,² and it is likely that the numbers of the "really poor" will decline slowly because such a large proportion are middle-aged. Younger operators are under-represented in the poverty sector because so many have made an adjustment through part-time farming. It is possible that the numbers in the poverty sector will shrink through further extensions of supplementary earnings. It is also likely that the "poverty line" of $3,000 income will have to be increased and that technological change will continue to push into low income levels those units which are not suited to rapid change.

REVIEW OF EXISTING POLICIES

Improving Off-farm Opportunities

The most attractive answer to the problem of low incomes in agriculture is that labour move to employment in other industries. The process has been going on throughout the post-war era. Some difficulty was encountered during Canada's years of stagnation 1957-62, when unemployment averaged about 6 percent. In the last half of the sixties the Federal Government has added a manpower mobility and training program which attempts to help the under-educated and inadequately trained.³

Training programs: Manpower programs are important; they do much to upgrade the labour force and to see that labour market requirements are matched by a qualified labour supply. Their role in reducing the numbers of farm poor, however, appears limited. The best hope is that Manpower programs will provide good non-farm alternatives to younger operators, to the sons of marginal farmers and to other rural youth who are ill-equipped to become modern farmers. This in itself would be a major contribution but it is unrealistic to look for any great impact in the ranks of the middle-aged who make up a high percentage of the farm poverty sector today.

Even to reach younger operators poses problems. For example, most training courses require at least a Grade 10 standing. This is not an insurmountable barrier since upgrading courses are offered from the ¹ See Low Income Sector in Canadian Agriculture, a paper prepared for the Canadian Agricultural Congress by the Federal Task Force on Agriculture, Ottawa 1969, Table 3.

² Tending to confirm our view that off-farm migration will lead to no more than minor reductions in the poverty sector are some American statistics on farm population. In sharp contrast to the annual reduction in numbers of farmers over the past 30 years, the counts at January 1968 and January 1969 revealed no change. Tentatively, officials of the U.S. Department of Agriculture infer that the period of large scale movement to the city has ended; the farmers who remain, by and large, are expected to live out their lives on the farm. The facts are less well documented in Canada but it is probably safe to assume that the heart of the poverty problem centres on farmers in their middle years.

³ The main services offered by the Department of Manpower and Immigration (established 1965) are educational up-grading and job training, information on job supply, and assistance to those moving to high employment areas. Most of these services have a longer history but have been expanded or given new emphasis since 1968.

Grade 7 level (and in a few training centres, from Grade 4). Obviously, however, efforts of this kind will not appeal to every marginal farmer whose education is deficient.

"Reaching" rural people with training programs: "Reaching" rural people who could benefit from training and other Manpower services is difficult. Observers of the American Manpower Development and Training Act, five years after its inception, report that programs to enhance mobility have been very limited in effect in rural areas. It is reasonable to assume that the problems are similar in Canada considering that only the unemployed have been eligible for moving grants and loans—the number of Canadian farmers who have been helped to move to jobs must be almost nil.⁴ More effective penetration of rural areas is possible given new techniques such as mobile clinics. It is justifiable to intensify efforts to train rural youth for non-farm employment but not necessarily so to train established farmers. Income levels for low-skill occupations in the city are also very low and living costs are higher. A study of rural-urban comparisons in the Atlantic provinces and the Gaspé, concluded that those remaining in depressed rural areas were right not to move.⁵ While this judgment applies to workers without special training (which would improve the picture) it is essential that no general decisions on training and moving be made without asking such specific questions as what training? For what jobs? For what pay?

A trap to be avoided is that of regarding a small payment to a low income producer as wasteful but considering the alternatives—a large welfare payment or expenditure on training—as somehow more desirable. Thus, a small income supplement which keeps a 50 year old milk producer in operation in his own community (albeit depressed) is not necessarily less desirable than a program which trains him, moves him and perhaps employs him for a few years at a "viable wage". Keynes made an interesting observation thirty years ago on a similar point.

It is curious how common sense wriggling for an escape from absurd conclusions, has been apt to reach preference for wholly "wasteful" forms of loan expenditures rather than for partly wasteful forms, which because they are not wholly wasteful, tend to be judged on strict "business" principles. For example, unemployment relief financed by loans is more readily accepted than the financing of improvements at a charge below the current rate of interest. . . .⁶

High employment levels: Emphasis must be placed on job supply as much as on labour mobility. Non-farm employment as a solution to the problem of low income farmers, faces competition from the unemployed (432,000 in April 1969), and about 200,000 additional workers joining the labour force each year, as well as from the low income people of rural Canada. Of a similar situation in the United States, M. L. Upchurch concluded:

With present rates of growth in the labour force and a flood of urban youth to accommodate, the prospects for solving the rural poverty program by outmigration appears dim.⁷

Bringing Industry to Rural Areas

The Canadian anti-poverty program has also attempted to create new jobs in economically lagging areas through financial incentives influencing the location of plants.⁸ The program seems not to have worked with equal effectiveness in all areas.⁹ The Georgian Bay region, for example appears to have derived great benefit, both in terms of increased employment and the introduction of "growth" industries which, in turn, have led to significant improvements in wage levels. In New Brunswick however, the impact of ADA

⁴ In 1966-67, only 2,100 persons in Canada received loans or grants for moving. Eligibility requirements have been eased, in 1969.

⁵ Jane A. Abramson, Barriers to Population Mobility; Centre for Community Studies, June 1968. A similar inference may be drawn from Bishop's study of migration which showed little reluctance among rural people to take advantage of bona fide employment opportunities even if the change meant moving long distances. grants is believed to have been rather small. In New Brunswick the new industries established were more traditional (most of them were resource-based), gave chiefly low-skill, low-wage employment and generally failed to find industrial linkages through which secondary employment might have been generated by the ADA plants. A main reason for the better results in the Georgian Bay area is obviously the proximity to major markets in southern Ontario. As the authors of the study point out, it is probable that industry would have been moving in within ten years anyway, and that ADA's chief contribution lay in speeding up the process. In areas which have no real advantages to begin with, industrial incentives may be quite incapable of sparking genuine development.

Rural "industrialization" is highly relevant to a discussion of the farm problem because "bringing industry in" is the solution most strongly favoured by a great many farm people. It is the dispersion of industry to rural backwaters that is wanted by a high percentage of political supporters, although it does not always work. The ADA program in New Brunswick, it is agreed is a weak type of development. In fact, industrial dispersion of this type is no longer an objective of policy. Instead the industrial incentives program is now strongly oriented to locating industry in larger towns and cities which are to act as "growth centres".

In summary, industrial incentives seem capable of adding to employment in slow-growth regions through development of growth centres. A good case could be made for location grants to meet the growing problem of congestion in the larger metropolitan area, establishing industry in satellite cities and in smaller centres having good transportation links to existing industrial areas. Growth centres of this kind might be particularly helpful to rural people in increasing the availability of part-time employment. However, there can be no thought that incentive grants or any government programs have the power to put industry wherever there are farm and other rural people in need of employment. Finally, as with Manpower policies, it is unlikely that off-farm employment can draw off large numbers of farmers from the poverty category.

ARDA

The main thrust of the Canadian poverty program in rural areas has been provided by the Agriculture Rehabilitation and Development Act of 1961. The thrust has been considerably blunted because ARDA was never simply an anti-poverty program. The major objectives are (1) to raise incomes "in rural areas", including farmers generally, not merely the poor and (2) to improve resource use both as a means to raise incomes and as an independent objective.¹⁰ The latter—improved resource use—underlies a high percentage of the major ARDA programs.

As noted, it is possible to divide Canadian farmers into three roughly-equal economic groups. One group is viable, one is neither well-off nor poverty-stricken, and one is below the poverty level. ARDA programs have been of much greater value to the middle group than to the poverty-level group, largely because of ARDA's emphasis on improving resources and resource use. The purchase of marginal land for parks, recreation or forestry may bring about improved land use and provide poverty-level farmers with immediate cash from their sale of property but it does little to provide them with an alternative source of livelihood. Help offered farmers on their land often involves heavy expenditures on drainage and clearing; small farmers find that they are not in a position to take on the substantial obligations involved but the middle group are better able to do so. In the case of community pastures, which represent a major ARDA expenditure, the chief beneficiaries have tended to be viable or middle income farmers.

While there is no doubt that some small farmers have received extra income through ARDA programs, public funds could have had greater effect on those below the poverty line if programs had been selected from the stand-point of how best to relieve poverty rather than to improve the use of the land.

Recognizing this indirect limitation, the second ARDA agreement (1965—renamed Agricultural and Rural Development Act) provided a new cluster of programs intended to speed the removal of small-scale operators and to channel land thus released to operators who could become viable. The programs deal with impediments to the natural process of farm consolidation: on the sellers' side stagnation in the land market are offset by ARDA's willingness to purchase farms; the lack of knowledge concerning off-farm opportunities or lack of money to retire is countered by help in contracting Manpower services and providing income supplements to retiring farmers. On the buyers' side ARDA helps expanding farmers gain access to land, often at lower cost. Farmers also receive grants for land improvement, loans and individual counselling services to improve prospects for the consolidated farm unit.

Farm consolidation is now a major ARDA program in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, P.E.I. and the Interlake area in Manitoba. On the face of it, the programs appear admirably suited to effect the kind of adjustments most needed. Certainly, excellent work is proceeding. On closer examination, however, there seems to be two serious defects.

What happens to farmers selling out? The consolidation program improves the lot of those sellers who are suited to enter the federal Manpower program provided Manpower services are readily available. A commendable feature of the Ontario plan is the supply of counselling staff to assist the Manpower program in rural areas. For older operators it may work the other way, however, because the average purchase price is too small to guarantee retirement income.¹¹ The same could be said of the poorly-educated and the ailing, too young to retire but not easily fitted into the labour market. These difficulties are surmounted in the FRED program for eastern Quebec which explicitly provides social assistance to any sellers not moving into the Manpower program. Ontario offers limited income supplements (to bring total income to $1,200) to sellers in the age group 55 to 64 years.

Another important consideration is the likelihood of farm assets increasing in value in any area with an active land market. On average the value of land and buildings of small farms increased by 50 per cent between 1961 and 1966. The appreciation must be taken into account as a form of income. It must therefore, be very clear that the total income which sellers can earn later will exceed their small farm income, any part-time earnings and the appreciation of farm values, before sellers are encouraged to sell their farms. At times the desire to encourage consolidation seems to have become almost an end in itself and has obscured the question of what happens to those who have sold out.

A second question is whether a tendency exists to help farmers who do not need it. Turning to the buyers' side, it seems generally agreed that farm consolidation programs are not for farmers in the very low income levels but for those in an intermediate position—neither well-off nor poverty stricken. Where farms are small, even a doubling in size may add only a few hundred dollars in income and the costs incurred (by the farmer as well as by ARDA) are likely to be disproportionately large. One can therefore agree with the prevailing ARDA view that farm consolidation programs are properly directed to a particular class of farmers; namely, those who do not quite meet the standards of existing credit sources but who, with some land added and a generous infusion of management services, would be able to obtain credit and ultimately, a position of full viability.

From the industry standpoint it is clear that these are the farmers to assist. The difficulty is that such farmers, by definition, are not the really poor. Desirable as it is to help them, it should not be thought that ARDA programs get through to effectively assist the really poor. Moreover, as the plan has operated in Ontario and possibly elsewhere, not all farmers qualifying for assistance could be said to lack access to conventional credit.¹² ARDA officials claim that this is due to special and temporary situations, notably the desire to establish large-scale ranching units in northern Ontario and the absence of a suitable candidate in other areas where land had been purchased. From Manitoba's Interlake comes evidence that larger farmers from outside the district where programs apply are purchasing land under the consolidation plan.

Looking at the positive side of the land consolidation program, it is clear that under its auspices, ARDA field staff are providing services which have long been needed in areas such as P.E.I. and the Gaspé, and have demonstrated an impressive ability to deal with such problems as fragmented land parcels, low levels of farming knowledge and lack of money for expansion. The program provides a service of benefit to the "middle stratum" of neither well-off nor poverty stricken.

In principle, ARDA is a new approach to the problems of low income people in an industry going through evolutionary change. Instead of the traditional approach of trying to raise low farm incomes by increasing prices of the products sold, ARDA attempts to bring about structural changes in the farm units themselves and in marginal rural communities. Unfortunately, ARDA now suffers from excessive expectation by its early supporters; the principles have been hard to translate into practice and into effective programs and results. It is to be expected when attitudes must be re-examined and changed by the people holding them (nor only the poor but also government officials); it is expected when attempts are made to promote local participation and leadership, and when research and administrative experience in this direction are in short supply.

¹² Data for the first year of operation in Ontario, reported by size categories, showed the consolidating farmers to have average assets above $35,000 and above $50,000 in 40 per cent of the cases.

The disappointment remains. The range of programs offered under ARDA is still surprisingly narrow. The choice of programs (which rests with the provinces) reflects varying interests and financial ability but as a general rule programs of industry-assistance have tended to take precedence over attempts to deal with rural poverty as such.

FRED

At mid-1966, the commitment of federal funds under ARDA amounted to $62 million of which about half had been spent. Contrasted with the $85 million to be shared between the Federal government and a single province to implement a plan in Manitoba's Interlake (pop: 58,000), the scope of comprehensive area planning as provided by FRED (Fund for Rural Economic Development)¹³ is placed in better perspective. In most cases FRED plans represent an all-out attack on poverty, co-ordinating the services and programs available elsewhere and adding to them.

FRED plans in Gaspé and the Interlake provide for drastic reductions in farm population to a point defined by the number of viable farms the resource-base will support. A high proportion of the redundant farmers are treated as probable retirements and the number of farmers to be accommodated under Manpower programs is relatively small. Manitoba planners have not specifically dealt with the problems which retirement may pose. Although it may be assumed that provincial welfare services will automatically be extended to low income farmers who cannot be fitted into Manpower programs, one feels that Quebec's approach is more deserving for the explicit recognition of this need. Under Quebec's plan, any farmer who moves out of a marginal parish is eligible for welfare as well as for training. Further flexibility is evidenced in the provision for a semi-retirement category: older operators are assisted to undertake a modest expansion in their farm operation if they so desire.

Under FRED is massive investment in education upgrading, training and manpower mobility. There is an attractive special feature of the Quebec plan which recognizes that not all individuals are capable of rapid absorption into the labour force. Given their present level of general and vocational training provision is made for a second group of trainees requiring "special rehabilitation programs over a more or less long period". These, presumably, are from marginal farms, have a very low level of education and a long history of dependence on welfare.

Much of the total cost under both the Manitoba and Quebec plans for field workers, who are in the communities to make opportunities known, to advise on access to government programs, to supply individual and group counselling services, to assess prospects for individual farm units and advise on expansion where feasible.

Industrial development seems to have been given less emphasis than training and mobility, although certainly there will be large investments in infrastructure. Strong efforts are also to be taken to encourage growth of industry, notably tourism. Quebec plans make out-migration an explicit objective; the Manitoba plan gives more emphasis to increasing employment within the region.¹⁴

Quebec offers a bold approach to the fact that some people will usually remain in marginal communities whatever is done to increase mobility. Incentive grants will be paid to encourage not just single families but all families to move out. Three larger towns within the region have been designated as growth centres and these will receive grants for municipal services to meet the influx of an anticipated 2,500 families, mainly low-income.

An important feature of both plans—one which greatly improves the chances for "success"—is that community consultation was assigned a high priority in the planning process. It appears that the wishes or priority demands of residents are reflected, insofar as it was possible to do so, in the priorities of the plans themselves. It seems that slow progress in implementing the plan for north-eastern New Brunswick, where community consultation was not a prominent feature, ¹³ FRED plans have been launched or announced for: the Interlake; Lower St. Lawrence-Gaspé; two regions in New Brunswick and one for the Province of Prince Edward Island. A plan for nine counties in Nova Scotia was pending in 1969.

¹⁴ This may be related to the Interlake's special problem of Indian-Metis predominance among the poor. If this is so, it appears that the problem of lower capacities for the adjustments imposed by migration is not necessarily best handled by single-minded concentration on creating local jobs—which may not go to the Indian and Metis in any event. Quebec's provision for special rehabilitation programs appears more appropriate to meet this problem.

reflects the failure to win full acceptance for goals and procedures in the communities concerned.

DEFINING THE LOW INCOME SECTOR

Anyone dealing with the question of low incomes encounters problems of definition and measurement. The first is a problem of concept—what is a “low” income? Is it low relative to one’s needs or desires—if so the same money income may be low for one person and high for another, or low in a community where living standards and cost of living are high and high in a largely self-sufficient community. In practice, the technique has been to ignore individual aspirations and to select, fairly arbitrarily, a level of income based largely on physical needs. Thus the Economic Council of Canada in its Fifth Annual Review, defined as a state of poverty in 1961 an income of $1,500 for a single person and $2,500 for a family of two, with an extra $500 for each child.¹⁵ No regional variation was introduced.

The second problem is one of measurement. In the case of farmers this is particularly difficult because farm income data relate to cash sales rather than net income, because income data are not related to size-of-family data and because farm income data are not related to off-farm incomes. Farmers with good wages from a second job must be distinguished from other part-time farmers who earn next to nothing in non-farm employment. A small farmer with the old age pension will fare much better than his younger neighbour with similar farm income. Large families live in straightened circumstances where a couple might find the income adequate. Added to these and other limitations of income statistics are the limitations of income as a measure of poverty. For example some farmers reporting low farm incomes have nevertheless accumulated substantial assets over the years. Even if assets are modest, the older farmer who owns his home may be distinctly better off than a low income tenant of the same age in the city or in the country. On the other hand, there are many low income farms (particularly in marginal areas) whose capital value is very low; pension plans are absent and the owners are likely to be extremely hardpressed as physical powers decline.

It is apparent that “low incomes” and “small farms” tend to be associated fairly closely, although they are not identical, as explained above. Without attempting any precise definition of what constitutes “commercial” agriculture it is safe to characterize as small or “non-commercial” those farms reporting under $5,000 gross sales. About 238,000 such farms were enumerated in the 1966 Census, 55 per cent of all farms in terms of numbers account for only 14 per cent of agricultural production. The total value of sales from this sector equals the sales from 6,000 or so of the largest farms.

The small farm sector so defined includes 75 per cent of all farms in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, the northern fringes of Ontario and the Prairies. Small farms are by no means confined to these areas, they are found in higher income areas too; about 30 per cent of all small farms are to be found in the Prairies and Ontario (excluding their northern fringes and Eastern Ontario).¹⁶ Also 35 per cent of the farms on the Prairies (excluding northern fringe) had sales of less than $5,000 in 1965.

In spite of the problems discussed above, it is essential to ascertain the size of the low income problem in farming. Using the rough guidelines selected by the Economic Council in the Fifth Annual Review, a state of poverty is defined for a family with one child as an income below $3,000 in terms of 1961 dollar values. Since data on farm income cannot be related to family size, subsequent discussion will assume an average family with one child. This figure has not been adjusted upward to meet the rise in price levels since 1961. On balance, then, the poverty-line of $3,000 per farm family should be adjusted upward to meet the absolutely rock-bottom minimum in terms of the needs of most farm families in the 1970’s.

Consider the income from farming operations which may be inferred from gross sales reported to the Census. Calculation of net income (including income in kind and an imputed rental value of the farm house) suggests that farm sales of $3,750-$5,000 yield an average net income of $2,469.¹⁷ Since farms with lower sales have even lower incomes, this means that virtually all the 238,000 farms below $5,000 sales in 1966 would have less than $3,000 in farm income; a large number would be well below the $3,000 line.

¹⁶ See Low Income Sector in Canadian Agriculture, a paper prepared for the Canadian Agriculture Congress by the Federal Task Force on Agriculture, Ottawa 1969, Table 3.

The average of approximately $2,500 is well below the $3,000-$3,500 poverty line. This allows some leeway for such factors as: (1) gross sales tending to be under-reported in the Census, (2) imputed rental values of the farm house being below the cost of equivalent accommodation in urban areas and (3) minor supplementary income of a kind not included in the calculations below.

Certain farms in the over $5,000 sales class are doubtless near or below the poverty line defined above but with average assets of $43,000 (in the sales class $5,000 to $7,499) it seems best to exclude the group as a whole in attempting to measure poverty.

However, among the 238,000 small farms (less than $5,000 sales) in 1966, about 45 per cent of the operators had some off-farm work and 15 to 20 per cent had full-time or almost full-time jobs. Altogether, the small scale operators contributed 18 million days of work to non-farm industries in 1966. The earnings received are not known but even at moderate wages (say $15 a day) an additional $270 million income could be added to the $460 million that small farmers derived from sales of agricultural products. Obviously off-farm earnings put many small farm families above the poverty line. The question is, how many? The following calculations in Table 1 supply an approximate answer:

- Net income from farming (average for each of five census sales categories) is subtracted from the $3,000 poverty line. The difference called "income deficiency"—indicates the amount of non-farm income needed to put the family over the line;
- “Income deficiency” is converted into “days of work” needed, assuming an average wage of $15 a day;
- the number of small-farm operators reporting that much work or more in the 1966 Census is then simply listed. The last column contains those reporting no off-farm work or not enough.

¹ Enough, that is to produce net incomes of $3,000.

¹⁷ From J. M. Fitzpatrick and C. V. Parker, “Distribution of Income in Canadian Agriculture,” Canadian Journal of Agricultural Economics, 1965. Although the relationship between net and gross was calculated from the 1958 survey data, the fact that D.B.S. aggregates for net and gross showed precisely the same relationship in 1966 (net income = 45 per cent of cash receipts in both years) seems to mean that approximately the same net income should apply in 1966 for the several sales categories. For greater detail on the points covered here and below, see the Task Force Position Paper cited in footnote 16.

One limitation of the estimate is the assumption that off-farm work of any kind returns the same income of $15 per day. In fact, there are substantial variations. In low-income rural areas where dual employment takes the form of small-scale farming combined with fishing, forestry or casual labour, non-farm earnings are also low and rural wages tend to lag behind urban standards. Elsewhere, however, many of the part-time farmers are better trained and commute to jobs in factories, mines or operate road maintenance and construction equipment for relatively high wages.

The method used above is crude, admittedly but it is not without supporting evidence. By linking a sample of farm operators from the Census of Agriculture and the Census of Population for the Census year 1961, D.B.S. has data presenting actual off-farm wages and salaries by farm operators. Adding wages and salaries to net farm income by sales categories produces a second calculation of numbers over and under $3,000 income (farm and non-farm combined) and one which inspires more confidence than estimates based on the number of days worked. Nevertheless, the two methods produce strikingly similar results for 1961: 16 per cent of all small-scale farmers are moved over the poverty-line by virtue of "enough days" compared to 13 per cent reporting enough wages and salaries. The latter can be raised to allow for income from self-employment; if we add those reporting self-employment income from non-primary industries, the second estimate is moved to within one percentage of the first.

The "days of work" method followed in Table 1 produces reasonably satisfactory estimates for 1966. It is apparent the majority of small-farm operators cannot be removed from the poverty category on the basis of their off-farm earnings. Although the amount of off-farm income is large in the aggregate, when added to farm income it still leaves two-thirds of all small farms below the poverty level of $3,000. Thus in 1966 there were 170,000 small-scale farmers who earned less than $3,000 from farming and other employment combined.

These men were truly "low-income farmers", yet not necessarily heads of "poor" families. Still further qualifications are in order. Firstly, family size as well as financial responsibilities generally decline with age and therefore certain elderly operators could be reasonably well off with less than $5,000 gross sales. Secondly, a variety of supplementary income sources are available over and above the operators' earnings from employment; these include earnings of other family members, pensions, rents, dividends and interest, family allowances, welfare assistance. Rough calculations from 1961 Census data suggest that "other sources" (including pensions received by the elderly) might remove as many families from the poverty category as were removed by the operator's earnings. In round numbers this results in a figure of approximately 100,000 farm families comprising the poverty sector.

CONCLUSIONS

There seems to be three categories of farms. First, there are the large farmers with substantial incomes; these are the people who receive most benefit from research, extension, price subsidies and similar programs. Second, there are those farmers whose incomes are not large but who are not below the poverty line. Among these are some large farmers whose operations are not very rewarding, some small part-time farmers with considerable non-farm income and some of the more successful full-time small farmers. Third, there are the very poor—those whose income from all sources falls below $3,000 per family per year. Most of these are small-scale farmers; some are part-time but their off-farm income is small.

Of these three groups, the first is not considered in this chapter but is given a prominent place in all other chapter of this Report. The second is being assisted to a considerable extent under ARDA programs such as land consolidation, drainage improvement and other resource oriented activities. This is desirable, because without assistance many of this group could slip into the poverty category. The third group—the really poor—have been largely missed by programs up to this point with the exception of those in the FRED areas. For those in this group who are above 45-50 years, with few alternative skills, the best programs are probably those which keep them on the farm, help them make some minor improvements, provide income supplements and encourage their children to higher levels of education and to broader perspectives.

There appears to be about 100,000 farm families living in poverty in Canada even after non-farm income has been added to farm income. Only about one-third of the heads of these families are under 45 years of age—the more mobile age group. For many of the remainder it would be difficult indeed to shift to new locations and to new occupations.

Policies followed have been of three types: a Man-power program to move men out of agriculture and into urban jobs; a program of industry dispersion to make more jobs available in outlying areas and smaller centres; and finally, a number of rural-oriented programs under FRED and farm-oriented programs under ARDA ranging all the way from single farm adjustment to comprehensive area planning intended to bring about basic structural changes in regions and communities. All three approaches are desirable.

The first and second are primarily appropriate for younger people, the third for older people. More specifically, ARDA programs have been more relevant to the "middle stratum" of farmers—not well-off yet not poverty-stricken—rather than to the 100,000 or more poverty level farm families. Programs to strengthen the middle sector are desirable, certainly but the Task Force disagrees with the view that farm programs can only be directed to the nearly-viable and that all below this line are problems for the Manpower program—or for welfare. The programs which are supposed to take men out of agriculture are not going to remove the poor in large numbers. When these programs are evaluated realistically, it is obvious Canada has little to offer hard-core farm poor in most parts of the country.

Other than the welfare programs (which appear to fall short of urban standards and certainly suffer from comparisons with welfare programs in other countries) and some promising beginnings under FRED, the lowest-third in agriculture lies almost beyond the reach of present policies. Conversely, public policy must not be directed exclusively at the poor. It would be a tragedy to neglect those who are "moderately well-off" lest they become the poor of the 1970's. Nevertheless, it does appear that it is the poor who are not being adequately served by present policies.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. Strengthen the Manpower Services Available to Farmers.—Fortunately the naïve laissez-faire position concerning low-income farmers "If they cannot make a good income in farming, let them do something else" has become discredited. It is in the national interest to help at least some of them become capable of doing something else and to help the remainder avoid living in poverty and indignity. Specific proposals to assist low-income farmers include:

(a) The creation of 10 mobile clinics in 1970-1971 in order to improve the "reach" of the Manpower program by taking to rural people the services which are now concentrated in urban centres. The mobile clinics are useful in several ways. They provide information on jobs, training opportunities and urban housing and access to a full range of counselling services both in rural communities and (for those who move) in receiving centres. The mobile clinics should also call at rural schools in order to discuss careers and point out the relevance of mathematics, English and other subjects to the jobs of the 1970's and 1980's. It cannot be stressed too often that with a working life of 45 years, a young man of 18 can condemn himself to poverty by not devoting a few more years in improving his qualifications as a worker. Mobile clinics need not be large; they might cost $100,000 each per year.

(b) The creation of small offices in major cities to help those who move to find housing, to be aware of social services available and to solve family problems arising out of the move from rural areas into major urban centres. Close co-ordination will be required between the mobile clinics and the existing Manpower centres on the one hand and the proposed major city offices on the other.

2. Higher Levels of Employment.—The extension of training and mobility services also presupposes that jobs are available somewhere. Merely to increase the number of rural clients will do little good if unemployment rates are high in cities. Policies which can create new employment opportunities are absolutely fundamental to war on poverty. Canada's record toward achieving the goal of full employment since 1954 has been poor; only in 3 years (1956, 1965, 1966) has less than 4 per cent of the labour force been unemployed. This poor employment record makes the 55 per cent decline in the farm labour force between 1946 and 1968 all the more remarkable.

3. Improved Education.—Although educational disparities between farm and city and among regions are not new, what is new is that unskilled labour—the traditional route out of agriculture—confronts a declining demand. The changing nature of labour force demand requires higher levels of education among rural people.

The alternative is to continue to suffer the ill-effects of an indigestible surplus of under-educated and inadequately trained, both in urban centres and trapped on the farm. While it is essential to distinguish between formal education arising from the municipal-provincial school system and skill training provided by Manpower, both are necessary to meet the problems of poverty. While all provinces are making efforts to improve rural education, it is doubtful if the poorer provinces can spend enough to help. Even the wealthier provinces are disinclined to commit resources on the necessary scale. The need is not merely for larger school units or higher salaries but for whatever it takes to raise aspirations and make rural students more nearly competitive in the labour market. This accounts for the proposal to create mobile Manpower clinics which would visit schools in order to discuss careers and education.

4. Welfare and Social Services.—Except for programs with universal coverage such as family allowances and old age security, present welfare services tend to serve the farm population much less well than city people. Unemployment insurance, for example, does not apply to farmers; health services are mostly poorer and disability allowances harder to obtain; many families live on provincial or municipal welfare at bare subsistence levels and in many districts the welfare budget is not adequate to cover all families in need. Because of feelings of independence or lack of knowledge of what is available, low-income farmers receive much less welfare assistance than low-income city folk. A Saskatchewan economist states that his province has 15,000 to 20,000 low-income farmers but less than two dozen on welfare. To ensure that welfare, health and other social services are actually made available to rural poor, the Task Force suggests welfare officers be designated in each county or equivalent in order to indicate the services available. The direct result of this proposal is increased welfare payments.

5. Guaranteed Annual Income Plan.—A variation of the guaranteed annual income plan is the negative income tax scheme proposed in the United States. The negative income tax would eliminate many existing welfare schemes. Under one system suggested all individuals and families whose incomes are too low to pay income taxes would receive a payment amounting to one-half of their unused exemptions and deductions from the Treasury. Variations on this basic proposal have become fairly common. "Schemes of this sort provide and confine income transfers to households which really need economic assistance; condition payments solely on the basis of family income and family size, thus achieving a degree of equity in the treatment of low-income households not achieved by existing income transfer programs; are more neutral with respect to resource allocation, might stimulate incentives to work".¹⁸ The incentive to work is built into the negative income tax plan through a rate structure which assures that no individual or family could be financially better off by avoiding employment.

A negative income tax program would embrace all sectors of the economy and not just agriculture and must be considered in that context. A universal system has several advantages but does not necessarily mean more help for poor people than could be had from filling the gaps in present services. It is not necessary, therefore, to await the results of studies now in process which may or may not lead to the implementation of the negative income tax; the important thing is to improve services and increase coverage in rural areas, immediately and until such time as a better system is devised.

6. Small Changes for Older Farmers.—There are many older farm people for whom mobility to other locations and occupations is undesirable. The Task Force is of the opinion that in the interests of dignity and self-respect for the individual, it is desirable to keep the welfare sector as small as possible and that the naive view that they "ought to do something else" is untenable. It may be quite inefficient to provide retraining and moving expenses and incur all the personal and social problems involved, for a few years of higher wage employment. All things considered—the poor prospects for other employment, the importance of pride and independence and the fact that whatever skills and experience these men possess are as farmers—it may often be the "best solution" to seek small improvements in farm income.

It is plainly not feasible to raise every submarginal farm to commercial status, nor is it advisable to attempt too much improvement—for example, to encourage large and costly additions to acreage, where management is weak and the life expectancy of the farm unit perhaps no more than 10 or 15 years. Certain types of improvements involve costs that are high relative to the benefits which can reasonably be anticipated, as ARDA has shown. The technique should be to provide assistance which can bring about small changes, perhaps a change in the crop pattern or a little added land; improvements in organization leading to lower costs—minor improvements which would provide a small boost to incomes (a few hundred dollars, on the average) but requiring no large investment outlays. This policy is an exception, it is one that includes transitional programs for older farmers only. Guarantees must be set up to ensure younger farmers are and remain excluded from these special efforts.

The major input required from governments is the supply of advisory services. The Task Force envisages: extension workers specially trained to deal with the lower levels of farming; to provide advice and encouragement on an individual farm basis and short-courses in the community, tailored to the needs of farmers not reached by existing programs. A few tentative steps along these lines have been taken in certain provinces (for example, in the FRED plan for eastern Quebec). Wider application raises at once the problem of availability of staff but it appears that the job does not have to be done by professionals. Alberta has used district farmers for advisory tasks in the Edson district; a spokesman for Manitoba's Department of Agriculture claims one of their most successful programs has been short courses given in local districts using "diploma course" graduates. The latter, it is felt, make better connections with small farmers than highly trained university graduates. The experience in eastern Ontario has been successful by operating on the same basis.

A major advantage of the above approach is that for the first time there would be staff with the responsibility for ensuring that programs do get to poor farmers who would be best off remaining as farmers.

7. Community Approaches.—Since net farm income is now only 5 per cent of national income, the Canadian economy can tolerate some inefficiency in the form of small-scale farmers. What cannot be tolerated is the bringing up of succeeding generations who are grossly handicapped for anything but a diminishing number of low-skill jobs. While young adults are leaving the rural areas in large numbers, it cannot be assumed that all are successfully absorbed in the urban labour force.¹⁹ Because educational standards are low, the presumption is that many secure a precarious foothold and that many come back.

The measures proposed above will assist farm families but not the communities where so many of these families live. "Terminal" aid for small farmers and enlarged welfare programs can hardly supply the tax base for radical improvements in education and other community services, yet such improvements are essential to improve the chances for the children of rural poor. Measures to encourage out-migration, though desirable, intensify the problems of poor communities in that they remove customers of village merchants, lower the basis groups. These are the reasons why effective programs for rural poverty must include a community as well as an individual approach.²⁰

Comprehensive planning of the FRED type offers a number of promising leads; money for schools and roads; counselling services to acquaint people with alternatives; closing out of settlement in areas with no potential; strenuous efforts to increase employment in selected growth centres. This is a start but only a start—so long as comprehensive planning is confined to a few FRED areas in eastern provinces and an even smaller number of special development areas under ARDA. After all, the poorer districts in Ontario development areas under ARDA. After all, the poorer districts in Ontario and the Prairies contain three times as many low-income farms as the whole of the Maritimes.

While not suggesting that FRED be extended to all rural areas containing poverty, the fact is several key programs which account for much FRED expenditure are already operational—Manpower mobility; incentive grants; in some cases, land consolidation. Outside the FRED areas these programs operate without a framework of research and planning to indicate what the long run goals for the community should be and without community participation in selecting goals and means. Co-ordination of efforts among programs is likely to be minimal, and the response from people who do not understand or approve the programs may leave something to be desired. There must be increased co-operation and co-ordination among programs and government institutions in areas not covered by FRED.

8. Publication of Research.—ARDA has spent considerable sums on research concerning community needs and development possibilities but apart from a few reports, most of the research work has not been published and is unavailable. This is a mistake.

9. Special Rehabilitation Programs.—Because all people are not capable of rapid absorption into the ¹⁹ A recent survey of several parishes in the Gaspé and rural New Brunswick reported that only three of every ten offspring of rural families have moved to an urban place. "Given the large-sized families this means a high retention of offspring from such families in rural areas". Jane Abramson, Barriers to Population Mobility, op. cit.

labour force, there must be provision in a few areas for special longer programs for those younger people who fail to meet the requirements of general and vocational training programs.

LOW-INCOME SECTOR

Chapter 16: The Low-Income Sector

1. Strengthen the Manpower Services Available to Farmers.—Fortunately the naive laissez faire position concerning low-income farmers “If they cannot make a good income in farming, let them do something else” has become discredited. It is in the national interest to help at least some of them become capable of doing something else and to help the remainder avoid living in poverty and indignity. Specific proposals to assist low-income farmers include:

(a) The creation of 10 mobile clinics in 1970-1971 in order to improve the “reach” of the Manpower program by taking to rural people the services which are now concentrated in urban centres. The mobile clinics are useful in several ways. They provide information on jobs, training opportunities and urban housing and access to a full range of counselling services both in rural communities and (for those who move) in receiving centres. The mobile clinics should also call at rural schools in order to discuss careers and point out the relevance of mathematics, language and other subjects to the jobs of the 1970’s and 1980’s. It cannot be stressed too often that with a working life of 45 years, a young man of 18 can condemn himself to poverty by not devoting a few more years to improving his qualifications as a worker. Mobile clinics need not be large: they might cost $100,000 each per year.

(b) The creation of small offices in major cities to help those who move to find housing, to be aware of social services available and to solve family problems arising out of the move from rural areas into major urban centres. Close co-ordination will be required between the mobile clinics and the existing Manpower centres on the one hand and the proposed major city offices on the other.

2. Higher Levels of Employment.—The extension of training and mobility services also presupposes that jobs are available somewhere. Merely to increase the number of rural clients will do little good if unemployment rates are high in cities. Policies which can create new employment opportunities are absolutely fundamental to war on poverty. Canada’s record toward achieving the goal of full employment since 1954 has been poor; only in 3 years (1956, 1965, 1966) has less than 4 per cent of the labour force been unemployed. This poor employment record makes the 55 per cent decline in the farm labour force between 1946 and 1968 all the more remarkable.

3. Improved Education.—Although educational disparities between farm and city and among regions are not new, what is new is that unskilled labour—the traditional route out of agriculture—confronts a declining demand. The changing nature of labour force demand requires higher levels of education among rural people.

The alternative is to continue to suffer the ill-effects of an indigestible surplus of under-educated and inadequately trained, both in urban centres and trapped on the farm. While it is essential to distinguish between formal education arising from the municipal-provincial school system and skill training provided by Manpower, both are necessary to meet the problems of poverty. While all provinces are making efforts to improve rural education, it is doubtful if the poorer provinces can spend enough to help. Even the wealthier provinces are disinclined to commit resources on the necessary scale. The need is not merely for larger school units or higher salaries but for whatever it takes to raise aspirations and make rural students more nearly competitive in the labour market. This accounts for the proposal to create mobile Manpower clinics which would visit schools in order to discuss careers and education.

4. Welfare and Social Services.—Except for programs with universal coverage such as family allowances and old age security, present welfare services tend to serve the farm population much less well than city people. Unemployment insurance, for example, does not apply to farmers; health services are mostly poorer and disability allowances harder to obtain; many families live on provincial or municipal welfare at bare subsistence levels and in many districts the welfare budget is not adequate to cover all families in need. Because of feelings of independence or lack of knowledge of what is available, low-income farmers receive much less welfare assistance than low-income city folk. A Saskatchewan economist states that his province has 15,000 to 20,000 low-income farmers but less than two dozen on welfare. To ensure that welfare, health and other social services are actually made available to rural poor, the Task Force suggests welfare officers be designated in each county or equivalent in order to indicate the services available.

The direct result of this proposal is increased welfare payments.

5. Guaranteed Annual Plan.—A variation of the guaranteed annual income plan is the negative income tax scheme proposed in the United States. The negative income tax would eliminate many existing welfare schemes. Under one system suggested all individuals and families whose incomes are too low to pay income taxes would receive a payment amounting to one-half of their unused exemptions and deductions from the Treasury. Variations on this basic proposal have become fairly common. "Schemes of this sort provide and confine income transfers to households which really need economic assistance; condition payments solely on the basis of family income and family size, thus achieving a degree of equity in the treatment of low-income households not achieved by existing income transfer programs; are more neutral with respect to resource allocation, might stimulate incentives to work".²¹ The incentive to work is built into the negative income tax plan through a rate structure which assures that no individual or family could be financially better off by avoiding employment.

A negative income tax program would embrace all sectors of the economy and not just agriculture and must be considered in that context. A universal system has several advantages but does not necessarily mean more help for poor people than could be had from filling the gaps in present services. It is not necessary, therefore, to await the results of studies now in process which may or may not lead to the implementation of the negative income tax; the important thing is to improve services and increase coverage in rural areas, immediately and until such time as a better system is devised.

6. Small Changes for Older Farmers.—There are many older farm people for whom mobility to other locations and occupations is undesirable. The Task Force is of the opinion that in the interests of dignity and self-respect for the individual, it is desirable to keep the welfare sector as small as possible and that the naive view that they "ought to do something else" is untenable. It may be quite inefficient to provide retraining and moving expenses and incur all the personal and social problems involved, for a few years of higher wage employment. All things considered—the poor prospects for other employment, the importance of pride and independence and the fact that whatever skills and experience these men possess are as farmers—it may often be the "best solution" to seek small improvements in farm income.

It is plainly not feasible to raise every submarginal farm to commercial status, nor is it advisable to attempt too much improvement—for example, to encourage large and costly additions to acreage, where management is weak and the life expectancy of the farm unit perhaps no more than 10 or 15 years. Certain types of improvements involve costs that are high relative to the benefits which can reasonably be anticipated, as ARDA has shown. The technique should be to provide assistance which can bring about small changes, perhaps a change in the crop pattern or a little added land; improvements in organization leading to lower costs—minor improvements which would provide a small boost to incomes (a few hundred dollars, on the average) but requiring no large investment outlays. This policy is an exception, it is one that includes transitional programs for older farmers only. Guarantees must be set up to ensure younger farmers are and remain excluded from these special efforts.

The major input required from governments is the supply of advisory services. The Task Force envisages: extension workers specially trained to deal with the lower levels of farming; to provide advice and encouragement on an individual farm basis and short-courses in the community, tailored to the needs of farmers not reached by existing programs. A few tentative steps along these lines have been taken in certain provinces (for example, in the FRED plan for eastern Quebec). Wider application raises at once the problem of availability of staff but it appears that the job does not have to be done by professionals. Alberta has used district farmers for advisory tasks in the Edson district; a spokesman for Manitoba's Department of Agriculture claims one of their most successful programs has been short courses given in local districts using "diploma course" graduates. The latter, it is felt, make better connections with small farmers than highly trained university graduates. The experience in eastern Ontario has been successful by operating on the same basis.

A major advantage of the above approach is that for the first time there would be staff with the responsibility for ensuring that programs do get to poor farmers who would be best off remaining as farmers.

7. Community Approaches.—Since net farm income is now only 5 per cent of national income, the ²¹ Christopher Green in Conference Report, Canadian Tax Foundation, 1967.

Canadian economy can tolerate some inefficiency in the form of small-scale farmers. What cannot be tolerated is the bringing up of succeeding generations who are grossly handicapped for anything but a diminishing number of low-skill jobs. While young adults are leaving the rural areas in large numbers, it cannot be assumed that all are successfully absorbed in the urban labour force.²² Because educational standards are low, the presumption is that many secure a precarious foothold and that many come back.

The measures proposed above will assist farm families but not the communities where so many of these families live. "Terminal" aid for small farmers and enlarged welfare programs can hardly supply the tax base for radical improvements in education and other community services, yet such improvements are essential to improve the chances for the children of rural poor. Measures to encourage out-migration, though desirable, intensify the problems of poor communities in that they remove customers of village merchants, and lower the basis groups. These are the reasons why effective programs for rural poverty must include a community as well as an individual approach.²³

Comprehensive planning of the FRED type offers a number of promising leads; money for schools and roads; counselling services to acquaint people with alternatives; closing out of settlement in areas with no potential; strenuous efforts to increase employment in selected growth centres. This is a start but only a start—so long as comprehensive planning is confined to a few FRED areas in eastern provinces and an even smaller number of special development areas under ARDA. After all, the poorer districts in Ontario and the Prairies contain three times as many low-income farms as the whole of the Maritimes.

While not suggesting that FRED be extended to all rural areas containing poverty, the fact is several key programs which account for much FRED expenditure are already operational—Manpower mobility; incentive grants; in some cases, land consolidation. Outside the FRED areas these programs operate without a framework of research and planning to indicate what the long run goals for the community should be and without community participation in selecting goals and means. Co-ordination of efforts among programs is likely to be minimal, and the response from people who do not understand or approve the programs may leave something to be desired. There must be increased co-operation and co-ordination among programs and government institutions in areas not covered by FRED.

8. Publication of Research—ARDA has spent considerable sums on research concerning community needs and development possibilities but apart from a few reports, most of the research work has not been published and is unavailable. This is a mistake.

9. Special Rehabilitation Programs—Because all people are not capable of rapid absorption into the labour force, there must be provision in a few areas for special longer programs for those younger people who fail to meet the requirements of general and vocational training programs.

The analysis and recommendations of the Federal Task Force on Agriculture, as contained in this Report, are respectfully submitted for your consideration.

²² A recent survey of several parishes in the Gaspé and rural New Brunswick reported that only three of every ten offspring of rural families have moved to an urban place. "Given the large-sized families this means a high retention of offspring from such families in rural areas". Jame Abramson, Barriers to Population Mobility, *op. cit.*²³

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Monday, May 25, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: I call the meeting to order. Tomorrow we will have the brief of the Province of New Brunswick. Their brief was sent by air express and was mislaid in transit. It was finally located late last night and copies will be distributed to members of the committee during the day so that you will have an opportunity to read the brief before tomorrow.

The representatives of the Province of Ontario are headed by the Hon. John Yaremko. Mr. Borczak, the Deputy Minister, is sitting next to Mr. Yaremko. Also present are Miss Crittenden, Assistant Deputy Minister, Mr. Groom, Executive Director, Social Development Services Branch, Mrs. E. Etchen, Director, Planning and Research Branch, and Mr. Heagle, Projects Co-ordinator, Planning and Research Branch.

The curriculum vitae of the Minister, Deputy Minister and Miss Crittenden will appear in the record.

I will ask the Minister to make a statement to you before we commence questions.

Hon. John Yaremko, Minister of Social and Family Services, Province of Ontario: Thank you, Senator Croll. May I make two remarks before discussing the body of the presentation.

First of all, I should like to extend my congratulations to you, sir, on the award made to you by the Geriatrics Society in recognition of your contribution within that field. This relates somewhat to your personal contribution not only nationally but within the Province of Ontario in particular.

My second reference is to the fact that I was reminded in reading your curriculum vitae with reference to the award that during the period 1951 to 1955 you and I shared some 30,000 constituents in common. The members of your committee will be interested to know that the great provincial riding of Bellwoods was half in the great federal riding of Spadina, the other half being in the great riding of Trinity. I am sorry that Senator Roebuck, who has long been known to me, is not with us because of ill health.

Those are two personal reasons, senator, why I am delighted to be here.

Before we get into the specifics of the brief being presented today, I should like to highlight some of the issues that underly the relationship between poverty, measures for income redistribution in general, social assistance and social service programs. There is an enormous number of programs in this field operated by three levels of government, in the case of Ontario of major proportions. Huge and growing amounts of public money are being spent on social assistance and social services. In Ontario, provincial per capita expenditures on these programs have increased 300 per cent in the last ten years, and if you will look at Table 6 on page 13 later you will see that the gross provincial expenditures on these programs are almost four times as great—from $68 million to some $242 million as of 1968-1969.

Although we have become increasingly concerned by the fact that poverty continues to exist amid general prosperity, do we have a national consensus concerning the direction in which we should be proceeding? Have we a concept of our national goals? Have we really understood, have we delineated what the essential problem is all about?

In the income maintenance field, many significant programs are operated by the federal Government, including family and youth allowances, old age security and unemployment insurance. At the provincial level we have general long-term social assistance programs for single mothers with dependent children who are unemployed, and some aged persons not covered by federal programs. Short-term assistance is provided to certain labour force participants who are unemployed.

The emerging issue is how our own long range objectives and those of the federal Government can be co-ordinated. There is at present no mechanism whereby both governments can analyse the interactions between their respective programs and arrive at mutually accepted goals. In our brief we discuss, for example, this problem in relationship to the unemployment insurance program. There will be a White Paper introduced next month in the federal House of Commons. However, there has been little opportunity to review the interaction of unemployment insurance and short term social assistance.

In the larger aspect of which future direction we should take in the social assistance field, there is now a wide ranging debate in the press, and in academic and, as we are doing here, in governmental circles. We should look at the enormous number of programs presently being operated and financed by federal, provincial and municipal governments, and try to co-ordinate effective use of what we have already developed. We should ask ourselves whether or not these programs should be extended to include additional persons. What is the current situation vis-à-vis programs developed in the 1940s, such as family allowances? Are the social goals of that period still relevant today? Are these programs still effective income maintenance measures in today's society? From our brief you will note that we think these programs should be re-examined, re-evaluated and co-ordinated in more effective and meaningful measures.

The subject of a guaranteed annual income has been widely discussed, and many schemes have been aired publicly. Some argue that all of our present programs should be scrapped, while others contend that the guaranteed income should be superimposed on what exists now. We must consider future developments carefully in the social assistance field. It appears to us that with more appropriate mechanisms for consultation we could expand and improve our present social assistance structure. The fundamental problem as we see it is co-ordination of objectives and long range goals between the federal and provincial levels of government. Co-operation could be improved if more formal machinery were developed to ensure that prior consultation takes place before major changes and social assistance and social programs are made effective by either level of government.

Generally, then, we see income maintenance as a continuing federal, provincial and municipal responsibility, and social services being developed as a local responsibility, with alterations in the pattern of financing. We see the same needs and possibilities for extension of programs as have been identified by many groups appearing before this committee.

For the working poor, we acknowledge a priority area for developing provision for some form of assistance programs. In our brief we explain fully some of the problems inherent in the application of present programs for the working poor, and explain why we seek the full implication of any new directions. It is essential that the vexatious problems caused by inter-relationship with the income tax system be resolved before we embark on wage supplements. If we are to consider a guaranteed income scheme for labour force participants, it must be harmonized with a positive tax scheme; it must be developed to meet the specific needs of labour force participants.

Manpower and employment must also be considered when a guaranteed income program is developed. Programs of present manpower centres have not been geared to reach out and contact low wage earners in their homes or at work. There must be more immediate contact, and more meaningful counselling services must be made available.

We do not have current data on income and earnings in Canada. Income tax data and information from the old age security system, family allowances and unemployment insurance and other programs need to be put together for family units so that policy planners can assess the impact of alternative schemes, evaluate present programs and plan new ones.

At various federal-provincial conferences Ontario has explored the necessity to harmonize tax structures between the two levels of government. In addition, there seems to be an increasing necessity to integrate to some degree the taxation and social assistance structures so that a more effective income redistribution mechanism may be evolved.

It appears that a national consensus has not yet been reached on future developments in the social assistance field. This is a time for study, for setting up the machinery, for planning and co-ordinating, and for consulting together. White papers setting out future courses of action in unemployment insurance and in social assistance are expected next month, and the White Paper on taxation is currently being analyzed. All of these will have a profound effective on income distribution patterns, if implemented. All will have profound implications for provincial programs. They should not be implemented without due regard to each other.

We should review the alternatives that are open to us. What responsibilities should remain with the provinces? Should the federal Government assume a greater role in income redistribution? Which government should deliver services? How are we going to finance income redistribution programs and social service programs? What is the appropriate balance between regional needs and priorities and national levels of services?

At the December Constitutional Conference on Social Security and the distribution of power, the Prime Minister of Ontario put forth the basic principles which might be followed as we search for answers to these problems. He stressed the necessity to keep the relationship between people and governments as close as possible, and said that the level of government nearest the people should provide as many services as can reasonably be performed by it. This would involve most social services being handled locally.

At a more impersonal level, the main role of the federal Government might be in the redistribution of income, or the provision of an income floor to certain categories of Canadians. The floor should be such that provincial and local governments should:

... have ample opportunity to add to such a floor so that they could express the peculiar needs, characteristics, social philosophies and levels of expectation of different regions.

Let us review some of the steps on the road ahead. First, we must devise better measures of what poverty is so that we may find out exactly what the situation is really like, how many people are in that so defined poor, and what the degree of income gaps is in Canada? Next, we must set up organizations to achieve better co-ordination of social policies, to plan and integrate present programs, modified programs and new programs across a wide range of fields, including social welfare, regional development, housing and others.

Some programs are likely to be more effective than others, and therefore they should be evaluated as an integrated package. Basic decisions will involve goals, both social and economic, the most appropriate blend of programs, the respective responsibilities for administration of programs and the financial arrangements amongst three levels of government. We should not overlook the impact of taxation on low income groups. This involves close co-operation between federal and provincial governments so that the tax structure may be harmonized and priorities co-ordinated. New programs are not necessarily the answer to our basic problems. However, it seems, as the economic council says:

Various kinds of inter-governmental arrangement are conceivable. Whatever arrangement is adopted should be one eliciting the support of all levels of government whose co-operation will be absolutely essential in the supply of information and many other respects.

We believe there is great merit in the provinces undertaking jointly with the federal Government a critical examination of our income maintenance programs and theirs so that we may develop effective integrated approaches to the problem of poverty with each level of government accepting the responsibilities assigned to it, and with appropriate arrangements for finance being worked out together.

Mr. Senator, what a challenge to the people of Canada to harness their experience, talents and resources with which we are so greatly blessed and to come to grips within the limits of human ability with this task that this nation may be a place where each may find his place in the sun. Thank you.

Senator Carter: Mr. Yaremko, you tell us on page 13 that your gross expenditures for 1968-69 are $242 million. What is the total provincial budget.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The total provincial budget of that year was between $2 billion and $2.8 billion.

Senator Carter: Approximately $2.8 billion. How much of this $242 million is paid out on income maintenance.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: About $160 million.

Senator Carter: How much would you recover from the federal Government of your $242 million?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We will have to speak in round figures, but it would be somewhat over a $100 million.

Senator Carter: When you disburse income maintenance how do you define need? I presume most of your payments are made under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The bulk are.

Senator Carter: And the Canada Assistance Plan requires these payments to be made on a basis of need.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes. Our definition follows fairly closely the definition in the Canada Assistance Plan, in the act itself and in the agreement. I think we have pretty well taken it almost word for word.

Senator Carter: I would like to hear the definition of need in the Canada Assistance Plan.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The Canada Assistance Plan says:

A person who, by reason of inability to obtain employment, loss of the provincial family provider, illness, disability, age or other cause of any kind acceptable to the provincial authority, is found to be unable (on the basis of a test established by the provincial authority that takes into account that person's budgetary requirements and the income and resources available to him to meet such requirements) to provide adequately for himself, or for himself and his dependents or any of them;

Senator Carter: That leaves it up to the province to apply the test.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The province develops the budgetary requirements.

Senator Carter: How do you go about doing that? Do you have a formula?

Mr. W. S. Groom, Executive Director, Social Development Services Branch, Province of Ontario: We review the individual circumstances, such as a person's assets, and we take the number and the ages of his family. This is done under our income maintenance program. We arrive at an amount for clothing, personal requirements, and, under family benefits, we add utilities. We add to that the amount for shelter and for fuel.

Senator Carter: I did not hear clearly your last few words.

Mr. Groom: We add to the amount that is in the table an amount for shelter up to a stated maximum in the regulations, and add a further amount for fuel. We look at the other side, which is the income side, and we apply, in the case of earnings, an exemption, and, an another income, certain exceptions such as family allowances comes to mind. This is deducted and the difference becomes the allowance. Once a person is eligible for allowance he is also eligible for pre-medical and hospital benefits.

Senator Carter: Before you had the Canada Assistance Plan how did you do it?

Mr. Groom: We had an income maintenance program that was tied to four programs which were federal-provincial sharing. These were the disabled persons' program, the blind persons' program, the old age assistance program, and the unemployment assistance program itself, which was a more general one.

Senator Carter: How would you assess the needs of an individual person?

Mr. Groom: I would describe our mothers' allowance program as closely related to what we now do, and also our general assistance program.

Senator Carter: What is the essential difference between the means test which applied prior to the Canada Assistance Plan and the needs test which is required by the Canada Assistance Plan? What is the essential difference as far as Ontario is concerned between these two, the means test on the one hand and the new needs test under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. M. Borczak, Deputy Minister, Department of Social and Family Services, Province of Ontario: The essential difference in respect of what we referred to as the categorical programs, the former programs of old age and blind assistance allowances, started off with a certain monthly payment paid to persons. This was a maximum amount of $75 per month. There was then added to that an additional $30 in the case of a single person with a flexibility of up to $30 without affecting the basic payment of $75. You would work with two figures and the maximum permissible per income per year added up to the $105 per month or $1,260 a year and the actual maximum payment to a person of $75.

I believe that the $75 was arrived at on the basis of past experience under the Old Age Pensions Act which had started in 1927 at the rate of $20 per month and gradually increased over a period of years to a point where the payment reached $75. So that when the federal Government introduced its new old age security plan, at the same time an old age assistance program was designed and was actually patterned after the former old age pensions program so that we simply lifted the basic approach under the old age security program into the new scheme which became the new national assistance program across Canada.

At that time we were operating a mother's allowance program on essentially the sort of approach we have now under this needs test approach. It had started out as a flat rate program just as the old age pensions had been, but we moved away from that into the needs test approach.

To tell you something of the difference between the two, the original program just started off with a flat amount which kept building up in a sort of historical pattern. Under the needs test approach the amount of payment that is provided attempts to meet certain identifiable requirements such as food, clothing and other needs, including shelter needs. So that our regulations are designed, then, to set out amounts for these various purposes and we have in the regulations the table which we call a "pre-added budget". This table attempts to provide within it adequate amounts for the essential requirements of food, clothing and personal needs. It takes into account the size of family, the number of adults in the family unit and the number of children, and it attempts to reflect the various needs of children in different categories. Thus, you will find we have three age groups of children, and that distinction is significant in that as a child actually advances from a younger age to an older age a higher allowance is built into the pre-added budget because of the change in the age of the child.

Therefore, added to the pre-added budget is, then, the actual amount for shelter up to certain maximums. This shelter may include, in the case of home ownership, full allowance for principal and interest payments and insurance costs. The actual total shelter costs are provided for up to certain maximums. In the case of quarters which are rented but unheated, there is a fuel allowance provided. In the case of home ownership a fuel allowance is provided also.

So the difference, then, is that in this case you have a building up of, through a series of amounts, an allowance which is designed initially to provide for all the basic needs. That, I think, is the essential difference between the two approaches.

Senator Carter: I am not sure that I absorbed all you tried to tell me there. I gather that under the means test you started off on a flat rate, patterned after the old age pension, of $75 a month, and you accepted that as adequate for two people. As the cost of living went up and other factors came into play you raised the limit. You finally arrived at a cut-off figure which you regarded as the means test. If the person was above that figure he did not qualify; if he was below, you would give him welfare to bring him up to that amount. Is that correct so far as the means test is concerned?

Mr. Borczak: Yes.

Senator Carter: Now, under the needs test I gather that you have tables for different sizes of families and tables for children of different age groups, and you have broken down their needs under different headings and put a monetary value on each of these, after which you add up these figures depending on how the family fits into the table and you arrive at the family's needs. Is that essentially what you do?

Mr. Borczak: Yes.

Senator Carter: In working out those tables do you have different tables for people living in rural areas and people living in urban areas?

Mr. Borczak: No, we do not. When you look at our table of allowances, a schedule of monthly pre-added budgets, you will see there that it is a standard that applies across Ontario. Our studies in this field, based on pricing food costs in locations throughout the province—and that is a procedure we follow on a fairly regular periodic basis—our studies in this field suggest to us that there is not really that much difference across Ontario, and that while there are very significant variations in the cost of certain foods there are other foods which are equally acceptable for purposes of providing nutritional needs of people, and that, by a careful arrangement of purchases here, the allowances can be left pretty well the same across Ontario. We have not found a significant difference here to make it worthwhile to attempt to have regional differences in these allowances.

The one variable that does reflect differences in living costs across Ontario is the one with respect to shelter. I mentioned earlier that we provide the actual shelter costs up to a certain maximum. We find that in many of the smaller centres, rural communities and small communities, the shelter costs are quite low—usually where a person owns his own home, and particularly when he has owned it for a good many years so that his ownership goes back before the high interest rates and so on. We find in those situations that the principal-interest payments are such that the total cost to them is provided within the allowance so that to that extent, where you find that the shelter costs are lower than they are in large urban centres, we are therefore reflecting the difference between regions. When you move to the large urban centres there is a bigger gap between the actual shelter costs and the amounts provided for.

Senator Carter: Did I understand you to say that you provide maintenance costs under the needs test? In other words, that, if a person owns his own home but needs to repair it, you would provide the cost of the repairs.

Mr. Borczak: That is right.

Senator Carter: If a person were a carpenter and could do his own repair work, if he were handy with tools, would he get the same allowance as a person who was not capable of doing his own work, or would he get a little less?

Mr. Borczak: The program is designed, actually, to get an evaluation of what the particular needs would cost, and if the person intended to do the work himself and indicated so, then all of the cost of the materials would be provided. We have two ways of providing assistance in the area of maintenance of property. There can be a flat amount provided under our regulations to write off the entire cost at once; or it can be built into the allowance on a monthly basis and included within the allowance over a period of time to defray the costs, depending on how the work is carried out.

Senator Carter: I am not sure I understand you. If a person had to hire somebody to do the work, he would get a little extra to hire that fellow. He would get more, in other words, than if he could do the work himself.

Mr. Borczak: Yes, because, if workmen's wages have to be paid for, this would be included in the allowance.

Senator Carter: Did I understand you to say that under this needs test you have an open-ended schedule with no limit to the size of family?

Mr. Borczak: We have an over-all maximum on the size of the allowance.

Senator Carter: Oh, you have a maximum.

Mr. Borczak: Yes.

Senator Carter: Where do you draw the line for your maximum?

Mr. Borczak: We have a maximum of $330 per month starting at a family of four. Then there is an additional amount of $15 per person per month beyond four in the family added to the maximum. So that if you have five persons the maximum amount is $345; if you have six persons the amount is $360; and so on. The amount increases progressively as the size of the family increases.

Senator Carter: But once the size of the family gets over four, the amount of money comes down to $15 a month for the fifth person. Is that it?

The Chairman: Yes, that is what he said.

Senator Carter: The fifth person has to live on $15 a month.

The person with a family of five gets $15 more than the person with a family of four. Is that right?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Not necessarily, but, if they were at the maximums, the maximum in the one case would be $15 more than the maximum in the other case.

Senator Carter: So you have a maximum for a family of five. I see. I thought you said your maximum was based on a family of four.

The Chairman: I understood him to say that the maximum was fixed for a family of four at $330. Then for any additional person in the family there is an extra $15 per month added, so that if it happens to be five persons in the family, it is $345, and if there are six persons in the family, it is $360.

Senator Carter: That is what I understood, but then I thought he said they did not say that.

The Chairman: No, the next question that led up to that was; if he does not receive the maximum, if he only receives three hundred, how much does the fifth person receive, I did not get the answer to that question.

Mr. Borczak: It is always based on the overall maximum so that one can have a case where one family of four living in a small community may be receiving $300 a month, while another family of four may be receiving $330 a month. Similarly, you may have a family receiving $330 a month, but another family of five may be receiving $345 a month. There is a considerable amount of variation in the amount the same family-sized unit would receive in allowances depending on where they live. Another element built into our allowances which actually reflects a certain amount of variation in living costs is the shelter allowances. If the shelter cost is low, it has the effect of lowering the payment made and if it is higher, it has the effect of increasing it.

Senator Carter: But I understood you to say you had pretty well the same schedules across Ontario and that there was not much difference by virtue of the different regions. Now you are saying there is some change. Are you saying the only change is with respect to shelter?

Mr. Borczak: That is correct. The fuel allowance provided in the regulations applies clear across Ontario with the exception that there is a difference or a division between northern Ontario and southern Ontario. However, having set aside that division, it is an amount that applies clear across the province, and while our regulations provide a table of fuel allowances, the regulation does provide that where the actual cost of fuel is greater than that set out in the table, an adjustment can be made to bring it up to the full amount. However, should a person's fuel expenses be less than what is provided in the table, then he keeps the full amount provided. You see, we have set a certain minimum standard of fuel allowance, and even if his cost should be considerably lower than the amount set out in the schedule, he still gets the standard amount.

The Chairman: But in the case of a winter like last winter the costs may well be higher. What do you do in a situation like that?

Mr. Borczak: We pay the full amount. The person is required to keep his receipts, and if he can demonstrate to us that the amount of fuel allowance was inadequate to meet his costs, a full adjustment can be made to him.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): What is calculated under the heading of fuel, oil or wood?

Mr. Borczak: The calculation set out in the table of allowances is based on the cost of hard coal—anthracite. We made a review of what the costs of heating might be in terms of hard coal, oil and natural gas, and we found that the most generous standard to use was hard coal. In fact the person may choose whatever form of heating he desires, and since our calculations were based on hard coal, the person who uses oil will, in effect, receive a more generous fuel allowance. Generally fuel oil is a little less expensive than hard coal in terms of the amount of heating output that it will provide.

Senator Carter: Well, I want to be quite clear on this; if you have two families, or if you have three families with each of the three families entirely dependent on welfare and with no other income, the first family will receive $330 a month, and the second family will receive $345. Then, a family of five. . .

Mr. Borczak: If they are all four-member families, the maximum any one will get would be $330. However, one family of four may receive $330 and another may receive $320 and a third may receive $300 a month. This variation in the shelter cost which I was mentioning can have this effect.

The Chairman: The maximum is $330. But then a family of five with no other income getting the maximum would get $345 and a family of six with no other income would get a maximum of $360. Is that correct?

Mr. Borczak: Yes.

Senator Carter: The result is that in these three cases, the extra person is living on $15 a month. In the second instance, the extra two people are living on $30. That does not square with my idea of the needs test which is required under the Canada Assistance Plan because I cannot see a needs test having a maximum ceiling. How can it if it is based on need? How does this square with the Canada Assistance Plan?

Mr. Borczak: We have developed in our brief some examples here of the relationship between the allowances for persons who are working full-time and not in receipt of assistance, and I suppose it is the effect of the allowances and the effect of the earning exemptions and so on that is the problem here in terms of how high the level of allowances may be; the higher they are, the greater becomes the difference between the person who is working full time on low wages and the person on public assistance, and in the brief we have attempted to demonstrate just how this begins to widen the gap between the two. That is to say that we find that the person on public assistance begins to be in a position of marked advantage over the person working full time at low wages. If our allowances were higher than they are at the present time by removing the maximum, this spread would become even greater than it is at present.

Senator Carter: In other words, such a person would be better off on welfare than he is working.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have rationalized the program within the whole social structure as it exists within the province at the present time.

The Chairman: This is a new element that we have not had brought to the attention of the committee before. The other groups have come in and said "we are poverty-stricken and we cannot pay any more than we are paying." This is a new element coming in and a very important one from our point of view. The deputy minister is saying in effect—"we measure of needs best on the basis of what the minimum wage is in the Province of Ontario." Let us accept it as the minimum wage in Ontario so as not to conflict in any way between those who are working full time and those who are on welfare. Now, that is a new measurement that comes to us, I think you ought to take some time to explore it so that we may be clear on its implications. If I have not stated that correctly, Mr. Borczak, then you can correct me.

Mr. Borczak: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I would not want to leave the impression we have geared our allowance to the minimum wage. We have not done that. We developed these allowances quite independently of the minimum wage, but when one examines the allowances and compares them with the wage patterns of the low-income group this is the sort of picture that emerges, that many of the people on public assistance are, in effect, better off than persons working at low wages, and not necessarily at minimum wages. If you get into the size of family, there are persons who are earning considerably above the minimum wage that exists in Ontario at the present time, and yet the amount of their earnings is such that they are literally no better off than if they were on public assistance, and they are above the minimum wage.

Senator Carter: Yes, but I do not see where the minimum wage enters into it. Are you accepting that the minimum wage is adequate?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, you are quite right, the minimum wage is unrelated. If you examine our table, Senator Carter, you will find that our basic provisions in Ontario regarding allowances under family benefits and the general welfare assistance are extremely generous. They are extremely generous. If you took one of your families of five and added up all the benefits that they have at the end of the year and translate them into dollars that somebody else would have earned to provide his family with that amount, you will find they are extremely generous. This is why in Ontario the problem, the big challenge for us now is—and we devote a good deal of the brief to this—with respect to the working poor, the people who are gainfully employed, especially those with large families, on a year-round basis at wages which could be well above the minimum wages, and who still do not attain, in some circumstances, what they would if they were on one of the provincial allowances.

Senator Carter: You are still making comparisons there between what a person earns and what he needs on welfare.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No.

Senator Carter: You ended up with that, I thought that is what you ended up with, that kind of comparison.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is one of the problems and one of the facets. I think you were indicating that because we had a so-called maximum perhaps the allowances fell short of what they should be. When you start off with a fairly generous basic provision, then it does not necessarily follow that from there on the steps upward have to be graded exactly the same.

Mr. Borczak: Mr. Chairman, perhaps to clarify this, I wonder if I might refer to page 41 of our brief, and then to page 42.

The Chairman: Yes, certainly, go ahead.

Mr. Borczak: In Table 9, page 41, we have attempted to show the relative position of a person who is on assistance and is receiving $300 a month for a family, or $3,600 a year, as compared with a person with the same family size whose earnings are $4,784 a year. I believe that is $2.30 an hour, which is well above our minimum wage.

As you can see from this, we have added to both columns the amount that each family received in family allowances, bringing the gross income for the working family to $5,000 and the gross income for the person on public assistance to $3,816.

Now, the person who is employed has the various deductions that we have shown in the left hand column, adding up to $979. These deductions are for Canada Pension Plan, income tax, unemployment insurance, premiums for hospital and medical schemes, and an estimate of $20 a month for work expenses.

When we subtract these expenses from the gross income, that family is left with $4,021 a year. The family on public assistance has none of these expenses to meet, since public assistance is not taxable and medical and hospital coverage is extended to families, so that the net cash income of that family on public assistance is $3,816, so there is approximately a $200 difference between the two.

Senator Carter: This does not mean anything to me until you tell me how big this working family is, and the social assistance family that gets the $3,816. How big is that family?

Mr. Borczak: That is a five-person family. Both examples are five-person families.

In the regulations we have a provision for certain exemptions on earnings, and we have added a new element on the next page, in Table 10. We are dealing again with the same five-person family in both cases. We have indicated the person on public assistance is working at part-time work and is earning $1,200 a year. So we add that to the social assistance payments, which without employment amounted to $3,600. But now, because of the rule on earnings exemptions, the $1,200 of earnings has the effect of reducing the allowance to $3,348. That is, $1,200 of earnings has the effect of reducing the allowance by $252 a year.

Senator Carter: On what page is that?

The Chairman: That is on page 42, Table 10.

Senator Carter: When did these work expenses go into effect, Mr. Yaremko?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We are assuming that those are the work expenses involved in employment. That is an assumption on our part, that a person employed on a full-time basis, all year-round, will expend about $240 vis-à-vis his employment. We have put $240, and then or $1,200 we have assumed an expenditure of an estimated $10 a month.

Senator Croll, this Table 10 is one of the most significant tables in our presentation. Senator Carter, you will see at the top that it is a comparison of the five-person social assistance and working families. It is five persons. If you have identical families, a mother, father and three children, and one is fully employed and the other is on social assistance, you will see that the gross income of the full-time employed person is $5,000, and the gross income of the person on social assistance, with part-time earnings now permissible under our regulations, is $4,764. But when you consider what the working family has to pay out, or what is taken away from them, they end up with $4,021 to spend really on their needs, whereas the social assistance family could theoretically at present have $4,600-and-some-odd dollars.

The Chairman: Senator Carter, I think it is essential that we understand this completely. What the minister has said, of course, is quite right. But that table on page 42 is on the basis of about $2.30 an hour. The minimum wage in Ontario, except for construction workers, is $1.30 an hour. That is what you have to keep in mind.

Senator Carter: My question is: From where do you get this figure of $4,784 of earnings? What basis do you have for selecting that particular figure?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We made an assumption.

The Chairman: If you multiply it by $2.30 an hour you will arrive at that figure.

Senator Carter: But why pick a person who is earning $2.30 an hour?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: If it was less than $2.30—let us say, $1.30—then the working poor family's gross total income would be considerably less, and the difference would be accentuated.

Senator Carter: He would be better off on welfare?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The gap would be that much greater.

The Chairman: There are in Ontario, as there are in other parts of Canada, thousands of people working for $1.30 and $1.60 an hour. I do not know the percentage, but I think I have some idea of it. That has been going on for a number of years. There has always been that difference between what a worker would receive by earning a low wage and what a worker would receive if he were on welfare, yet we have done nothing about it up to the present time. How do we justify our allowing that condition to exist since 1966, a period of three years, when the Canada Assistance Act came into force and when we had to meet a needs test rather than a means test?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: In our province we have been concentrating on establishing social assistance programs for those outside the labour force. We have been giving that a lot of attention, and with the increases that we announced as of May 1 we believe that for our social assistance recipients outside the labour force we have provided a fairly good allowance. Our big job now is to solve the problem of how to bring up the income of a family whose head is working full time and who we call, for want of a better term, the working poor. What mechanisms can we develop to assist that family to increase its income? You must remember that the significant thing about our social assistance programs is that they are geared to the size of the family. That is one of the great things. One of the changes that came about with the Canada Assistance Plan was that we began to develop our programs in terms of the family group. The size of the family comes into it. A man's wages are completely unrelated to the number of mouths he has to feed. His wages are related to the job he is performing, and his ability to produce. The employer does not look to see whether a man has three children at home or seven children at home.

Senator Carter: But is not that the gap that the Canada Assistance Plan was designed to fill? You are not using it in that way.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Senator Carter, we have grave reservations about the applicability of the Canada Assistance Plan in this particular field. If we are going to develop a program in which persons who are within the category of the working poor have a right to certain supplemental allowances, then that is one of the major programs that either level of government will embark upon. We will have to know much more before we can embark on that program where the people are entitled to supplementals as of right.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, may I just put things in their proper perspective. Seven provinces of Canada are providing just that sort of help to which you have referred under the Canada Assistance Act, and are receiving 50 per cent of the cost from the federal Government. One province is doing more than any other three provinces put together, and it has been doing it for some period to time. I think that information has been available to your department and every other department in Canada for some period of time.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You are quite right, Senator Croll.

Senator Carter, it is possible under the Canada Assistance Plan to do this. I want to make that clear. The Canada Assistance Plan is there and it can be used to provide this kind of supplemental. We have studied, although not in great detail because we have not had the opportunity, what the other provinces have done, and I should like to suggest that your committee examine this in detail in order to find out exactly what the other provinces have embarked upon. One of the provinces has provided this kind of assistance to 800 people, of which I believe 550 are working mothers.

The Chairman: Female heads of families.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, female heads of families. Now, it is true that Ontario could embark on that kind of program, but what we are looking for—I would point out that those people are not entitled to that as of right; that is an extremely selective system. I am not faulting what is being done because, after all, 800 people are being assisted. As long as one person is being assisted then I say that that is all to the good. But, when you are talking about a program for the provision of supplementation for the working poor, in a province such as Ontario, then you must realize it is a gigantic step and it goes far beyond 800 people. As a matter of fact, we have within the Province of Ontario a great many female heads of families who are fully employed and who are getting assistance, as are the blind and the disabled. We do have those people who are fully employed and who get assistance which is shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan, but we are talking about developing a program under which every person who is fully employed and whose income is not what is necessary to enable him to provide adequately for his family will have, as of right, a claim to social assistance. This is a major challenge that confronts not only us and not only you as a committee, but it is one of the great national challenges of today.

The Chairman: I have one more question. Mr. Minister, as I read the Canada Assistance Act the word "need" has no limitation. It is simply need. There is no limitation. If you decide that a person needs to have a colour TV set—I am putting an extreme situation—and you enter that in your accounts then the federal Government will pay half. The federal Government has never refused to pay for what any province has said is a need. That is as broad as I can put it.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I would not say that we have received that kind of blank cheque, otherwise we could go into other areas, senator, such as the question of whether legal aid is social assistance.

The Chairman: Well, isn't it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is not shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: Where does it say that? You have the best legal aid system in Canada, if not in North America, and your department can take a great deal of credit for it. Where under the Canada Assistance Act are you prevented from providing legal aid in the same way that you provide medical aid?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We do not get the dollars for it.

The Chairman: Where is the refusal of an application? It is a social need. Would you have established the legal aid system if you had not felt it met a social need? You are spending $7 million, and the purpose is social betterment. How under that act could that possibly be refused?

Miss D. Crittenden, Assistant Deputy Minister, Department of Social and Family Services, Province of Ontario: Mr. Munro stated that it was not shareable.

The Chairman: Have you tried to bill him, and have you been refused?

Miss Crittenden: It was brought up at the last ministers' conference, and he stated it was not shareable.

The Chairman: Of course, you have not billed him and he is not going to encourage the Ontario government to do so. It is a $3 million bill, whereas in most of the provinces it is $100,000 at the most.

Miss Crittenden: Senator Croll, the federal Government has deducted from our claim the cost of the staff who administer and the field workers who make investigations.

The Chairman: With respect to whom have they done that?

Miss Crittenden: The cost of the administrative staff is deducted from the plan.

The Chairman: It should be.

Miss Crittenden: We have told them and it is deducted.

The Chairman: The purpose of the act is to meet the need of the people, not that of the provincial governments.

Miss Crittenden: Oh, no; the act provides that the administrative staff is part of any program. However, we have not been able to get sharing at all.

The Chairman: We have not heard that from any other province.

Senator Carter: Is that a special provision in your agreement with the federal Government?

The Chairman: No, the agreements are all the same.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The agreements are all the same.

You will be interested to know with reference to legal aid that it is available to a very broad spectrum of our people, who are needs tested by our administrative staff. However, in the case of general welfare and family benefits assistance recipients they, having been once needs tested and needing legal aid, just walk in and make known that they are on general welfare assistance and there is no second screening. They are entitled to legal aid.

Mr. Borczak: Senator Carter inquired why we picked the family of five with $4,700 earnings. The reason is that it is the closest round figure at the poverty line projected by the Economic Council of Canada, as updated.

It was established in 1961 and has since been updated by various groups, including our own department of treasury and economics. On page 6, table 3, we have used figures which update to current levels at 1969 the poverty line projections made by the Economic Council of Canada.

At the bottom of the page it is indicated that for a family of five the figure is $5,060. In the tables on pages 41 and 42 we use an example of a family of five with earnings close to the $5,060 poverty line figure. Our examples demonstrate the effect on the person on public assistance, with and without earnings. He is in a position of considerable advantage, with some earnings, over a person employed full time but at the poverty level.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, I find this brief very complete. It covers much ground in the welfare field and I wish to congratulate Mr. Yaremko and his department.

In paragraph 2 of page 1 it is stated that:

Prosperity seems to have offered more opportunities to poor men than poor women to increase their income.

Why do you feel that is so?

Mrs. E. Etchen, Director, Planning and Research Branch, Department of Social and Family Services, Province of Ontario: This is a matter of interpreting DBS statistics. The number of people who were poor in 1965 and 1967 included fewer men than women. Therefore the wage rates of men have been advancing more rapidly than those of women.

Senator Inman: But why do you feel that there are less opportunities?

Mrs. Etchen: Because wage rates for men have advanced more rapidly than those for women. Therefore, more men are able to raise themselves out of poverty than are women.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have accepted, as a discussion point in order to have a firm base, the poverty lines set by the Economic Council of Canada. Statistics indicate that in certain cases under those lines there are more women than men. We are dealing in gross figures.

These women may be students who are not employed at all, but because they do not have the income suggested by the figures of the Economic Council of Canada they are included in the poor. However, Mrs. Etchen has pointed out that we could probably deduce that within the work force there are more women under than above the poverty line.

Senator Inman: My question relates to the opportunities. Why are there fewer opportunities? Has anything been done to assist women to improve themselves to the point where they could be employed?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We are hopeful, senator, that the recent bill introduced by our minister of labour, the Hon. Dalton Bales, with relationship to the employment opportunities of the female sex may have some beneficial effects in the future.

This relates not only to wage rates, but to promotions and the significant types of jobs.

The Chairman: We should understand the situation, Senator Inman. In Canada we have a very large number, more than normal, of female heads of families with children. The question is do they work or stay at home and look after the children? That is for them to decide. Consequently what they are saying is a fact of life in Canada.

Senator Inman: It is not only a case of opportunity, but of the women not being able to take advantage of it in some cases.

The Chairman: It is both. They have to make up their own mind. They may have ample qualifications and still decide to stay at home.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I am very proud that within this group of people we have Miss Crittenden, who is probably one of the most senior female civil servants, not only in the Province of Ontario but in Canada. Mrs. Etchen is Director of our Research and Planning Branch. Both of them are above the poverty line! They bring a lot of others, too, I hope.

Senator Inman: At the top of page 4 you mention a four-person family living in a rural non-farm community, and so on. Does the Government of Ontario consider these conditions in relation to welfare recipients, referring to rent and other things? Or was that answered in reply to Senator Carter's question?

The Chairman: Yes, I think it was.

Senator Inman: In paragraph 5 on page 4, about halfway down the page, you say:

The subject of retirement incomes and deferred consumption is much too complicated to discuss here.

That seems to be a point that should be discussed.

Mrs. Etchen: Here we are looking at the problem of saving now for retirement in the future, so that there is some sort of deferred income being provided for; the expenditures are being deferred now in order that there shall be income later. This is a very complicated subject with which actuaries and economists have struggled for many years. We feel the subject is much too complicated to discuss. We are not actuaries, but we simply point out that there is deferred income built in.

Senator Inman: I wondered if people would be allowed to save part of their incomes now and get some welfare assistance so that in future they would have enough. Is that the idea?

Mrs. Etchen: We are trying to relate this to the subject of retirement incomes. You save money, you do not spend it, and therefore have deferred part of your consumption to some time in the future. This is a complicated actuarial computation and we have made no assumptions about it. We feel that it is an important subject, although it is too complicated for us to discuss. We are discussing here the subject of using an annual income as a measure of poverty. This does have a few problems, and this is one of them.

Senator Inman: On page 8 I refer to paragraphs 1, 3, 4 and 6. Is there a ceiling for the forgiveness of loans? How far can you go with that?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The equalization of industrial opportunity?

Senator Inman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: There is a ceiling. I am trying to recall figures. I think it is $250,000 in certain parts of Ontario and $500,000 in other parts of Ontario. Those are figures that we can provide. We can get the definitive figures. I think perhaps what we might do is provide the committee with a background paper on the equalization of industrial opportunity program of Ontario, which, of course, is part of the anti-poverty program because it creates jobs where otherwise there would not be jobs.

Senator Inman: I understand that, but I wondered how far you went with the forgiveness.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is related to a complicated formula of how much the company itself is putting up, how many jobs will be provided.

The Chairman: I think that would be very useful. While you are doing that, Mr. Minister, would you give some thought to providing this committee with a paper indicating the equalization process of the federal and provincial governments, what equalization payments are made for welfare, and how they are being used for welfare?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I do not know whether I have grasped that.

The Chairman: There are certain equalization payments being made to various provinces by the Dominion Government in response to equalizing payment from taxation—income tax and other provisions. They make certain payments to various provinces, more to some and less to others. In that process provision is made for such things as welfare and other provincial matters. There must be some way of identifying the amount that is being paid to equalize the welfare scale and how that money is being used. Could you do that?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think the only figure we probably could have is one from the Treasury Department of the total number of tax dollars raised at the federal level, and then the aggregate number of dollars returned.

Mrs. Etchen: This is in the Ontario budget for 1970; it is in the budget paper.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Then we will see that you get that budget paper.

Senator Inman: Halfway down page 8. Under "Poverty and the Social System", speaking of people with low income you say:

For them the problem is lack of education and job skills, lack of employment opportunities or inability to change occupations. In most instances the social system somehow or other is inappropriately organized.

How can this social system be improved, and has the Ontario Government taken any steps in this direction?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The last sentence of that paragraph and the reference to:

...lack of education and job skills, lack of employment opportunities or inability to change occupations, should be related to a statement we make on page 7, where we have highlighted some of the overall programs. We touch upon education, and when out of a budget of $1 billion one-third or more of the tax dollars are going to education, that is a yardstick showing that we are doing something in this regard. When you consider the growth of the universities, secondary education, technological colleges, this is where we feel there is . . .

Senator Inman: Apart from education, you speak about opportunities and inability to change occupations. It takes a little while to educate people. In the meantime what have you done, or what can you do?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The equalization of industrial opportunities is one program. There is the ARDA program, which is another joint federal-provincial program that made the news a week or so ago, in which we are trying to bring jobs to people. I do not think we have as yet the mobility to lift people up and move them to where jobs are. We are trying to bring jobs to people. It is an amazing thing about the psychology of human beings that, although some will move very readily, others will put up with conditions for years because they just do not want to pick up their roots.

Senator Inman: I can understand that situation, coming from Prince Edward Island.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, there are two provinces in Canada using the Canada Assistance Act for the purpose of upgrading people by way of training and education in order to qualify them for better jobs. Why hasn't the Province of Ontario done that, since there is need, as you say yourself. There is money available for it and they have been doing it elsewhere for sometime, yet it is not being done in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think you are referring to the so-called work activity program, which is a section of the Canada Assistance Plan. We have had that under review, and it is a continuing process. In the last few years we have in the Province of Ontario been developing our program within our rehabilitation branch. We also have an agreement with the Canada Manpower. We have in our budget some $5 million or $6 million which is geared for the rehabilitation of individuals in the main, handicapped physically in some way, but to date under this program nothing has been turned down by Ottawa.

We are working within the scope of that particular agreement to rehabilitate people for employment. The work activity program is very current within the Province of Ontario, but at the present time it is difficult to think of a work activity program which will enable people who are already more or less equipped to work to obtain employment when there are no jobs available. We are in a bit of a paradoxical situation, which I hope will only be temporary.

The Chairman: We are both somewhat political animals and, as you said, both come from the same riding. You say in regard to unemployment that you hope it is temporary, I also hope it will be temporary.

The act came into effect in 1966, three and a half years ago. There was some unemployment in Ontario as well as the rest of Canada. Nothing in fact was done to take advantage of that particular aspect. We are aware of what you have been doing with the Canada Manpower Act and it has been considerable and good. Here was an activity which could have been useful to upgrade and build up some people who were unemployed and perhaps take them off welfare. I point out that for three and a half years nothing was done. You were not there three and a half years ago, and I am not blaming you or the government.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: As I pointed out, under our vocational rehabilitation services branch, according to the statistics, 25 per cent of the people who took our training under the vocational rehabilitation services had been on general welfare assistance and family benefits. We have used this as our vehicle.

If I may, I would also like to be just a political animal. Incidentally, I was in law school when Senator Croll was very active in the legislature. I watched him from the west gallery for a number of years and in that riding. We must turn our attention, when we evaluate programs, to evaluate the package as a whole. If a program within a province is going to be assessed, the package has to be assessed. In Ontario we have been putting emphasis on certain things and certain programs which have been going forward. As Senator Carter pointed out, the number of dollars spent under the Canada Assistance Plan is an indication of our use of that plan. Though the bulk of those dollars do not go into the administration cost, which has remained fairly closely the same, we have been taking this money and putting it into the hands of the people. We have been developing our own set of priorities within the program. That does not mean we have discounted the other. We have not discounted the work activity program, and we have not discounted supplementation of the working poor on a selective basis.

We have been attempting to provide the kind of basis we have for the vast number of our people. We have 110,000 cases in Ontario. Now we are in a position where we can begin to refine our programs in relation to those on social assistance and then turn our direction to the 100,000, 200,000 or whatever number will turn up in the so-called working poor.

Mr. Borczak: I wonder if I might add to the minister's remarks in connection with the work activity provision for the Canada Assistance Plan? As I understand the provisions they are really an alternative vehicle for providing this kind of cost-sharing arrangement between the federal government and the provinces. The other vehicle is the one which we have chosen to use up to the present time, and that is the agreement under the manpower departments.

The Chairman: Both of those provinces are using it.

Mr. Borczak: It is possible to do precisely what is intended under the work activity provisions under the Canada Assistance Plan and possibly to do those things under the vocational training agreement.

The Chairman: No you cannot. Under Canada Manpower you must have certain educational qualifications. You do not need those qualifications under the work activities. You make your own.

Mr. Borczak: Our experience has been that we can in fact do that. Out of the many courses we offered during the fiscal year ending 1969, 47 per cent of the persons in those training programs were in work adjustment programs. These people had to have a considerable amount of work done with them in the area of preparing them for more advanced training in some sort of work. We found that there is a great flexibility in that agreement with Canada Manpower. We believe that to date there is perhaps a little more flexibility under the Canada Assistance Plan, and we have expressed these views to the federal authorities. By way of illustration, under the Canada Assistance Plan we are tied to developing our program around the concept of persons in need. Under the other agreement the concept of need is not a basic requirement. Hence you will find that our scale of income maintenance payments to the trainees follows a somewhat different pattern. The scale of payments is based on a flat daily rate which was designed to parallel the payments under the Manpower Adult Retraining Program. We believe, then, that the Canada Assistance Plan simply offers an alternative. It does not add something which does not now exist, but it offers an alternative method of doing so.

In our examination of this matter, we have considered that at this stage at least we seem to have more flexibility under the present vocational training agreement than we would seem to have under the other. As a consequence, then, we are actually having persons who are now on welfare rolls going through this training scheme and, again in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, of approximately 1,200 trainees about 25 per cent came from the welfare rolls, both municipal and provincial.

One may argue that we are not doing enough in this area, but my point is that in fact we are doing what other provinces are doing under the Canada Assistance Plan under the Work Activity Agreement. But we found that this agreement with Canada Manpower seems to give us the tool we require.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: This is so important, senator, that I should like to underscore it. A year or so ago I had some indication through the grape vine that the federal authorities were going to perhaps terminate the agreement or shift out of that agreement, and I expressed my opinion at the time that they should not do so; that we wanted to have the flexibility of that agreement. Regardless of the fact that there was some provision in the Canada Assistance Plan, the other one suited our purposes much better. I may say that the rehabilitation program of the province of Ontario, which has grown from almost nothing to one of considerable size, is one of the unsung programs of this province. There is very little known about it except by those who are actually in the field.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, since you are doing the kind of work you say you are doing under the rehabilitation program, dealing with 1,200 trainees, approximately, why are you not billing the federal Government for half the cost of that? The federal Government is prepared to pay half under the work activity portion of the act.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are doing so.

The Chairman: You are not being paid half the cost under the work activity portion.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We get it through the other agreement of Manpower. We are getting it from Ottawa. We are getting the dollars from Ottawa.

The Chairman: Of course you are, but the point I am making to you is that other provinces are doing what is possible under the manpower provision, but for those who don't qualify under the manpower provision—and it is the same agreement across the country;—there is the additional program under the Canada Assistance Plan for which the federal Government pays half.

Senator Inman: Mr. Chairman, on page 8, the second paragraph from the bottom reads as follows:

Even the most comprehensive health prevention and treatment programs cannot insure that all individuals can enter and continue as members of the labour force. Social assistance frequently becomes the last resort program for the mentally retarded, physically disabled . . .

and so on. At the end you say that:

No general social security provisions have been developed to insure earned incomes against long-term illnesses; some people become poor as a result.

Should this not be a prime matter of consideration? How do you consider that?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I should think that, as we develop our full package of services to look after the needs of all of the people, that will be one of the aspects. We are now talking to those who were in the labour market and then, because of a long-term illness, had to use up all their resources. That paragraph, senator, was really put in to let the people of Ontario, and Canada generally, know that the people who are poor are not necessarily poor by choice. In fact, almost all of them are there because they more or less have to be; not because they want to be. We are highlighting some of the reasons why people end up on social assistance.

Senator Inman: Yes, people do get catapulted from a good wage situation into a situation where they are earning next to nothing, and it would seem to me that those people require a good deal of consideration.

Now, I was interested in your family benefits program on page 22. I wonder how long it takes to process a family budget case. Sometimes we hear complaints that it takes too long to process welfare cases. The recipients sometimes complain about that. How long does it take you to process them?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I will let Mr. Groom, who was the former Director of the Family Benefits Branch speak to that.

Mr. Groom: Depending on the circumstances, senator, it can take from one month to several months to process a particular case. One of the most misunderstood sections of the legislation, the misunderstanding of which leads to this type of criticism, is the section dealing with desertion. The legislation states that a mother must be deserted three months in order to be eligible. From the date of the application for family assistance she may have just been in fact deserted so that there is a period of time of waiting which is not the result of administrative processing but is rather a legal time factor necessitating her waiting for three months after desertion before becoming eligible. Misunderstanding of that situation is what very often leads to statements that the processing takes too long.

Another situation is the widow who is 59. She is not eligible until she is 60. She may apply, as in the case of old age security, six months in advance and wait until the date she is eligible. And, for example, in the case of the aged person who is 60, she may apply one month and become eligible the next. So the period does vary, but I would say that the criticism about length of delay stems from the misunderstanding of the desertion section.

Senator Inman: But you give aid to other people apart from deserted wives.

Mr. Groom: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We should also underline the fact that although there is a time period in the processing of family benefits, nevertheless, in the interim the person applying is not without assistance. When a person is in need, the waiting period is taken up by the general welfare assistance provisions which are short-term general provisions.

The Chairman: For emergencies, for example.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: For emergencies, yes, and they fill these spots in. So far as the person is concerned, then, from a dollar and cents point of view there is very often no significant difference. I will say that there would appear to be a psychological difference in that persons seem to tend to be attracted more to the provincial program than to the municipal programs, because they feel that when they are on the provincial program they are getting a pension whereas when they are on the municipal programs they think in terms of getting welfare. That is a psychological difference.

Senator Inman: So that, if a woman was widowed at the age of 40 and was left with five or six children, she would be looked after until the family budget came in.

The Chairman: Oh, yes. I don't think there is any question of that.

Senator Inman: Going back to page 2, you recommend that someone should improve the Canadian poverty index. Does the Ontario government have someone in mind to do this job?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We are suggesting that this be done at the national level, although we are doing our own research at our provincial level. But you will see here that at the top of page 5 we say:

Throughout this brief Economic Council of Canada guidelines, updated by the Ontario Department of Treasury and Economics, have been used as the definition of poverty. We have misgivings about their reliability of statistical data contained in this presentation; however no other data are available . . .

We have put that in the brief because we have to talk in terms of concrete dollars and cents. But I think that even in 1970 we still have not come to a delineated definition of what it is to be poor in Canada or to be poor in Ontario. We have used gross figures to arrive at this position, and we may talk about one out of every four persons being poverty stricken, but when you walk in metropolitan Toronto and see a lot of people, you have to find out which is the "every fourth person" that this is applicable to. Once we have a definition that everybody understands, then we can arrive at how many people there are in that category. We know what they need, and we will know how much is going to be needed at the national-provincial level to bring all these people up. But we have to start out with a definition that is scientifically sound.

The Chairman: But, Mr. Minister, we have the definition from the Economic Council. They gave us a scientific definition. They have made a complete study on it. Then Miss Podoluk of the DBS has given a definition. The brief submitted by the Department of National Health and Welfare discussed this matter thoroughly and they accept Miss Podoluck's definition and the definition of the Economic Council. So what more is required? I am sure your people have been following our proceedings and in this committee we have been able to define the poor without actually giving you their house address and telephone number. I thought we had done that pretty clearly.

Senator Inman: I have just more question, Mr. Chairman. On page 3 in the bottom paragraph you mention that a poverty line is gross and arbitrary. Then you go on to say other things, but you say "inherent in it is a number of problems. One of the fundamental ones is the definition of income as gross cash income before deductions for taxes from wages, salaries, pensions and investments."

Mrs. Etchen: Well, the poverty-line, as we say, is gross and arbitrary. That is in terms of cash, but we think a definition of poverty in terms of need would be more suitable. We would urge you to consider what the Bureau of Labour Statistics has done in the United States. They have done an immense research project there resulting in five or six publications which approaches the problem on the basis of what a person needs to maintain a quantified specific standard of living. This is related to the size of the person's family, their ages, where they live, the kind of house they have, and it takes into consideration a broader kind of a definition of income than the one here, and it does not debar people whether they have 70 per cent of their money to spend on food and shelter. It relates it to need. So we feel quite strongly that looking at the budgetary deficit measurement means of identifying poverty under the Canada Assistance Plan and looking at the budgetary standards developed by the Bureau of Labour Statistics in the United States, that some place in Canada, perhaps at the level of the DBS or at some national level or National Health and Welfare—and we ourselves have co-operated with some of the agencies—could use this budgetary standard approach that relates needs to the poverty line, and then you go out and price the needs.

The Chairman: That was Miss Mollic Orshansky of the Department of Agriculture in the United States which for all intents and purposes was discussed by Mr. Willard of the Department of Welfare when he was here and was discussed also in his brief. Even the United States Government in its present assessment has not accepted that as the basis of poverty and accepted a money value rather than one in kind.

Senator Fergusson: Before the Minister brought it to our attention, I had noticed by the biographies that were supplied that there were two high-ranking civil servants among the delegation and I had intended to congratulate the minister on that. When I was a civil servant myself, my greatest ambition was to become a deputy minister. I did not get there, but I am glad to see that other people are on their way. I think when you have an assistant deputy minister and a director of a planning and research branch in the Civil Service, it shows that you do not restrict advancement and promotions in your department to males which we feel occurs all too often in some departments. As I remember it was in Ontario that you passed the first equal pay bill covering payments to women, so I assume you are carrying this into other things, and I congratulate you on that.

I also congratulate you on the excellent brief which gives a tremendous amount of information. We also got a great deal of information from the minister's presentation. I am still somewhat confused about how you operate, and I intend to read the minutes very carefully.

One of the things the minister said was that there are many female heads of families who are fully employed and who are receiving assistance. How do they get into such a position? What female heads of families who are fully employed are receiving assistance? Maybe it was the deputy minister who said that.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We will have Mr. Groom, Executive Director, Social Development Services Branch and Director of Family Benefits who will be able to detail that for you.

Mr. Groom: The woman who is widowed, deserted, separated can apply, even though she is working, for general assistance from the municipality, and on the basis of having lost her principal family provider, she is eligible. She is also entitled at the discretion of the municipality to earnings exemptions on what she does earn. So she could be fully employed, getting general assistance, and earnings exemptions and also the other benefits that do accrue. So there we have an example in Ontario of a fully-employed person receiving social assistance. Under family benefits, which is a provincial program, she could also have the same situation, but here it would be restricted to a deserted or widowed woman, and where the desertion as I mentioned earlier, would be three months. However, in family benefits, when she does reach an average of 120 hours per month, she is then considered to be fully employed on a long-term basis, and she ceases to be eligible for provincial allowances. In the event that her income falls back below that, she can reapply for general assistance at the municipal level. So we do have fully employed mothers in Ontario receiving social assistance.

Senator Fergusson: I think the deputy minister or the minister also said that you believe that the level nearest the people should handle the social services for the people. Now I come from the Province of New Brunswick and they have some different ideas there. I would like to have you say something more about why you think this is the way it should be.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think there may be more than just the philosophy involved. When you consider the size of New Brunswick and the number of people involved, and then you consider the size of the Province of Ontario and the number of people involved there, and the disparity in the spectrum between the various parts of the province — this is the conclusion we have arrived at. You see, it is the ability to get close to the people that is important. In New Brunswick, you are small enough that you are close to the people even at the provincial level, whereas in Ontario the province is so big that we come at a long distance. For example, you take Metropolitan Toronto with its two and one-half million people — it is almost the size of a province and is even bigger than some provinces, and they are delivering the services.

Senator Fergusson: But all local social services in Ontario would not be carried on by large municipalities. You have small municipalities too, and if they were going to do the administration, would they be able to hire as good administrators to do this job as they would be able to were it done on a larger scale?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No. This is one of the things that we are embarked upon curing. In the Province of Ontario we have roughly a thousand municipalities, and originally all the administration was done at the local level by this vast number of municipalities.

Over the last ten years we have been trying to develop regional administration, at the county and district level, and now about half of the thousand municipalities are within the regional set-up where they are able to provide that kind of base. We are still holding out a carrot to the others. We have not reached the stage where we say, "You will combine!"

Senator Fergusson: Actually, it is not really local but regional administration you are aiming for.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes, but it is at a lower level than the province.

Senator Fergusson: Yes. I misunderstood you. I thought you wanted to carry on at the municipal level, as we had done in the past, and it seemed to me this was a step backward.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You are quite right. We are headed into regionalization.

Senator Fergusson: That is what I thought, and it was a little confusing.

On page 17 you speak of recipients of family benefits, and in paragraph 5, the last sentence, you say:

They must be in financial need and in one of the following groups:

(1) A person 65 years of age or over who is not receiving Old Age Security.

Who, at 65 years of age, is not receiving Old Age Security?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Those who do not meet the 10-year residence rule.

The Chairman: Five years.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, it is 10 years; it used to be five years.

Senator Fergusson: On page 9, in the paragraph at the bottom of the page, you say:

As a nation we do not seem to have reached a consensus concerning what should be done to improve matters. What are our social goals? What are our priorities?

Would you tell us what you think our social goals should be and what our priorities should be—that is, for Canada?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I would think the determination of our social goals to provide "a place in the sun," to use the euphemistic language I used in my opening statement. It is pretty easy to arrive at a consensus.

I think the bigger challenge and the challenge that awaits this country is whether the people will have that commitment which will enable us to achieve our social goals. We have an affluent society. Somebody was saying 90 per cent are well off or are having it pretty good. We have to get that 90 per cent worried about the 10 per cent.

Senator Carter: Where did you get the "90 per cent" from?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Somebody used the figure.

The Chairman: It is 80 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Somebody in one of the Toronto newspapers used it last week, but if there is one in four, how do we get the three out of the four to be committed to the other one? I myself, the senator here and others remember the war effort. I recall those days vividly, when the whole nation, everybody, without exception, geared themselves to a commitment. They had a goal, and everybody was involved to the fullest of their capacity. Of course, then everybody had a stake, everybody was more or less committed because everybody's future was jeopardized. We were not just fighting for the other man; we were fighting for ourselves. We were working in the plant or doing without, not just for the other man, but for ourselves. If we could get that kind of commitment in peace time, even for a short period of time, one or two years, we could do a tremendous amount.

Senator Fergusson: How can we make people want to do this? This is what we have asked so many people.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think, first of all, they have to know what the facts are, they have to know what is going on. They have to see, become aware of the one in four, or whatever number concerning which, senator, a scientific analysis says, "These people are 'have-nots.' They do not have what the others have and they are entitled to it, as of right, being members of society." Once people become aware of that, then we have to somehow, by articulating and leadership, involve people to get that kind of commitment. This is the biggest challenge that faces Canada now for the "haves".

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, I feel I have to ask you some of these questions. It is generally known, and it has been mentioned in the press, that in the City of Toronto if a person in need requires blankets, bedding, eyeglasses, false teeth, these are unavailable because they say they have run by their budget. This in the City of Toronto, if you can believe that—the richest city in Canada, with the most beautiful City Hall in North America. They cannot afford to give these essentials to their poor people. That is beyond my understanding. I sometimes wonder what those "new Messiahs" who came into the council this year are doing. You can get a protest meeting and a lot of noise any day in the City of Toronto about Vietnam, Cambodia and half a dozen other matters, but you cannot get a student or a young man to walk down the street to protest against this sort of thing concerning families. Some of them may be their relatives. Can you explain how we get them to commit themselves?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I wish I were the Solomon. With reference to the Metropolitan Toronto situation, Mr. Anderson has written a letter to the editor in which he explained the priorities. I think before Toronto is faulted too much, we should be aware of the fact that Toronto's record in this field has been extremely good, but they have their priorities as to who is going to get what. Just who has done without has not yet been documented. One of our newspapers ran an article on Saturday in which they highlighted the flesh and blood of two families. You do not have to give a telephone number and the address of two families; they were brought out in public. When you examine what those families are getting in total, when you have those figures, you can judge what is being done in Metropolitan Toronto.

With respect to stirring up people, I have seen the parades and protesters marching up and down the main streets of Toronto, and here again, senator, you and I are familiar with all those streets on both sides of Bathurst Street and the south end, and all around that whole area. I have said to young people, "You want to do something. You cannot get overseas, but walk down to the south end and get yourself involved one or two nights a week. You can keep yourself busy seven nights a week." But, of course, that is where you are working in the rain and in the shadow, and not in the open. You are not on University Avenue where the whole world can see you under the glare of lights.

It is like the party canvasser, Senator Croll. The man working in the polling subdivision does not know all the excitement that is going on at headquarters. He is out knocking on doors and doing a very important job. It can be raining, and he is wondering whether anybody knows that he is there, and whether he is accomplishing anything. You and I know that that is where you get down to the grass roots, and you have to be right there where the people are.

Now, everybody cannot walk the streets, but they can be aroused by injustice, and they can say: "I will stand up and be counted by either participating or contributing tax dollars."

The Chairman: When we were last in Toronto we were told that some of those services which I mentioned were not available: a strip appeared in the Toronto Star on the weekend, underlining that they were still not available. We were told that by two people who appeared before us. That was not our immediate task, but it was brought to the attention of the City of Toronto, and yet nothing has been done. However, let us get on.

Senator Quart: I should like to ask a supplementary question. What can be done regarding more involvement, and all the rest of it? I have said on many occasions, and I will stand by my guns, that I believe it can be accomplished if a sort of co-ordinating council were set up, such as was done during the war years, which would go out to the women's national organizations again and ask for their involvement in the war on poverty. If that was done I think they would respond. But, each group feels that it would not be received very well if it took the initiative. It might bump into some social service agency and not be too popular. But, I still believe the women would do it.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Mr. Chairman, this has been a long discussion on the items that I wanted to discuss, and they have all been very well taken care of. This morning we are playing in the same puddle, and asking questions that have been asked before. The Province of Ontario has presented a brief that we were expecting. It is like all the others. In general, everybody is in accord as to what has to be done and what the present situation is, but there is one thing in this brief that has impressed me more than anything else and that is the part that concerns the effort the Province of Ontario is making towards filling the gap between the earnings of the working poor and their needs, and especially those of the working widows and mothers.

I have always believed—and I repeat it this morning—that too easy access to handouts has produced many evils in this country. Many briefs that have been presented to us have been directed towards providing more money and more handouts. Handouts are good in one place, because there are many people who are deserving of them, as is evident when you classify the poor across Canada and see that there are those who are disabled, abandoned, and so on. However, there is a certain class of people who have created a problem which is getting worse all the time because access to money has been made easy.

I think the chairman mentioned a while ago that there are poor people who do not have to be poor. They are poor because they want to be poor. I feel sorry for the people who have to be poor, but I shed no tears for the people who want to be poor. I am confident that you are doing something towards filling this gap. You have people who are working but who, because of lack of education, their domestic situation, and so on, are unable to earn an income sufficient to provide for all the needs of their families. I understand that you are trying to fill that gap, rather than putting such a person on welfare. It may be that a man has qualifications that will permit him to earn only $60 a week, and if he were on welfare he would be given $80 a week, and he needs $80 a week to provide for his family. The only thing for him to do is to get himself fired, and to receive $80 a week on welfare. This is the wrong approach. We should work out something to encourage such a man to work and earn the $60 a week, and thus bring honour to his family and all the rest of it, and he then should be able to receive the difference between that sum of $60 and the amount that is needed to support his family. At the moment his only course is to get himself on relief.

So, we have the working poor, and the poor who refuse to work. This is the problem that faces this committee, and it is a most serious problem.

If we go on handing out more money we will soon find that everybody will be poor on $4,000 a year, and then we will find that people will be poor on $5,000 a year. So, we have to be very careful in our endeavours to solve this problem. I have a great deal of sympathy for the people who really deserve assistance, but there are many people who have a too easy access to welfare, and they become an evil to society. They cost the public a lot of money, and it is going from bad to worse.

That is not much of a question, but those are the remarks I wanted to make.

Senator McGrand: I should like to refer you to the first paragraph on page 34, which concludes what is said on the previous page. It reads as follows:

The Department suggests that it would be more appropriate to transfer funds expended in the Family Allowances program to the provinces which have the authority to distribute them selectively. The provinces could then establish income tested programs which would distribute the funds to lower income families. This would substantially alleviate the problem of the working poor.

Now, I do not quite get the meaning of this. I understand how difficult it is to find a yardstick that will evaluate the problems of the poor in different areas of Canada—the Northwest Territories, the Maritimes, the Prairies, and the large cities. Does this mean that you get a better effort made in a trans-Canada poverty control plan that is administered on a regional or provincial basis than on a federal basis?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I do not think, senator, that it goes towards the administration; it goes towards the use of dollars. I think everybody now understands the problem of the working poor. One of the significant factors in respect of the working poor is the number of children in the family. If a man is on social assistance and he has six children, then that is taken into consideration. If he is working and has six children, the number of children does not make any difference.

In 1942 we attempted to correct this situation and developed what is now known as the family allowance. However, that allowance is universal, being granted to the entire population. A man with six children earning the minimum wage receives exactly the same amount as a lawyer practising in downtown Toronto with six children and an income of $50,000. I do not know whether there is such a lawyer, but he does receive exactly the same.

We are questioning the use of those funds for that lawyer's family. On the one hand we have a family in receipt of family allowance which is not enough, because when we discuss poverty lines it is in terms of gross income. Everything earned or received from other sources is taken into consideration. Should those funds which really supplement the budgets of those far above the poverty line not be available at the provincial level to be directed into those families where the man wants to work, fully employed, all year around? The discouragement enters where the man has not the skill to produce sufficient for his family.

Senator McGrand: You said that at the provincial level you would take the money that goes to families and to adults in receipt of the old age pension who do not need it . . .

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: To a much lesser extent, yes.

Senator McGrand: . . . and you would distribute that money at the provincial level. Do you mean that the province would distribute it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is one alternative. In the middle of page 33 of our presentation we give two other alternatives.

We are aiming at greater selectivity.

Senator McGrand: A more flexible arrangement?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Flexible is one word, but selectivity is the word. It is universality on one side of the concept and selectivity on the other.

Senator McGrand: Do you believe that there are provincial bounds which make a uniform trans-Canada proposal difficult to administer?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes. I will not go into the question of constitutionality or administrative efficiency.

We arrive at a level where the selectivity can be better the closer we are to the people. In that case selectivity programs can be more highly refined than at a national level.

Senator Carter: Would you follow that argument through and say the provinces should give the jurisdiction to the municipalities because they are closer?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Under our general welfare systems we now have a large portion of the discretionary element at the local level.

Senator McGrand: It would mean that perhaps you would have a section of Newfoundland, for instance, where people were receiving a certain amount of money according to their needs and another area, downtown Toronto or Vancouver, for instance, where there would be a group of people receiving assistance according to their needs. Therefore you would not have a policy across Canada providing for individuals to receive a certain amount of money regardless of where they live or their circumstances.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That type of approach becomes so inflexible that what may be just sufficient in certain parts of Ontario would be more than sufficient in other parts of Canada.

This could be vis-a-vis any grouping of provinces. Therefore, these difficulties arise when the standard is universally applied. This is especially so if it is the top standard for all.

The Chairman: Would you then say that the old age assistance, unemployment insurance, family allowance and medicare, which are universal programs, are not succeeding in their approach, disregarding the amounts?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are achieving certain goals well. However, the big question is are they playing their role in the anti-poverty structure?

You have touched on the key of the whole problem, that we must develop a system to integrate old age security, family allowances, unemployment insurance and, above all, the income tax structure together with all the other programs in order that they achieve the purpose of enabling every family or individual in Canada to live properly.

Senator McGrand: You say we have the old age pension and the family allowance, which should be made to serve everyone in the best manner possible. In 1943 there was some feeling in Ontario that the family allowance across Canada was not the best system. It was said that the amount of money contributed by the people of Ontario should not be distributed across Canada but concentrated in Ontario to be paid to the needy of that province. This would result in something better for the poor of Ontario than the family allowance would provide. You will remember that.

Do you mean that today you have this feeling that a similar plan could be worked out by the adjustment of funds from local sources to meet local problems? By local I mean provincial and regional.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The basis of the family allowance was the redistribution of income in relation to families and regions. It was a two-pronged principle. We have made much progress since then, because the equalization factor between regions has been effected. All the agreements across Canada since 1940 have brought about improvement.

We are directing our attention to the individuals and not touching upon the regional aspect. All parents in the Province of Ontario, regardless of whether they are above or below the poverty level, are entitled to exactly the same benefits under the family allowance.

Let us take Ontario. Is it proper that a downtown lawyer earning $25,000 a year with six children should get exactly the same family allowance as a man who through circumstances is washing the dishes in the restaurant where that lawyer eats, earning a minimal income? This is one of the things we have to ask. If you asked that kind of question back in 1940 people had doubts and reservations about somebody being for or against a program. However, I think in 1970, thirty years later, we should re-examine that program and decide: Are the dollars being used in the total program across Canada, or within the province, used to the best advantage of the goal we are trying to achieve?

Senator Quart: First, I want to echo what Senator Fergusson said about women in high positions in your department. I have met Mr. Yaremko and Mrs. Yaremko, and I am sure you have a friend at court there. I am not trying to take anything from you, Mr. Minister, but it always helps somebody behind who will support what you do in the line of women's advancements. Having said that, I would like to add, following your references to political differences with Senator Croll, I assure you that on all the briefs that come from provinces, or others, Senator Croll is always eulogizing Ontario, and sometimes it gets my goat. I should like to find out if you have some place in your department where poor people would go for information about where to apply for different things or to solve problems, which probably you do not deal with? Could you send them on to the right source? Is there any setup for that within your department?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Within our own department I think we are sufficiently knowledgeable so that anybody who turns up at any office is almost immediately channelled to the right place.

Senator Quart: I am sure they are.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The problem is not within our department. When you ask me the question about the province as a whole, I say that there is lots more that we will have to do in this regard. We have in the province—and I am glad I have a friend at court here—under the bulk of our programs established that a person is entitled to assistance as of right. That is now the law. The big challenge, or one of the aspects, is to make sure the person knows what his rights are; he has to know what his rights are, and then he has to know where to go to get those rights filled.

Senator Quart: Yes, that is it.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The problem of communication we have touched on in our brief, and it is something to which we are devoting our time, whether there should be more brochures, handbooks or telephone facilities. Of course, the face to face meeting with the social workers is significant. This is something we will have to spend much more time on in the immediate future than we have in the past.

Senator Quart: I thoroughly agree with you when with great pride you mentioned in the legislature your $18.5 million welfare program, and the additional aid which you include for long-term cases, the blind and so on. You mentioned here that Ontario is still waiting for specific proposals from Ottawa agencies for a pilot project of subsidizing families with low incomes.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: There was a community involvement conference, and I participated in the outcome of one directed towards social assistance. Mr. Munro was present, I was present, together with social workers and recipients. We had seminars and discussions. Mr. Groom has been carrying the ball for us in this regard and I would like to ask him to speak to it.

Mr. Groom: At a meeting in Ottawa the point was raised—I do not know whether facetiously or not—that we would save money by supplementing the working poor, that people would then transfer from our social assistance to getting jobs, and I think a figure was quoted. Out of this came the thought that maybe there should be a research project in Ottawa. Mrs. Etchen and I came to Ottawa and discussed with people here the possibility of a research project, and they were to come up with a proposal. I think it is right that it should come from the people themselves. We are awaiting the arrival of that. I think it will take them some time to develop it, because it is something that is new to them. We have been at meetings, but as far as I know we have not received anything since then. Whether we will be able to do anything with the proposal depends on when we get it, and also what it would cost.

Senator Quart: I notice, Mr. Minister, it is reported in the newspapers that in announcing a series of increases in provincial aid for disabled and unemployable persons you stopped short of the controversial guaranteed annual income. This was reported in the papers, that outside the house you said you were willing to consider a pilot project with some form of guaranteed annual income when you get specific proposals from Ottawa.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I think this was the project to which Mr. Groom referred.

The Chairman: Let us be clear on this. I have a copy of the press report, too. I remember Project 70. Do I understand, Mr. Groom, that you are waiting for the recipients to develop a project for you?

Mr. Groom: No. There was a group called the Neighbourhood Improvement Committee, I believe, in Ottawa, and Action—70—Action.

The Chairman: They are the recipients; these are people who receive relief, who have come together for the purpose of getting some action. You are waiting for them to develop a project so that you can proceed with it? Is that what you told us?

Mr. Groom: No, it is the people in the communities.

The Chairman: Who?

Mr. Groom: Not just the recipients. For example, the chairman of the group now is the Ottawa Director of the Social Planning Council.

The Chairman: Who is that?

Mr. Groom: I think it is Dr. Zimmerman.

Senator Fergusson: Bil Zimmerman.

Mr. Groom: And Father Sayer was transferred.

Senator Fergusson: He has been transferred.

Mr. Groom: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It is a community group in which recipients are involved.

Mr. Groom: That is right.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Recipients are part of the group, but it is a total community group. It is not restricted.

Senator Quart: We had them here.

The Chairman: How long ago was that?

Senator Quart: It was just after Christmas.

The Chairman: That is February, March, April, June and July. Have you had any approaches from them yet? Have they come to you with anything yet?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Mr. Groom: They made two submissions to the minister. We asked for more details and explained some of the problems we would have in working up the cost of what they had presented. They saw our problems and are working right now to come up with something.

The Chairman: So there is some activity on it?

Mr. Groom: Yes, but as the senator pointed out, Father Sayer was transferred to Montreal. . .

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Mr. Groom has been flying back and forth with respect to this project.

Senator Quart: Father Hebert is still here isn't he?

Mr. Groom: He is the other one in the Neighbourhood Improvement Committee.

Senator Quart: Thank you.

Senator Carter: I may have missed something in your answer to Senator Quart. When you made this announcement the press report says that the first change will allow welfare recipients to earn limited amounts to supplement their welfare payments. Is that reflected in your brief and in its tables?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That was one of the very significant factors of the changes. More dollars are always welcome, but sometimes changes in approach can be more significant. You will note that we stick with the same type of family. I will let Mrs. Etchen explain this.

Mrs. Etchen: The column on the left-hand side are the amounts which a person may earn. If he earns something less than this he is still eligible for part of this social assistance allowance. A five-person family could earn up to about $6,300 and still have some social assistance benefits.

Senator Carter: These tables we have before us have been valid only since the first of May?

Mr. Borczak: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I might clarify that. These earnings exemption provisions have been in our provincially administered family benefits program right from its inception. The change which the minister announced was the introduction of precisely the same kind of earnings exemptions used under the general welfare assistance program to May 1st. Prior to this date there could be an offset against earnings of the amount of the cost of those earnings; that is, the actual out-of-pocket expenses of the worker could be deducted from his earnings and the balance would then be taken into account and it would determine the amount of his payment. That, as you can appreciate, had little opportunity for encouraging a person towards employment. For that reason we introduced precisely the same provisions in the general welfare assistance legislation for May 1 as we had for family benefits. The figures we have here have applied in many, many cases to persons receiving assistance under the family benefits program.

The Chairman: What you actually did was to move the cases over to the family planning. You were formerly under a different system and the government paid half the shot.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is different. I think you are talking about cost sharing. Under family benefits it is a 50-50 operation. Under the provincial programs we have certain provisions outlined here for exemption — $24 for the person plus $12 for each child plus 25 per cent for certain provincial programs.

In the general welfare assistance there was no such exemption provision. If a man was getting $300 for his family at the municipal level, and he went out to cut grass for a day and earned $10, the city would only give him $290. He still ended up with $300.

Senator Carter: In other words you had the means test.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have made it permissive. He gets his $300 and if he goes out and cuts grass or does any other part-time job he is able to make earnings which now, under this table, can be quite substantial. But, then again, having looked after this group, later on you will see the effect when it comes to the working poor, the man who is fully employed and not only on social assistance. When we try to apply this formula to that group of people we come up with some real problems.

I know that these tables are going to be a little difficult to understand. Let us examine page 53 chart (1) with table 12. This is one of the most important parts of our brief. I am going to ask Mrs. Etchen if she will attempt to explain the significance of trying to take one formula we have developed for outside the labor force and trying to apply it.

Mrs. Etchen: The basic tables show the combined effect of the taxation system on the person's net income when he is on social assistance — the offset rates, the 25 per cent allowance, the needs level, the benefit level and, at the far right, the net income. It shows the impact of the whole system on the person. It also shows that a net income of $5,000 to $5,700 covers gross earnings between $864 and $6,385. We have a tremendous equalization of earnings if we apply this to the working poor.

Mr. D.G. Heagle, Projects Co-ordinator, Department of Social and Family Services, Province of Ontario: Planning and Research Branch; We have been examining the problem of the working poor and we have been trying to think of appropriate approaches to assisting them. The problem is that we do not have all of the answers. As an exercise we extended the existing provisions in our act. The results are best seen in column (j), table 12 on page 54. You can see it very simply by comparing column (a) and column (j). Our plan would work essentially the same way as the negative income tax system with the exception that it would not be incorporated in the income tax structure. That is the major difference.

Senator Carter: Did I understand Mr. Minister to say that as far as municipalities were concerned this is permissive and not compulsory.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Yes.

Senator Carter: How many are taking advantage and how many are not?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have not got the statistics. I know that metropolitan Toronto has indicated they are going into it, but we do not know the full implications of it yet. We are usually very very scientific. It has worked so well in family benefits we will transfer it to the general welfare assistance. Because we do not know the full implications across the province to every municipality, we have not made it mandatory.

This provision will enable more people to be brought into or put onto the social assistance roles than in the past. The additional income in the past would have taken them off the road. We have made it on a permissive basis and we will be watching it very carefully to see what impact this will have at the municipal level. Based on that we will decide what the next step will be.

The municipal administrator can take the position that if somebody complains to him that the allowance he is getting under all of the schedules is not enough the administrator can say that he should get a part-time job in order to make a few extra dollars. We do not know what the full effect of this is going to be. This is why it has been made permissive.

Senator Carter: I should like to go back to the line of questioning started by Senator McGrand. Before I come to my questions, however, I want to clear up one point. In reply to Senator McGrand you stated that the family allowance program was originally an income maintenance or income distribution program, and you take the same position in your brief. I don't agree with you there. I don't think that is valid.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: It was twofold, senator. It was individual and regional. It was a two-pronged principle.

Senator Carter: I am not concerned about that. I am concerned about the distribution aspect of it. I don't think it was ever intended to be an income distribution program. It was a welfare program aimed at helping people with large families to outfit their children a bit better for school and that sort of thing. It was never intended as an income distribution scheme. It could not be, because it applies only to one particular group: people with children.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: You and I are in complete agreement on that, senator.

Senator Carter: But you condemned the family allowance program and based your condemnation on that type of criticism.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: No, senator. You and I are in complete agreement. The purpose was to assist large families, on the assumption that people with large families needed the assistance. But experience has proven that there are a great many families with substantial incomes and with a large number of children, and the question now is whether the thesis of 1940 can be applied in 1970, and I have given you specific examples to show that it can't.

Senator Carter: I want to dig into that a little bit further. In your reply to Senator McGrand, if I understood you correctly or remember what you said correctly, you referred to linkage, and you refer to linkage in your brief—the family allowances and old age security and so on; you regard those dollars that are paid to wealthy families with children who don't actually need the dollars as dollars that are wasted, so far as having any impact on poverty is concerned. Is that correct?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I didn't use the term "wasted".

Senator Carter: But that is what you meant.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: But in a day and age when there are a limited number of dollars available to use for a certain purpose, you must devise the best method of utilizing those dollars to reach your objectives. Yes, we use the term "linkage". I would hope when I become 65 that by virtue of what I have achieved in life I won't need the $79 as much as I know a great many people in the community I represent need it. They will need an extra $10, $20 or $25 far more than I will ever need that $75. The $75 will permit me, even after taxes, to indulge myself in something for $30 or $40 every month after I am 65.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, wouldn't a basic maintenance income, then, answer your objection? If a person qualifies he gets it; if he does not qualify he does not get it. How much more selectivity would you like than that?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: I don't quite grasp that.

The Chairman: You say you don't need the $79. I don't need it either. I can get along without it, but I get it. What I am saying to you is that, if you had a basic minimum income, you wouldn't get it and I wouldn't get it. Only the people who qualified by some act or other would get it. Isn't that what you are saying?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is it, yes.

The Chairman: Hold everything.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: But not just by itself.

The Chairman: Wait a minute. The answer was yes. Then you say not by itself. All right. No group has ever come before this committee and said that the basic maintenance income was the answer to poverty period. You are saying not by itself. There are other things that need to be done. Many other things need to be done, but, basically, when we are talking about income, our view is that income is the first step out of poverty. I think you would agree with that. Then what better way could we have of getting a fair distribution than by giving it to the people who need it?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is what you have outlined as a goal, senator.

The Chairman: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Not the mechanism. You have outlined the goal. In this I think we are in agreement. We have as a goal the enabling of people to have a certain level of life within Canada. That is the goal and then we have to devise the mechanisms of attaining it. Your plan still has a lot of questions. We are getting into territory where there are a lot of questions for which, with respect, there are no answers. I wish we could have been a little more helpful in our brief by supplying answers, but, as Mr. Groom pointed out, the fact is that when we came to deal with the working poor we posed more questions than we gave answers, but we feel we posed good questions and the right questions.

But let me make myself clear; when we have X number of dollars, we have to make sure that in every program the dollars are being utilized to the best advantage within each program. Then we have to combine all the programs to be integrated in order to achieve a goal.

You are keen on one proposal. That is one mechanism. We suggest that we must utilize all these mechanisms.

If you look at the tables on page 12 you will see that the impact of the income tax structure on the working poor is another factor that has to be considered. You see there that one of the major problems that are going to confront us is this: is the left hand going to supplement the working poor only to have the right hand tax the working poor for those dollars? The income tax structure is a very positive factor in this, as we have pointed out in various charts. It is difficult to follow the charts through, but I suggest to you that those charts outline some of the reasons why we are asking the right questions and why these programs have to be integrated.

The Chairman: You know, I recall very vividly when the family allowance came into effect everybody said it could not possibly work the way we were proposing to do it. They said we did not have the administrative experience. We issued every head of family a cheque. That was the cheapest way to do it, and it turned out to be the cheapest way to do it. And the best. It was as simple as that. When we are talking about mechanism, I do not think we need concern ourselves with that, at this time.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Senator Croll, we are not looking at cheap methods of doing things. It is the simplest thing in the world to sit down and write out a cheque. You get somebody's name on a computer machine, and that machine will spill out a cheque every month as long as that person's name is on the list. That is the easiest thing to do, and it may be the cheapest. But in our own experience, the local administrator of the smallest municipality could always sit down and write out a cheque for $10 or give a voucher for $4. That is a very inexpensive way of dealing with welfare. The expensive way is when you begin to hire social workers and you have a staff, but then you are achieving a purpose. I am not quarreling with the fact that it is an inexpensive way of putting dollars into the hands of everybody, whether it be old-age security or family allowances. What we have to make sure of is that we are a little more selective. Now, I am not drawing a line or saying where that line should be in respect of those who should and should not get it. Probably the vast majority should get it, but in a day and age when we are thinking of scarce tax resource dollars, we have to make sure what we are doing.

When you look at the figures for family allowance budget for the whole country and you see it is $700 million, and then when you think of the one in four figure and the number of families involved, we begin to get the relativity of where those dollars are. We have to look at that person who is the one in four and try to see how we can help him and how we can help his family. We have excellent social service schemes. We don't get the baby allowances in our family, but I know there are mothers who do get it who simply put it the money into the bank for deferred consumption. But then there are other families who do get the cheque and use it for buying a supplement of next week's groceries.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, when you talk about the easiest thing to do being to write a cheque but you need social workers and people who can do something towards rehabilitation, how do you allow a city like London or Windsor to do nothing but write cheques without a social worker on the staff.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Well, that is something else and I do not know the details of that particular situation, but in a week from today I will be addressing the Ontario Association of Welfare Officers and will be pointing out some of these things to them, because again we have generalities and we have some communities such as Metro where they have the most highly sophisticated delivery systems. Then there are others—you go the full spectrum to the situation where there is just a cheque-writing system and handing over the money without trying to cure the problem.

The Chairman: On page 3 of your brief, you gave what the Ontario Department of Economics said was a poverty line. Now, if we take your figures . . .

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Actually, if I may say this, what that is is a matter for discussion. We have outlined three figures; there is the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, there is the Economic Council of Canada figure for 1968, and what we have done at the Ontario Department of Treasury and Economics is this; we have updated the 1968 figures to bring them up to 1969. They have just made an adjustment.

The Chairman: I am going to commend you for having done that, but my next question is; why do you not use that and provide to that extent for the people on welfare?

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: We have to go to the next chart.

The Chairman: Never mind the charts.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are very important. Let us go to table 3.

The Chairman: You have told us that $330 is what you gave to a family of four. Now that is easy to multiply. It is $3,960

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Senator, that is one thing that all of us must stop. We must stop taking one figure and multiplying it and saying "that's it." Because there are a lot of other things. If you look at page 6, table 3—and you have to pay attention to tables . . .

We have a breakdown there and in the left-hand column is the social assistance which is what they get in dollars. But the middle column is what you have to go out and earn and pay taxes for and all the other deductions. As you will see, there is a footnote—(b):

Added to the basic allowance are amounts for income tax deductions at 1969 rates, contributions for Unemployment Insurance, and the Canada Pension Plan; Ontario Health Services Insurance Plan and Ontario Hospital Insurance at full rates. Family and Youth Allowances are included.

So, although multiplying your figure, you get the left-hand column, when you translate that into the kind of dollars that are earned, you get the middle column.

The Chairman: Yes, but I cannot eat the statistical middle column and I must eat. There is nothing there at all because the left-hand column shows the various provisions. I need that much money and I cannot get from these statistics.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: The Economic Council figures are gross figures.

The Chairman: So are yours.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They are not net. They are gross. And what you are talking about in our social assistance are net figures. You see the Economic Council has a figure for a poverty line for a person who has that and then has to provide everything for himself. He has to have that much to pay for everything, for health insurance, hospital insurance and all these things. He has to earn that much money. Now, you will see the poverty line figures on the right, and this is where I would ask you—and this is one of the problems, Senator, of the intricacies of our Family Benefits Act—and I am sure your researchers have got it. When you take the Family Benefits Act, you have to. . .

Senator Carter: I have a few more questions and I am watching the clock.

The Chairman: Well, we'll stick around.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: This is so important. This is one of the basic ways of understanding our social assistance program. You take a family, mother, father and children at certain ages, and we have a schedule, and you have to go through the FBA and pick up the pre-added budget and the shelter allowance and you get the number of dollars, and then you have to remember that that particular family gets free hospital care. For example, that child in the newspaper on Saturday was in hospital for two months and that was paid for by society at a cost of X number of dollars either in direct costs or in premiums. They get dental care and other things, so that the equivalent—you get so many dollars but you have to think about the family.

Senator Carter: They get services.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: They get benefits, and certain families if they are on family benefits or general welfare assistance—if they are those who are fortunate enough to be in housing accommodation provided by Ontario Housing Corporation, their dollars are even better utilized. For example, I noticed one of the families had four-bedroom town house at X number of dollars. Now somebody who was not accommodated by Ontario Housing facilities would be paying considerably more than that. So you have this difficulty of translating or multiplying the $330—which I did on the week-end too, Mr. Chairman—by 12 to get a figure. That figure has only a certain amount of significance. It is not the total figure.

Senator Carter: Since we are long on tables this morning, let us turn to table 8 on page 31. I must compliment you on putting up a number of alternate schemes, which are worth studying, particularly one of them where you double the grant, the family allowance, rather. I want to question you on that later. But the other one is where you suggest a combined demogrant and then an adjustment in the tax system to recover. This I think is worth a lot of study. Now, this is the thing that bothers me on this. At the bottom you have doubled the family allowances and you have only increased the net cost by around 50 per cent, because you expect to recover. You say.

It is assumed that 30 per cent of the payments to the non-poor will be recovered.

On what do you base that assumption?

Mr. Heagle: We make two assumptions which are essentially unrealistic. We are not in favour of this proposal.

Senator Carter: No, neither am I.

Mr. Heagle: We just want to make the point. The statement has been made on several occasions, I believe in front of this committee, that if we double the family allowance and make it taxable, it would make it quite efficient and this would give a lot of short-term assistance to poor families. But the inference has been made on several occasions that this brings an awful lot of money back. What we are attempting to prove is that it does not. So we are making two assumptions which actually favour the proposal. The first is the 30 per cent would be taxed back. In fact, that seems extraordinarily high. If you go to the bottom of page 30 there is a footnote.

Senator Carter: I want to correct myself, I think when I read it off I said "near-poor." I should have said "non-poor."

Mr. Heagle: We simply point out that on 1967 income distributions you would have to have gross incomes in excess of $10,400, $10,700 or $11,000, depending on your family unit size, to pay a 30 per cent tax rate. In 1967 we certainly did not have enough people earning that amount of money to get back anything like 30 per cent of the payments.

The second assumption we put in was that none of the money would be taxed back from the poor. In fact, under the existing income tax system we would tax it back. If it were made taxable, we would not tax it back because the tax exemptions start quite low.

Senator Carter: You expect to get some tax back from the near-poor. How do you define "near-poor"?

Mr. Heagle: We are going back to Senator Croll's earlier comments on what "poverty line" is. If we say that the poverty line is $5,060 for a family of five, does this mean that someone with $5,062, a family of five, is not poor? Those are the people with incomes near the poverty line, perhaps $1,000 or so above it, depending on the region—which is another problem of the poverty line—who really have more money than the poverty line, but are certainly not living in any degree of affluence. We think any proposal which would turn the family allowance and concentrate it in the hands of the poor should also be extended to leave it in the hands of the near-poor who need the money very badly as well.

Senator Carter: Earlier this morning you drew our attention to Table 10 on page 42. In your discussion with Senator Croll you referred back to the services. I am thinking of Table 3 where you said that the family of five would get net welfare payments plus dollars in free services which would bring them up to the poverty level. But in your comparison on table 10, to prove your case, you list "income tax, $290." If the White Paper proposals are put into effect, this chap is going to be off the tax roll because 750,000 taxpayers are going to be taken off.

Mr. Heagle: I am not sure of that exact example. There will be a large number of taxpayers, as I recall. We are not quarreling with that assumption at all, but I think in another case we run a table where . . .

Senator Carter: No, stick to Table 10, by way of proving this with regard to the social assistance family.

Mr. Heagle: Roughly speaking, that family would have exemptions of $4,050, off the top of my head, under the new Benson proposals. As their earned income is $4,784 and I think the first tax rate is at 20.7 per cent, they would still pay income tax.

Senator Carter: A five-person family earning $4,784 is going to pay income tax under the new proposals. It will be much less than $290.

Mr. Borczak: May I draw your attention to page 47, Table 11, in which we have drawn in the White Paper tax proposals and show in the middle column, again with that same family of five persons earning $4,784, that under the Benson proposals there is still a net taxable income of $694, as against a previous amount of $1,709, and that person would, in fact, have income tax to pay, even under the new proposals, of $153 as against $292.

Senator Carter: He would be taxed $150.

Mr. Borczak: That is right. So you see the dilemma here, that you are getting quite high up into the earning levels and still find that people are going to have to pay income tax, as we try to demonstrate in showing these equivalent values of allowances.

Senator Carter: Are you taking into consideration the higher exemptions under the new proposals?

Mr. Borczak: Yes, this is taking all the higher exemptions under the Benson proposals in that middle column. So, what we are trying to demonstrate in these various tables to which we have referred — Tables 9, 10, 11 and the previous one — is that one cannot and should not take the amount of the assistance payment and compare that with a poverty line alone. One must re-evaluate that assistance payment to bring it closer to the same relative kind of comparative figure with the earnings figure before one can make a real evaluation of what the level of the allowance means, and therefore one has to allow for income tax payments, for the other deductions that the working individual has to meet out of his pay cheque. Therefore, you will see the gap between the poverty lines which we are discussing in this brief, which we do not accept but which we are using simply because they seem to have been the standard established by most groups appearing before this committee.

Senator Carter: Yes. You did not emphasize this point very much in your brief, but the leakage to which you refer with regard to the 80 per cent of family allowances, that 80 per cent is geared to our current income tax system, and if you change to a different income tax system, as a matter of fact, you could wipe it out altogether. You can modify your tax system to wipe it out altogether. You suggest that in your second alternative, with a demogrant plus a modification of the tax system. How far have you developed that modification?

Mr. Heagle: That was simply an alternative we have explored. It appears to be quite feasible by modifying the exemptions or perhaps introducing the tax credit structure instead of the exemption. This effectively draws away income from people.

Senator Carter: But your purpose is to utilize these dollars and give them to people who need them, rather than to people who do not need them.

Mr. Heagle: Precisely, that is right.

Senator Carter: What you are going to do is pay them to everybody, but you are going to take them back from those who do not need them.

Mr. Heagle: Yes, through the income tax.

Senator Carter: Yes, through the income tax or some other device?

Mr. Heagle: Yes.

Senator Carter: Under this new proposal what would you have to do? How would you modify the tax system in order to get your money back?

Mr. Heagle: This is a hypothetical exercise, but you would have to do several things. First of all, you would have to turn around and change your exemptions or deductions under the new proposal. You would either reduce or eliminate them, or put in a surcharge that would effectively increase your marginal tax rate, or lower the point at which your marginal tax rate commenced. If you started making payments to people who are above the poverty line they would receive less in family allowances by the time their exemptions were lost and the marginal tax rate came into play, and thus effectively the payments would be taken back from them, whereas the people who were below the poverty line would receive far more in family allowances than they will lose through the reduction in the exemptions.

Senator Carter: You are going to do two things in this system. You are not going to leave the family allowance at the present rate. You are going to double it, or increase it by some amount. You have not made it clear whether you are going to recover what you call the leakage and convert that into family allowance, or whether you are going to introduce a new scale of family allowance and then recover the leakage by some surcharge or other device.

Mr. Heagle: That alternative would visualize an increase. You could pay three or four times the family allowance, and take it back through the tax structure. In effect, you pay it to everyone and it will be paid back through the tax structure. Only the people who really need it and who are below the poverty line, or just above it, would receive it.

Senator Carter: Let us consider a family of four which gets $15 a month for two children. That is $180 a year. You are going to multiply that by two or three, are you? You are going to raise it to, say, $500 a year?

Mrs. Etchen: We say that the harmonization of the tax scheme is something that our own provincial treasurer is vitally interested in. He has been negotiating this with the federal Government. We do not feel we can make proposals here because the harmonization of the tax system is a financial matter, and we cannot make recommendations in this area.

Senator Carter: I do not know what prevents anybody from showing how it can be done.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: That is really the 64-dollar question. As I have said, none of us can operate unto ourselves. This is really going to take all of the mechanisms, financial and otherwise, to come up with an answer. I do not envy this committee its task, because of the ramifications involved in reaching that goal. At all governmental levels there are three or four, or even more, departments involved. I do not know how Solomon is going to come up with an answer that will tie everybody in.

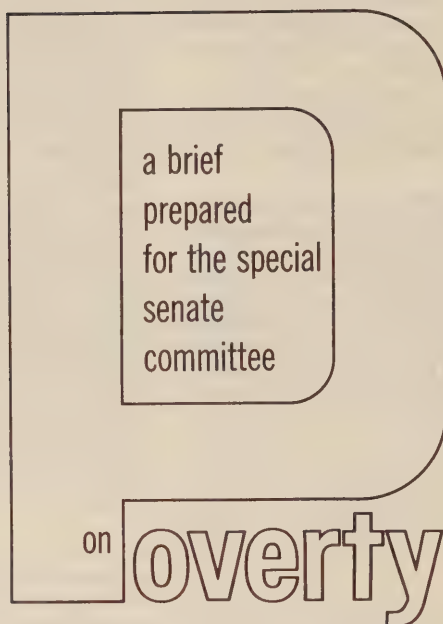

The Chairman: It does not appear to be as great a task as it appeared when we first started our inquiry. We are beginning to see some things very clearly. We are delighted at having this opportunity to get on with this work.

Mr. Minister, as there are no further questions I want to thank you for your personal reference. We share an old friendship. You have presented a thoughtful and constructive brief, one that will be very valuable to us. There are many problems that remain unresolved. You have made a contribution to our thinking that will help us reach a conclusion in this matter. On behalf of the committee, I thank you and all the members of your staff.

Hon. Mr. Yaremko: Thank you, Senator Croll. We have been extremely pleased to make this presentation. We have been reading carefully the reports of your proceedings and the briefs that have been presented to you. Mrs. Etchen and her staff have been analyzing them, just as your own people have. As we have said, we have all the brains and all the resources, and I think we can achieve our common goal.

The committee adjourned.

I. INTRODUCTION

The rapid growth of the provincial economy during the last decade has resulted in a substantial reduction in the number of poor persons in Ontario although it has not altogether eliminated poverty. Gross and real incomes have increased appreciably; families at the lower end of the income distribution have benefited from the general high levels of economic growth and employment. However poverty is still widespread. In the two year period between 1965 and 1967 the average income of all Ontario families rose nearly 18 per cent. When inflation is taken into account, the real increase was almost 10 per cent.¹

The benefits of prosperity have not been distributed equally among all low income groups. Some have been able to raise themselves out of poverty by their own efforts while others have not. Prosperity seems to have offered more opportunities to poor men than poor women to increase their income. While we have not been very successful in defining poverty we recognize as a nation that the minimum standard of living that is acceptable to us has been rising. We cannot expect poverty to disappear in spite of the fact that it is declining: some people will not be able to improve their lot by themselves. At the same time society is subtly revising upward its definition of what poverty is.

A. Definition of Poverty

Any discussion of poverty must begin by defining ways of distinguishing those who are poor from those who are not. Any one definition is likely to be unsatisfactory and open to the objection that it does not include sufficiently broad criteria to be generally useful to various groups such as economists, sociologists, statisticians and policy planners.

The sociologist analyzes the culture of poverty and sees it in the following dimensions:

Poverty involves underemployment and scattered, irregular, miscellaneous employment, often at undesirable occupations; it involves extensive borrowing through formal and informal sources, use of second-hand clothing and furniture, and overcrowded dwellings and lack of privacy. The poor have a higher death rate, a lower life expectancy, lower levels of health - physical and mental - and of nutrition, than the prosperous; . . . they are relatively unlikely to be members of labor unions, political parties, and other organizations; . . .

. . . Equally familiar is the inverse relation of education and income, . . . Associated with low education are low school achievement, inadequate verbal skills, lack of intellectual stimulation, lack of motivation to education . . .

. . . the poor tend on the whole to be more authoritarian than the prosperous; . . .²

The economist looks at other dimensions. Employment policies, demand for goods and services and income distributions are among his approaches to an understanding of the nature of poverty. Income is the measure on which data are most readily available. Poverty is insufficient income to maintain an acceptable standard of living.

The concept of poverty is influenced by the current general standard of living of the remainder of the population; it is related to certain basic conditions of life and the ability to live as everyone else does. It is different now than it was 40 years ago; it is a different phenomenon in Canada than in underdeveloped countries.

In order to be useful in policy planning, measures of poverty must be developed. If the "income deficiency" approach is adopted a series of poverty lines based on family size are the usual criteria. "Standards of living" on the other hand are built up from a list of goods and services specified as representing a level of living; these are then priced to determine the income necessary to meet the budget requirements. These standards include basic elements such as food, shelter, medical care and other needs. Both approaches have limitations as statistical measures of poverty.

In the United States, the Bureau of Labor Statistics has developed budgetary standards for city workers, retired couples and 4 person families. The latter standard contains 3 levels of living, some of the differences among them being that lower budgets specify that persons live in rented housing and use free recreation facilities; in higher budgets home ownership is specified, more household appliances are used and more services are purchased by the family. Quality standards are superior in the higher budget and quantities are increased. The general content of the budgets is based on current living standards. Nutritional standards were developed by technicians; other consumption patterns are based on surveys of consumer expenditure patterns. After completing the technical quantitative and qualitative aspects, pricing surveys were carried out. The budget costs specified are estimates of the gross incomes required to maintain the living standards.

The Canada Assistance Plan requires a budget deficit approach to determine need. Specified budgetary items have dollar values attached to them and the sum of these less the income available to meet them becomes the "need". The Plan stipulates that in addition to considering the budgetary deficit, resources must be taken into account.

Some limitations in using this approach include: the difficulty in arriving at accepted standards; complexities induced by the considerable variation in family characteristics; the multitude of needs levels arising from the application of the system. This is not a neat and tidy package of simple statistical definitions of needs.

One of our suggestions is that the Senate Committee on Poverty recommend that a study be carried out to improve Canadian poverty indexes.

It does appear to us that the budgetary standard approach has potentially more adaptability and usefulness for measuring poverty than a criterion based on gross annual income. A federal-provincial task force is analyzing the budgetary standards approach for application by all provinces in the social assistance field. However a wider survey of its usefulness seems desirable. The basic concepts and procedures have been developed by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. While adaptation would be necessary, the techniques have been worked through carefully. A national survey of consumption patterns would be needed as well as intensive research into standards for food, clothing, shelter, etcetera. Social assistance administrators could improve their budget procedures considerably if such standards were available and Canadian statistical measures of poverty would be more realistic and meaningful.

We would like to see commonly accepted, objective, quantified standards developed with which the incomes of individuals and families can be compared across Canada. These standards would permit income earned to be compared with income from social assistance. They could be designed to allow for variations in consumption patterns and prices across the country so that valid comparisons of poverty levels could be made from one province to another and from one region to another.

Ontario quantified a food standard several years ago; this could now be reviewed. Other components of our pre-added budgets such as clothing, utilities, household supplies and personal requirements are less precise. The Department of Social and Family Services is looking for ways of refining budgetary techniques and defining needs. The establishing of national standards of living for a variety of purposes seems a more rewarding approach than the Province of Ontario carrying out a detailed analysis for social assistance purposes only.

The poverty line approach is the alternative to setting standards of living. This is based on gross annual income; low income is defined as 70 per cent of income spent for food, clothing and shelter. Poverty lines have been drawn by various government agencies, based on Economic Council of Canada guidelines for 1961. They have been adjusted as indicated below.

TABLE I
ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA
POVERTY LINES ADJUSTED BY VARIOUS AGENCIES

Family Size	Dominion Bureau Statistics 1967	Economic Council of Canada 1968	Ontario Department Treasury & Economics 1969
1 person	$1,740	$1,800	$1,900
2 persons	2,900	3,000	3,160
3 persons	3,480	3,600	3,790
4 persons	4,060	4,200	4,430
5+ persons	4,640	4,800	5,060

Poverty lines are in terms of gross family income before deductions. All forms of income are included in the gross poverty lines, e.g., family allowances and other transfer payments. In its 1961 census monograph, the Dominion Bureau of Statistics says " . . . the income distribution is analyzed primarily in terms of the distribution of gross cash income before deductions, for taxes from sources such as wages and salaries, pensions and investments."³

A poverty line is gross and arbitrary. Inherent in it is a number of problems. One of the fundamental ones is the definition of income as gross cash income before deductions for taxes from wages salaries, pensions and investments. Such a definition does not take into account many income sources, typically more significant to persons with low income than others. Some of these sources are rental of rooms, board and lodging provided to members of the family and others, income from apartments and other small properties and casual earnings of other members of the family. Income in kind is also not taken into account; this is particularly significant in rural areas where food and fuel are produced at home and partial payment of wages in kind is common. As Titmuss has said there is a number of alternative definitions of income and a choice has to be made according to the purpose at hand and the availability of data.⁴

3. Podoluk, Jenny, Incomes of Canadians, Ottawa: Dominion Bureau of Statistics, 1968, p.5.
4. Titmuss, Richard M., Income Distribution and Social Change, London: George Allen and Unwin Ltd., 1963, p.31.

The concept of a poverty line fails to relate income to needs of families and single persons. A 4 person family living in a rural non-farm community paying a low rent may be financially better off than the same size family unit living in a large metropolitan area where rents are high. The quality of accommodation may be much better for the lower rent in the former community than in the latter. Different expenditure requirements between the same size family unit may be due to the need for drugs, dental care and education. The age composition of the family unit also causes differing expenditure patterns. Young children tend to require smaller outlays for food, clothing and entertainment than older children.

Needs are related to asset holdings, stocks of such things as automobiles and household appliances and the ability to borrow money or make large credit purchases.

No account is taken of the fact that some families may have an imputed income from capital assets and thus have lower money income requirements than other families . . . Ideally, as well as income data, information is needed on other aspects of consumer finances such as asset holdings and the stocks of consumer durables owned. Obviously a family of three with an income of $3,500, a house owned free of debt and savings of $10,000 is better off than a family of three renting accommodation and having no accumulated assets.⁵

There are regional variations in price levels and living standards, even within the Province of Ontario. For instance some food items are more expensive in northern Ontario than elsewhere because of the cost of transportation.

Annual income is used to determine a poverty line, but this may be an unsatisfactory way of determining low income. Annual income patterns change during the life cycle, being modest for younger age groups, larger from this time to retirement and then smaller again. The young expect their incomes to continue rising and thus even though they are "poor" they may not regard themselves as being so. Students may be foregoing income now in order to increase their earning capacity later. Retired persons are likely to be unable to protect their present income position. The subject of retirement incomes and deferred consumption is much too complicated to discuss here.

There are also problems in the short time base of one year. Some families with low incomes in one period recover in the next; economic conditions and the rate of unemployment fluctuate causing incomes to vary. Strikes, layoffs, changing export trade patterns and other similar conditions may be short term phenomena causing an annual income to be a poor indicator of the potential income level.

For these reasons statistics counting the numbers of low income recipients are less than completely accurate. The latest data available on income distributions are contained in a 1967 sample survey carried out by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. Data on income sources are not available. Projections into 1970 of 1967 data are somewhat outdated. No adjustments can be made for changing socio economic conditions such as the trend to an increasing number of families with more than one wage earner; compensating adjustments for increasing wage and salary levels in the last three years are somewhat problematic as are adjustments for changes in social assistance payments (e.g. Old Age Security, Family Benefits and General Assistance); the effects on income distribution of higher rates of unemployment in the last 6 months are unknown.

5. Podoluk, J., Incomes of Canadians, p.181.

Throughout this brief Economic Council of Canada guidelines, updated by the Ontario Department of Treasury and Economics, have been used as the definition of poverty. We have misgivings about the reliability of statistical data contained in this presentation; however no other data are available except 1967 poverty lines and income distribution projections based on the sample survey done by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics in the same year. Thus there may indeed be one million men, women and children living in conditions defined by our statistics as "poverty" or this may be an over-estimate or perhaps the numbers have been underestimated; no one knows.

Using the adjusted poverty lines of the Economic Council of Canada, this is how a low income might be spent. The 70 per cent poverty line budget includes only food, clothing and shelter.

Poverty Lines and Social Assistance Payments

A social assistance payment based on need is also a definition of a minimum acceptable standard of living or a poverty line. Because social assistance payments are not subject to income tax they cannot be directly compared to poverty lines based on gross income. Also, recipients of social assistance receive free additional benefits which wage and salary earners sometimes must purchase for themselves. Examples are health and medical insurance premiums. For these reasons social assistance allowances are more comparable to the "net income" position of the employed person than to "gross income". In order to compare social assistance payments to poverty lines it is necessary to convert them from a net to a gross basis. This has been attempted in Table 3.

- (a) Allowances for families of two to five persons are based on the pre-added budget of The Family Benefits Act plus rented, heated shelter at the maximum rate.
- (b) Added to the basic allowance are amounts for income tax deductions at 1969 rates, contributions for unemployment insurance, and the Canada Pension Plan; Ontario Health Services Insurance Plan and Ontario Hospital Insurance at full rates. Family and Youth Allowances are included.

To the "equivalent in gross income" column an additional amount has to be added. There are two major items omitted because their cash value could not be assessed with any certainty:

Work expenses

Dental assistance.

Undoubtedly clothes, transportation and lunches cost the working person something in addition to the ordinary living expenses he has in common with the social assistance recipient but how much more cannot be readily calculated. Also, provincial allowance recipients with children receive free dental care.

A premium of $1.40 per beneficiary per month is paid by the Ontario Government to the Royal College of Dental Surgeons. A similar type of insurance is not available to the working person and the premium is not a measure of the value of the benefit. The cost of equivalent dental care could not be determined.

Table 3 shows that gross earned income equivalents fall short of the poverty line by 10 per cent or more for families with young children; when children are older the poverty line and gross income are more nearly equal. If work expenses and dental care are taken into account it appears that at the poverty level there is not much monetary advantage in favor of income from work as opposed to income from welfare.

B. Policies of the Province of Ontario to Meet Poverty

The primary concern of the Department of Social and Family Services is with social assistance and social services programs. Since this brief is being presented by the Department of Social and Family Services and not by all Ontario Government Departments, primary emphasis is on income maintenance and social services and their impact on low income groups. However, other departments do make very substantial contributions to the alleviation and prevention of poverty and in order to give a more appropriate perspective a brief outline of some of these has been included.

Education has been demonstrated to be associated with the variation in earnings among individuals and among occupations. One of the common characteristics of low income groups is a low level of educational achievement. Public investments in social capital probably have a profound effect in improving the income earnings potential of individuals. As economists have noted, raising the educational level of the labor force has an important relationship to increasing the national level of economic growth. One of the more effective routes to a reduction in the incidence of poverty may be through improvements in the educational attainments of the population. During the last decade education services at every level, elementary, secondary, post secondary and university, have been high priority items in all Ontario budgets. To a considerable extent then future incomes are likely to have been improved by these investments.

Ontario public and mental health programs have expanded during the decade. Improved access to health services and treatment facilities has been provided with the introduction of hospital care and medical insurance programs. Health care services have been extended and made available to residents of the Province generally.

In the area of public housing, the Ontario Housing Corporation controls the development of such housing throughout the Province. It manages various family and senior citizen rental dwellings, either itself or through local housing authorities. Many low income individuals and families have been able to improve their living conditions through the rent-geared-to-income program of the Ontario Housing Corporation. Land assembly and condominium development are also important measures in assisting those with low incomes to own their own homes. In the next fiscal year, the amount of money required by the Ontario Housing Corporation is almost $97 million dollars.

In social development Ontario has introduced a variety of services which have added to the quality of life. Some of the programs of particular benefit to those with low incomes are consumer protection and legal aid. The Human Rights Commission protects individuals against discrimination because of age, race, creed, color or nationality. A number of community development programs are sponsored by various departments relating to citizenship, recreation and other local services.

Ontario Government agencies have been directly involved in creating new jobs for new entrants into the labor force, in relieving regional economic disparities and in increasing export trade. The Ontario Development Corporation designates areas where industrial expansion is desirable; they have a program of Equalization of Industrial Opportunity which provides forgiveness of loans for certain new industrial activities in these designated areas. Expansion of employment opportunities is thus encouraged in slow growth regions.

Some departments have programs which assist particular geographical areas or groups of people; for instance the Department of Agriculture and Food has an extensive rural development program, the object of which is to improve incomes.

The departments and agencies of the Ontario government which promote economic growth, a high level of employment, improved health services and facilities, increasing access to educational opportunities and carry out other similar activities make a very significant longrun contribution to the prevention of poverty causes. However, not everyone is able to take advantage of rising levels of prosperity and improved social services. Also, there are many persons who are outside the labor force and who need special programs to assist them. It is to these individuals and families that the programs of the Department of Social and Family Services are particularly directed.

C. Poverty and the Social System

Income inadequacy and income insecurity are common to large numbers of people who cannot improve their relative positions by themselves. Social assistance provides the basic support essential to those who are for one reason or another unable to maintain themselves. Some are incapable of offering their services in the labor market and are likely to be dependent on government transfer payments for long periods of time. Others are in and out of the labor force and are intermittently dependent. Many other persons with low incomes are fully employed or are employed for substantial portions of the year. For them the problem is lack of education and job skills, lack of employment opportunities or inability to change occupations. In most instances the social system somehow or other is inappropriately organized.

Some people are caught up in government policies for controlling inflation which put them out of work by increasing the rate of unemployment. Many of these are particularly vulnerable to the vicissitudes of economic conditions, many are marginal employees, the last to be hired and the first to be laid off. During a period of rising unemployment the most insecure are those whose attachment to the labor force is weakest. During such periods, not everyone who wants to work has the opportunity to do so. Marginal employees tend to be those with marginal educational achievements. The "drop outs" of the educational system become occasional labor force dropouts. Social assistance becomes their income source during periods of unemployment.

Even the most comprehensive health prevention and treatment programs cannot insure that all individuals can enter and continue as members of the labor force. Social assistance frequently becomes the last resort program for the mentally retarded, physically disabled and blind persons, and for those who become incapacitated through illness and accidents. No general social security provisions have been developed to insure earned incomes against long-term illnesses; some people become poor as a result.

Aged persons and young children are outside of the economic mainstream. Society has generally agreed that people should retire about age 65. Many female heads of families have the responsibility for caring for young children. Even if they could become employed opportunities are more restricted for them than for men. Because of their children it may be difficult to accept a job. Many of the jobs available to women do not pay enough to cover their work and day care expenses. Many have low skill levels and are unable to earn more than they can obtain from social assistance programs.

Even for those in the labor force regularly, earnings are no assurance of a continuing income or an income sufficient to maintain an acceptable standard of living. Lay-offs in low paying industries are not uncommon when the economy is undergoing a significant slow down. Industrial technology makes it increasingly difficult for persons with low educational achievements to maintain themselves in employment above poverty level wages.

Improvements in their economic position are largely beyond the capacity of poor people to manage by themselves. For many continuing governmental support is necessary and income maintenance programs have been developed to meet some income deficiencies. These are primarily payment programs and the objective is to support people when the education, health or other social services have not enabled them to achieve the ability to sustain themselves. As a preventive measure social assistance is too late because the circumstances causing dependency are already present. Fundamental underlying causes of poverty are not in the income maintenance system but outside it. No one should expect social assistance to eliminate the origins of these difficulties; it does not provide access to earnings opportunities. The major issue in social assistance as an anti-poverty device is the size of the income to be provided.

The fact that hundreds of thousands of people in Canada depend on the social assistance structure for their livelihood does not condemn it as a failure. For many such as the aged, blind and children there is a limited earnings capability. If the needs of such groups are generally adequately met through social assistance then the system meets the objectives for which it was designed.

It is not our social assistance programs which are a "failure"; our social system is not without flaws. If reasonably adequate social assistance payments are more financially rewarding than income from work, perhaps one place to seek poverty remedies is in the private employment sector. Adjustments in employment practices in the private sector may be more effective than work incentives built into the social assistance structure. Self-help mechanisms for individuals through training, increasing labor mobility, improved health care and other social services are also another possibility. Programs to increase job opportunities and levels of employment are among the obvious macro-economic tools to eliminate poverty.

If the most effective basic approaches to poverty prevention lie in the direction of co-ordination of manpower and employment policies between the private and public sectors of the economy why have we not put more emphasis on this approach? Have we as Canadians really committed ourselves to the objective of eliminating poverty or is this a conditional goal; for instance do we regard a stable economy and regulation of inflationary pressures as perhaps an overriding priority?

Transfer payments are used to redistribute income, but there does not seem to be a consensus about what degree of equalization is desirable. Transfer payments are financed primarily through taxation and as the white paper on taxation has recently noted there is now a requirement for tax relief for low income families. Our social assistance and income tax structures seem unco-ordinated.

As a nation we do not seem to have reached a consensus concerning what should be done to improve matters. What are our social goals? What are our priorities? Will we harmonize the tax structure among the three levels of government? Will we co-ordinate the social assistance structure and the tax structure? Have we committed ourselves fully to working toward a more equitable income distribution pattern? How are we going to co-ordinate our priorities among the three levels of government and how are we to reconcile the differences?

Some of the social conflict and discontent around us are reflections of a dissatisfaction with things as they are. A national viewpoint about what we should do to improve matters is still being formulated. A critical examination of our social system and our national expectations seems to be indicated.

D. Poverty Estimates

Our reservations about the statistical techniques and the data from which Canadian income distributions have been derived have already been set out previously. There are many problems in such data, however until it has been improved there is no alternative but to use some of it to indicate the dimensions of the poverty problem. However no detailed planning or preparation of cost estimates for alternative programs can be done with an acceptable degree of reliability until data and techniques are improved.

The number of persons who are poor may vary considerably from the estimate below.

This estimate indicates about one third of all unattached individuals and about 13 per cent of all family units live in poverty. Most of the unattached individuals are under 24 or over 65; they include many students and retired persons. The distribution by family unit size indicates that the incidence of poverty is more or less evenly distributed among all family unit sizes. Therefore policies directed toward relief of poverty should not concentrate exclusively on the larger family units.

The estimated distribution of all families and individuals by income level in Ontario is indicated in Table 5.

II. INCOME MAINTENANCE: PROVINCIAL PROGRAMS

Two major income maintenance programs are available through provincial legislation administered by the Department of Social and Family Services.

Family Benefits is an assistance program which provides allowances on a monthly basis to persons likely to be in need for extensive periods of time.

General Welfare Assistance is for the most part a municipal program providing weekly or monthly cheques to meet shorter term needs.

In addition to direct income maintenance through allowances, recipients in both programs receive free hospital and medical care; Family Benefits recipients are covered by insurance arrangements while municipalities may choose either to insure their clients for hospital benefits or to pay actual per diem rates. Families with dependent children are covered for dental care under Family Benefits. A few municipalities have similar arrangements for their clients and others provide dental care on a selective basis. In addition a person receiving Old Age Security may qualify for free medical and hospital insurance under the provincial Family Benefits program; either a needs test or an income test may be applied to determine eligibility.

The principal provisions of both programs are outlined in detail below. These programs in effect provide a guaranteed income for persons who are outside the labor force.

A. General Welfare Assistance

This legislation was originally enacted in the 1950's to enable the Province to enter into agreements with the federal government under the Unemployment Assistance Act (Canada): it has been amended a number of times and is now the instrument for cost-sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan (as well as for a number of residual cases remaining under the previous sharing arrangements). In the late 1950's the concept of needs testing in providing social assistance to unemployed persons in Ontario was introduced. In 1963 the legislation was amended so that the province itself could provide assistance to eligible persons, where formerly only municipalities and Indian bands had done this. Subsequent changes moved some municipal recipients to the provincial level. For example, widows and unmarried women aged sixty years and over, previously a municipal responsibility were transferred to the province in 1963.

Municipalities and Indian bands provide assistance to eligible persons who are in need within their jurisdictions. In unorganized areas where there are no municipalities, the Department of Social and Family Services is directly responsible. Provision has been made for municipalities to join together into a county or district unit for the purpose of administering General Welfare Assistance over larger geographical areas. There are now more than 900 municipalities in Ontario; of these about 480 administer assistance locally themselves; there are 19 county and district units covering 425 municipalities. It is our policy to encourage the formation of county and district units; the final decision, however, is left with the local governments. Forty-seven Indian bands have requested and secured approval to administer assistance.

General Welfare Assistance has three components.

(1) General Assistance - This is an allowance paid to maintain and assist people with their ordinary living expenses. It includes a pre-added budget for food, clothing and personal requirements determined according to a schedule which varies with family size and ages of children. Shelter amounts are based on actual expenditures, subject to an overall maximum. If premises are unheated an allowance is provided for fuel. In addition, utilities and household supplies are included up to a maximum.

The amount of allowance is the difference between the budgetary requirements and the amount to be applied as income. Allowances vary with the needs of the individual or family. The administrator exercises some discretion in determining the actual amount paid.

Allowances for a person in a hostel are handled somewhat differently; the budgetary need is the cost of providing meals and sleeping accommodation. Budgetary needs for residents of nursing homes are fixed at $10.50 a day. Foster children's needs are also flat amounts.

(2) Special Assistance - This is paid at the discretion of the local welfare administrator. It may be provided to recipients of General Assistance and to other persons in need; it includes items not covered by General Assistance such as drugs, dental and optical services, prosthetic appliances, travel and transportation, vocational training, comfort allowances, funerals and burials or, at the discretion of the Department, it may be used to augment general assistance where budgeted amounts are insufficient (for instance, for shelter). Payments are based on actual costs: amounts are generally determined at the discretion of the local administrator.

(3) Supplementary Aid - Benefits are available to recipients of Old Age Security or Family Benefits to help meet the cost of shelter or "extraordinary needs". The maximum amount available is $20 per month: this class of assistance is also discretionary.

In order to qualify for General Assistance, a person must be deemed to be in financial need and must, in addition, be in one of the following groups:

- (1) An unemployed employable person who is unable to obtain regular employment, but who satisfies the local welfare administrator that he is willing to undertake full time regular employment for which he is capable, and is making efforts to secure employment.
- (2) A person who has lost the principal family provider (for example, a woman who is head of a family).
- (3) A disabled person who is unable to engage in remunerative employment by reason of physical or mental disability.
- (4) An aged person (no age limits defined).
- (5) A resident of a nursing home.
- (6) A resident of a hostel operated by a municipality or under agreement with a municipality for the care of needy persons who are homeless or transient.
- (7) A foster mother on behalf of a foster child.

There are also other factors affecting eligibility. For instance, a person taking post-secondary education is not eligible for assistance. There is, however, an important exception: eligible women who are heads of families may receive assistance while continuing their education at any level.

Restrictions on employment and the supplementing of earnings apply to the first group only, that is, to unemployed employable persons. In order to be eligible for assistance under the Act an employable person cannot be engaged in remunerative employment at the time he makes application for assistance. However, there is no administrative definition of "remunerative employment"; as this pertains to conditions of eligibility it may be determined locally. Similarly, the definition of "regular full time employment" is a matter for the local welfare administrator to determine. Patterns vary according to the discretion exercised by local administrators.

For the remaining groups, no work limitations are imposed. Female heads of families who earn less in full time regular employment than they could receive from public assistance are entitled to wage supplements, provided they are otherwise eligible. Similarly the other groups listed are not subject to work restrictions. (Many of these are, of course, unlikely to be able to find employment.)

Recently an earnings exemption was introduced so that all recipients and their spouses may retain part of their earnings and not have dollar for dollar deductions from their social assistance allowances; this is at the discretion of the local administrator. A more detailed explanation of how this will be applied is found on page 18. Previously deductions from gross income were permitted to cover the costs incurred in earning the wages, salaries and other income.

To qualify for Special Assistance a person must be in need: the same general restrictive clauses are applied as for General Assistance.

To be eligible for Supplementary Aid a person must be in receipt of a governmental benefit. This is defined to include persons receiving a pension under Old Age Security, assistance under Family Benefits and its predecessor Acts, a maintenance allowance under The Vocational Rehabilitation Services Act, and assistance under certain other residual categories.

Upon application for General Assistance or Special Assistance an applicant's liquid assets are examined to determine what resources he has to support himself. Liquid assets include "cash, bonds, debentures, stocks, the beneficial interest in assets held in trust and available to be used for maintenance, and any other assets that can readily be converted into cash". Each municipality determines how it will treat assets: no exemptions are set out in the legislation.

Budgetary requirements, or "needs", cover the basic weekly or monthly living costs of the applicant. In addition to amounts for food, clothing, utilities, household supplies, personal requirements, shelter and fuel, the basic allowance may be increased for special diets. The allowance is subject to an overriding maximum which varies with family size.

There is considerably more latitude in the budgetary requirements for Special Assistance. In particular, 20 per cent of the budgetary requirements is included as an additional item to cover contingencies. Actual costs may be included in the budget for items of Special Assistance at the discretion of the local welfare administrator.¹

For General Assistance the allowance is determined, after taking liquid assets into account, by totalling budgetary requirements and deducting income. In general, all income is taken into consideration, but there are some mandatory exemptions including Family and Youth Allowances. There are also the permissive exemptions for part-time earnings. Where income is obtained from providing a service, such as board and lodging, a percentage is applied to arrive at the net income figure.

No needs test for Supplementary Aid is required in the legislation. Any recipient of a "governmental benefit" is eligible.

1. Except for funerals and burials, and the comfort allowance, for which stated amounts are set out in the regulations.

B. Family Benefits

This part of our income maintenance program is relatively new in its present form, having been enacted in 1966 to implement the Canada Assistance Plan. It replaced former categorical programs for the aged, widowed, blind and disabled and allowances for mothers and permanently unemployable fathers. Both of the latter programs had been based on a needs test for a number of years prior to the introduction of the Canada Assistance Plan. Assistance to meet long term needs has been historically one of our priority areas. Mothers' allowances were introduced as early as 1920 and in 1952 the Province of Ontario introduced the first legislation in Canada designed to provide a special program for disabled persons: this became a shared-cost program with the federal government in 1954.

Family Benefits provides for allowances to help people meet their basic needs for food, clothing, shelter and other requirements as indicated above for General Assistance. Although the allowance structure is slightly different, for the most part eligible persons in like circumstances receive the same amounts under both programs.

Family Benefits allowances are provided monthly by the Department of Social and Family Services directly to persons in need. There are 19 field offices throughout the Province; about 400 persons are in the field, two-thirds of whom are direct service staff. Some counselling is provided by field workers. However, this is limited to such problem areas as budgeting and housing: professional counselling is available from other branches. Determination of eligibility is handled centrally in Toronto where applications for assistance are reviewed and checked.

The net allowance is calculated as for General Assistance, i.e. budgetary requirements less income. There are some fixed amounts in this program for special circumstances such as foster mothers. Allowances for residents in Homes for the Aged, Charitable Institutions, Nursing Homes and Homes for Retarded Persons are paid on a per diem basis up to a fixed monthly rate. In addition, these persons receive $15 per month as a comfort allowance for their personal spending.

Recipients of Family Benefits are persons who are likely to require social assistance for some time, i.e. the blind, disabled, aged and sole support mothers with dependent children. They must be in financial need and in one of the following groups:

- (1) A person 65 years of age or over who is not receiving Old Age Security.
- (2) The wife of a man who is receiving Old Age Security, providing she is at least 60 years old and is not eligible in her own right.
- (3) A woman who is between ages 60 and 65 who is living as a single woman (e.g., a widow, an unmarried woman, a woman whose husband is in prison).
- (4) A disabled person who is at least 18 years old and is blind or has an impairment which causes him to be severely limited in activities pertaining to normal living.
- (5) A mother with a dependent child or children:
 - who is a widow;
 - whose husband has deserted her for three months or more;
 - whose husband is in a prison, hospital or similar institution;
 - who is divorced and has not remarried;
 - who is an unmarried woman.

- (6) A dependent father with a dependent child or children.
- (7) A foster mother with a foster child.

The procedure for establishing need for Family Benefits is the same as for General Assistance. Liquid assets are examined and then if these have a value below certain limits, need is determined by totalling budgetary requirements and deducting income. The difference is the amount of the allowance. The definition of liquid assets is almost the same as for General Assistance. There are, however, basic exemptions of assets. For a single person the exemption is $1,000; for families the exemption varies according to the number of family members.

Budgetary requirements cover normal living costs and are set out in schedules. There are a few additional provisions under Family Benefits which are not available under General Assistance because of the particular problems of the recipients. For example, where the recipient is blind or disabled and confined to a wheelchair, a transportation allowance of $30 is provided so that he may travel about the community. An overall allowance maximum varies with family size.

The calculation of income is comparable to that for General Assistance. Family and Youth Allowances are not included as income. Earnings exemptions are mandatory in Family Benefits; they are discretionary in General Assistance. Gross earnings are subject to exemptions so that recipients do not have a dollar deducted from their allowance for every dollar they earn. There is a basic exemption of $24 for the first adult plus an additional $12 for each dependent. This is deducted from gross earnings. Then 25 per cent of the excess of wages and salaries is exempted to encourage people to work. There is then considerable incentive for persons to supplement their earnings with income from employment. Mothers on Family Benefits are limited to a monthly average of 120 hours of remunerative employment.

In order to illustrate the effect of exemption provisions, they have been applied to representative allowances. The column "earnings beyond which ineligible" indicates the maximum annual earnings which a person could receive before he becomes ineligible for assistance. At this earnings level there would no longer be an allowance paid. Since income tax has to be paid on earnings at these levels, a recipient does not necessarily maximize his total net income when he earns these amounts. For a discussion of the taxation problem see page 46.

Source of Payments

There are broad arrangements for sharing the costs of social assistance among the three levels of government: federal, provincial, and municipal. Municipalities and Indian bands make the original outlays for the programs which they administer and then recover part of their expenses from the Province. Through the Canada Assistance Plan there is a general cost-sharing agreement between the Province and the federal government. For Indian bands administering social assistance cost-sharing between the senior levels of government is covered by a separate agreement; and the arrangement carries substantially a larger share of federal financing than in the case of the Canada Assistance Plan.

It should be noted that the general arrangements for cost-sharing provide not only for expenditures on behalf of persons receiving social assistance but also for the costs of administering programs in this field.

Characteristics of Recipients

Detailed statistics on certain characteristics of social assistance recipients and their geographic distribution throughout Ontario are included in the Appendix. A few highlights will be noted here.

Family Size - The average family size in Ontario, based on 1961 census data, is 3.8 persons, that is, for persons living in family units. In contrast the average number of persons in families receiving municipal General Assistance is 4.1. There are regional variations within the province. In southwestern Ontario families receiving General Assistance are approximately the same size as, or slightly smaller than, the average for the general population; in eastern Ontario they are about the same; in northern Ontario families receiving General Assistance are larger than the provincial averages.

Families receiving Family Benefits are smaller in size than those in receipt of General Assistance: the provincial average for the program is 3.6 persons. This is to be expected since the Family Benefits program includes many single-parent families. There are also fewer regional variations from the provincial average than in General Welfare Assistance although large families appear to be more common in northern Ontario.

Families and Single Persons - Almost one-quarter of General Assistance cases are single men; and the incidence is higher in metropolitan centres than in other parts of the province. To cite a few examples: the proportion of single males as a percentage of all cases is 35 per cent in Thunder Bay, 32 per cent in Toronto, 28 per cent in Hamilton, 25 per cent in St. Catharines. But there are notable exceptions to the pattern such as London with 15 per cent and Windsor with 11 per cent. About one case in five is a single female.

Male heads of families comprise a higher than average percentage of all cases in eastern and northern Ontario; female heads of families are higher than the provincial average in southwestern Ontario. The statistics in Table 3 demonstrate an expected relationship: there are seasonal fluctuations in the number of male heads of families in receipt of social assistance. The pattern follows closely the quarterly rate of unemployment in the province.

Slightly more than one-third of all Family Benefits cases are families headed by women. Available data do not allow all aged, disabled and chronic care recipients to be separated into single and family units by sex of head. However, we know that one-half of Family Benefits recipients are single persons, 20 per cent live in two-person units, and 30 per cent in units having three or more persons. Many of the two-person units will be a mother and child; some of the larger groupings will be intact families.

Expenditures per Beneficiary - Variations exist among administrative units in the expenditures per beneficiary for General Assistance. Large urban municipalities tend to have the highest levels. Of the 39 municipalities analyzed, the five largest are among the 10 highest ranking in terms of expenditures per beneficiary; the five smallest are among the 10 lowest ranking in expenditures per beneficiary. It appears that administrative units which have higher than average proportions of single males have higher expenditures per beneficiary. For example, the city of Kingston, although relatively small in population, has an expenditure pattern similar to some of the larger cities; it also has a very high proportion of single males. The larger town of Mississauga has a lower level of expenditures per beneficiary and a low proportion of single males.

Among county units of administration population size has little significance in explaining the pattern of expenditures. The larger county units seem to have lower expenditure levels than the smaller ones. For instance, the counties of Wellington and Oxford are smaller than York or Simcoe, yet have higher per beneficiary expenditures. It should be noted that there are many unknown factors which cannot be taken into account. For example, the number of beneficiary days paid for in each administrative unit is not known. In some areas where there is a very high turn over of cases, there may be many beneficiaries who received benefits for only one or two weeks in a month. Averaging caseloads and payments over a month may depress the payments per beneficiary in these units. In other units where recipients are continuously on social assistance for long periods of time, average beneficiary expenditures per month would more closely represent actual amounts received by recipients. Table 3 gives some indication of fluctuations in caseloads. Composition of the caseload by administrative unit is known only in terms of very gross characteristics; recipients have different needs which cannot be extracted from statistics on payments alone. Thus there may be differences due to allowances for fuel, shelter, diets, utilities and other partially discretionary items. There is some evidence from Table 3 that there may be a core of permanently dependent people on General Assistance; the numbers of employable and unemployable heads of families are not known and income from earnings cannot be determined. Also municipalities have considerable latitude in determining eligibility. Intensive study is required to determine more conclusively why payments vary.

In Family Benefits average expenditures per beneficiary fluctuate within a narrower range than is the case for General Assistance. The most significant cause of variations is the shelter component of Family Benefits allowances. Shelter payments are related to actual expenditures and these differ from one place to another across Ontario. Expenditures per beneficiary are higher than for General Assistance. One reason is that payments are always for a full month whereas General Assistance may be paid for a shorter period. When averaged over an entire month General Assistance average expenditures per beneficiary will therefore be lower. There may also be other important factors such as differences in the case composition, differences in the amounts provided for items included in the budgets, etcetera. It should perhaps be noted again that there are more beneficiaries per case in General Assistance than in Family Benefits. Since allowances per beneficiary decrease with each additional person in a case, it follows that Family Benefits expenditures per beneficiary would be somewhat higher on the average.

Case Composition - The Family Benefits caseload is composed as follows:

Aged	18%
Disabled	45%
Mothers	34%
Others	3%

The aged group consists of women between the ages of 60 and 65 and persons over age 65 who are not eligible for an Old Age Security pension. From a previous review of the disabled group, it is known that about one in three is mentally retarded.

Geographical Distribution of Social Assistance Cases - In northern and eastern Ontario a significantly higher proportion of the total assessed population is in receipt of social assistance than in most other parts of the Province. The range of social assistance cases as a percentage of the assessed population in southern Ontario is 1 per cent to 5 per cent; in northern Ontario the range is 4 per cent to 11 per cent (the City of Sudbury and District of Sudbury are 4 per cent, the other units 6 per cent or greater); in eastern Ontario the range is 6 per cent to 9 per cent.

III. INCOME MAINTENANCE : MAJOR CHALLENGES

A. Problems in Provincial Government Income Maintenance Programs

There are two obvious points of difference between the Family Benefits and General Welfare Assistance programs:

Family Benefits is administered directly by the province with field operations handled through 19 regional offices. General Welfare Assistance is administered by municipalities (except in northern Ontario).

The Family Benefits population is comprised of individuals and heads of families whose dependency appears to be long term. General Welfare Assistance covers a mixed group of persons whose needs may be either immediate and short term; or immediate and longer term, (more accurately of indeterminate length).

It is simplistic to contrast the two programs in terms of short term versus long term income maintenance populations. Yet the fact that each has been developed to handle one extreme rather than the other has significant implications for the operations of each program.

The two programs will be analyzed separately in the following sections.

Family Benefits

Eligibility determination - The process of determining eligibility has been structured so that initial information gathering is separated from final decision making. The field staff take information from applicants and send completed applications and supporting documents to the Department of Social and Family Services in Toronto where the determination of eligibility is made and the actual amount of allowance is calculated. The system is designed to secure the advantage of consistency through centralized decision making.

There are three broad substantive areas in which persons applying for an allowance under Family Benefits must establish eligibility.

(1) They must be resident in Ontario.

(2) They must come within at least one of the classes of persons eligible for an allowance under the Act. Family Benefits is designed to aid people who are disadvantaged in their capacity to support themselves and their families for reasons such as blindness, physical and mental disability, old age, and family responsibilities in the case of sole support mothers. The criteria in certain categories are necessarily limiting in definition: for instance the three month waiting period for deserted mothers, the five year period of separation for a wife aged 60 to 64, the establishing of 18 years as the minimum age of eligibility for a blind or disabled person.

(3) They must be "persons in need" as that phrase is defined by the financial test incorporated in the program.

Several steps are required to complete the eligibility process. The relevant facts must be established. This includes information on the applicant, on other persons in the family, and on total financial resources.

Certain points must be documented. The Family Benefits regulations require proof of vital statistics including birthdates, deaths, marriages. Further documentary evidence may be required according to the circumstances of the individual case.

Information provided by an applicant is normally verified by a field worker. Since the financial test under Family Benefits is a needs test, this means investigation of both sides of the financial equation.

All these procedures need not be completed prior to the establishing of eligibility. In fact there has been a trend in recent years toward permitting greater latitude in this area. There may however be difficulties for a few applicants: it is possible that an application may fail on a technical point of eligibility.

Needs Test - The Family Benefits program operates on the basis of a needs test which requires intensive investigation of financial resources. The test is efficient in ensuring that assistance is directed only to those who need it; but the procedures of detailed financial investigation raise certain problems. One common viewpoint is given characteristic expression in this comment by Dr. James Cutt: "In many respects the most disagreeable aspect of traditional income maintenance measures has been the . . . comprehensive examination of the individual means and resources of each applicant as the basis of financial assistance."¹ It should be noted, however, that there is a paucity of studies on the attitudes of recipients themselves. A recent American study on recipients of Aid to Families with Dependent Children - a program which is wide ranging in its investigatory powers - indicated that over 80 per cent of the recipients did not mind, or minded very little, the process of investigating their financial resources.² It is our intention to explore this dimension of needs testing in an attitudes survey of "mothers" on Family Benefits in Metro Toronto scheduled for later in 1970.

There is some evidence to indicate that the most controversial areas of resource testing are those intimately involving the personal lives of recipients. Approximately one-third of the Family Benefits population consists of mothers with dependent children. In cases in which there is a husband or father living, one aspect of needs testing is to determine whether aid is available from this source. For deserted wives and unwed mothers this may involve recourse to procedures under legislation designated to elicit financial support. The criticism is that such procedures may intrude on the privacy and dignity of the individual. There are similar problems in investigatory procedures to determine whether women are living as "single persons".

It is relevant to observe that there are conflicting currents of public opinion in this area which create a dilemma for public policy. There is a social belief embodied in law, that a husband or father is responsible for the support of his dependents according to his financial resources and that a man living in a household as a husband should contribute to the support of that household. The policy implication is that this resource must be explored, and procedures to this end are necessary to legitimate the costs of public assistance to a certain section of the voting and tax-paying public. A differing point of view, frequently voiced by civil rights workers and professional social workers, emphasizes the rights and dignity of the individual recipient. There is a third point of view implicit in the acceptance among a segment of the public, of the concept of the guaranteed annual income. Its operative procedures could by-pass both the categorical approach to public assistance and the exploring of potential resources as a condition of eligibility. At present needs tested income maintenance programs, inspite of certain inherent advantages, occupy a controversial position.

The Family Benefits program covers a variety of people in differing circumstances; the basic allowance provides the essentials common to all categories. There are additional items for certain recipients: special diets, a travel allowance for the blind and disabled, life insurance premiums where there is a dependent child, house repairs as a discretionary item. But there is no general provision for contingency items, particularly important for some categories of recipients. The local municipality retains a residual responsibility for those of its residents who are recipients of Family Benefits. Application can be made to the municipality for supplementary aid (to a maximum of $20 shareable with the province) or special assistance (for certain items only); but any assistance which the municipality gives is entirely at its option. Structurally the General Welfare Assistance program is well adapted for providing aid efficiently and rapidly, often the essence of emergency assistance, but there are additional costs, administrative problems and sometimes hardships for applicants in screening through two programs.

There is an unresolved problem in the area of providing contingency aid. It is not a problem which is unique to Family Benefits. It applies to other income maintenance programs such as Old Age Security from which recourse must also be made to the municipality when additional assistance is required. And it is a problem which may be projected into the future in the event that some form of guaranteed income is implemented. From the studies we have made of guaranteed annual income plans it is evident they cannot entirely replace needs tested income maintenance programs.

Needs testing involves a continuing process of assessing eligibility and adjusting allowances to changing circumstances. When circumstances on either side of the needs equation change, they are likely to affect either entitlement to allowance or the amount of the allowance under Family Benefits. For some individuals and for some categories of recipients there may be few changes over a relatively long period of time. But for others there may be frequent changes, for instance, income can change from month to month when part time earnings or rental of rooms is involved. The Family Benefits allowance is established on a monthly basis. When recipients fail to notify the Department of such changes and a visit from a field worker does not occur for several months, complex calculations are necessary to make the requisite changes in allowances. Where an overpayment has been made by the Department, arrears are usually recovered by reducing the allowance for a period of time, with the exceptions noted below.

Recent changes in the regulations make it possible to average income over a period of months in several instances. For blind and disabled cases income from work may be averaged over a period up to six months. Some forms of income are likely to be irregular and payments may apply retroactively, among them, various pension and insurance benefits and payments from husbands and fathers. It is now possible for such income to be averaged over the number of months to which they apply.

Adjusting allowances according to the basic concept of a needs test is a highly complex and detailed procedure. Simplification in this area is a desirable goal.

General Welfare Assistance

The General Welfare Assistance program is administered by municipalities in southern Ontario and by the Province in northern areas without municipal organization. The Act and regulations set out provincial standards which are applied by the municipalities. General Welfare Assistance is a highly decentralized system in contrast to Family Benefits which maintains regional offices for purposes of administration but with decision making centralized at the provincial level.

It should be noted that General Welfare Assistance is an outgrowth of the original municipal responsibility for the care of the local poor. The province has gradually extended its interest in this field through subsidization of municipal costs and the establishment of basic standards. It is apparent that a system in which responsibility was exclusively municipal would result in wide discrepancies in the standards of social assistance. In contrast a provincially administered system would face serious problems of inter-regional economic disparities noted in the next section. The present program occupies a middle position with the province asserting a broad interest in the standards maintained by the municipalities but leaving them flexibility to adapt the system, within bounds, to local needs. The precise point at which the two are in balance is a matter of opinion.³

Eligibility - "Persons in need" according to the financial requirements of the program are only eligible where the causes of need are "inability to obtain regular employment, lack of the principal family provider, disability or old age". The criteria exclude most of the working poor for reasons which are fully analyzed in a later section of our brief.⁴ There is, however, an additional problem area. Centralization as in Family Benefits leads to consistency in decisions about eligibility. Decentralization is likely to result in differing applications by municipalities of the eligibility provisions written into the provincial program. When categories are broadly stated ("disability") or where they are problematic ("inability to obtain regular employment"), municipal interpretations may differ. Sometimes there are locally and provincially contentious issues about entitlement to support. The size of the municipality and its resource base, the amount of the welfare budget, the ability of the local staff to cope scientifically and sympathetically with complex situations, these factors and others influence municipal decisions on the provision of general assistance to certain applicants as well as on other aspects of the program.

Variations in entitlement are significant for optional forms of assistance. Special assistance is available for certain important items including non-insurable health expenses such as optical and dental services for "persons in need" as defined by the regulations. But, like supplementary aid for recipients of Old Age Security and Family Benefits, special assistance is provided at the discretion of the municipality. Eligible applicants may be refused despite demonstrable need.

Definition of need - Economic differences among municipalities also affect the definition of "needs". The level of allowance is a particular problem since the General Welfare Assistance program provides for unemployed but employable persons: the relationship between their standards of living on social assistance and the community standard of living, particularly of their peers who are employed, is inevitably a source of concern to the municipality. The General Welfare Assistance program recognizes inter-municipal differences by having the pre-added budget which is identical across the province include only these items: food, clothing and personal requirements. For utilities and household supplies the local welfare administrator has the option of determining an amount up to a maximum. The shelter allowance based on actual expenditures also reflects differential costs of living between areas (although it does not reflect the whole range because of the application of a shelter maximum).

There is a degree of flexibility built into the program so that allowances can be adjusted according to local economic conditions. It should be noted however that in the absence, inter alia, of community budgetary studies there is no precise indication of what the relevant economic differentials are between communities and it is not clear how accurately these are reflected in the levels of general assistance established by the municipalities.

3. On the alternatives of provincial or municipal administration of public assistance the Ontario Committee on Taxation has commented: "That the local government, as the level of jurisdiction closest to home, is peculiarly well suited to the dispensation of welfare services constitutes one of the time-honored canons of public administration. Indeed, so hallowed is the canon that it might better be called a cliché. But like most clichés, it is backed by a strong element of truth whose simplicity is startling. Welfare services must start and finish with a personal confrontation between the applicant and a representative of the appropriate welfare service in the community".

4. See p. 39 and ff.

Regional disparities have created problems for the federal government in incorporating standards in the programs it administers nationally. Within a province as large and diversified as Ontario there are somewhat comparable problems in defining needs in relation to community standards. This is one of the major problems of needs tested income maintenance programs, particularly those providing assistance to employable recipients.

Administration - It appears evident that with 500 municipal governments administering General Welfare Assistance there will be significant differences in the administrative standards and in the somewhat intangible dimension of styles of welfare administration. The provincial Act and regulations set out the framework within which the municipalities must operate. Many administrative details are decided at the local level. In addition to the statutory application and other forms distributed by the province, municipalities may devise their own forms for use in administering the program locally and investigatory procedures may be tailored to local standards. (The problems inherent in the investigatory process outlined in connection with Family Benefits are compounded at the local level and most of the criticisms of infringement of privacy and individual rights are directed at municipal practices designed to detect fraud.)

Municipalities which vary in size from small villages to large cities such as Metropolitan Toronto obviously have differing resources with which to operate a public assistance program. It is not necessary to generalize about the optimum size of an administrative unit in this field in order to suggest that there is a size below which it is not feasible to develop such resources as full time personnel. Hence the Province has encouraged the formation of county units and district welfare administration boards which have replaced the individual administration of General Welfare Assistance by almost one half of the municipalities in Ontario. There are at present 23 multi-municipal units administering public assistance, including Metropolitan Toronto and two regional governments.

The creation of consolidated units does not automatically obviate the problems which can arise in a decentralized system of administration. It does however provide a basis for higher standards of professionalism in the administration of the program.

Assets - The legislation is silent about the treatment of nonliquid assets and there are no requirements setting out exemptions of liquid assets. Assets readily convertible into cash are to be used for maintenance. Given the goal of preventing a state of prolonged dependence on social assistance, it may be desirable to exempt some resources for short term recipients so that they have both the opportunity and possibly the incentive to regain their independence. Exemptions of assets have been incorporated in long term programs of social assistance such as Family Benefits. There are greater difficulties in extending the principle to General Welfare Assistance. It is none the less an area for study in relation to the emerging concept of rehabilitation as one of the goals of social assistance programs.

Linkage between Family Benefits and General Welfare Assistance programs - The two provincial income maintenance programs are closely related. Many recipients pass from one program to the other. Thus Family Benefits recipients may receive General Assistance

- (1) prior to establishing eligibility for Family Benefits;
- (2) in case of a suspension from Family Benefits for some reason;
- (3) when eligibility for Family Benefits no longer exists, most frequently in the case of a "mother" whose family is grown.

In a random sample drawn from mothers receiving Family Benefits in Metropolitan Toronto over 80 per cent had transferred to the provincial program from General Welfare Assistance. Transfers sometimes create problems because the conditions of eligibility are not identical in the two programs. There are for instance asset exemptions in Family Benefits but not in General Assistance and thus some people may be disadvantaged in the process of transferring from one program to another.

When Family Benefits recipients become ineligible for the program they may at some time have to apply for General Assistance. Suspensions and cancellations may occur for a variety of reasons including excess financial resources, infraction of regulations, full-time employment. In some cases this may mean that a recipient has become financially independent. In other circumstances it may result in an application to a municipality for General Assistance. The cancellation or suspension of a Family Benefits Allowance may be a serious matter; its consequences are mitigated by the existence of the General Welfare Assistance program as a court of last resort.

The flow of people between the two programs has not yet been precisely documented. The interrelationship cannot be adequately understood until more detailed statistical information is available on both programs. This is an area in which analysis is required so that an adequate profile of individuals and families in receipt of provincial income maintenance can be obtained. It is the intention of the Department to carry out a study of General Welfare Assistance and Family Benefits with this objective in view. In future additional data may be provided through the use of surveys to supplement the information systems of the Department.

Information and Communication - The provision of information about social assistance programs is a question which has several dimensions. There is the problem of providing detailed information about specific aspects of a program where the legislation is silent. In both Family Benefits and General Welfare Assistance the pre-added budget set out in the regulations is not broken down into its component allowances. The technique of using a pre-added budget which incorporates several items adjusted for families of varying size and age composition is administratively efficient and reduces the number of questions which applicants must answer in order to establish their needs. It is not possible for recipients to know how this part of their basic allowance is made up.

The question of providing detailed information should be set in the broader perspective of "the right to know". To what extent should information be widely available on social assistance programs? The salient point concerns the provision of information in readily accessible form to those most directly concerned, the recipients of social assistance. Information is supplied in response to individual enquiries and brief descriptions of programs are available. But at a time when recipients are becoming actively interested in knowing the full details of programs and their legal entitlement to benefits, more systematic approaches may be appropriate.

Needs tested income maintenance programs are complex and not easily explained. Some recipients are disadvantaged in their ability to comprehend. Despite these problems, the provision of information is an important area for development in both Family Benefits and General Welfare Assistance programs. The Department plans to introduce handbooks which will provide basic information to interested persons.

Information, moreover, has a larger dimension than merely providing recipients with details about the operation of a specific program. The emerging role of departmental field staff emphasizes the concept of providing services to clients. This includes informing clients about services available through other agencies and programs, in short, attempting to link programs through the medium of communication with clients.

It is also important that there be a feedback of information from clients about programs. The Department believes that communication is a two-way street.

B. Problems in Federal Government Income Maintenance Programs

There are a number of federal government income maintenance programs operating in Ontario. The three most important programs are: Family and Youth Allowances, Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement and Unemployment Insurance. Ontario social assistance programs for the most part are cost-shared through the Canada Assistance Plan which requires a needs test approach incorporating both income and resources. Although needs testing is unappealing to some people it has two major advantages. It ensures that payments are restricted to those whose income and other resources are insufficient to sustain them and as payments are related to needs it ensures that individual needs (as defined by the legislation) are met.

In contrast, none of the three major federal government programs involves a needs test. Family and Youth Allowances and the basic Old Age Security program are categorical demogrants and are distributed without regard to the needs of the recipient. The Guaranteed Income Supplement is income tested and Unemployment Insurance is earnings related. The present mixed approach of these three programs produces two conflicting and undesirable results. Either scarce funds are distributed to individuals who do not need them and/or the benefits do not meet the needs of the recipient.

The Family and Youth Allowances Program

The Family and Youth Allowances program (including the related Family Assistance Program) affects over 1,000,000 Ontario families. Family Allowances are available to every child under 16 years of age who was born in Canada or who has resided here for one year. Payments are $6 per month for each child under age 10 and $8 for each child over 10 years of age but under 16 years. A virtually identical program known as Family Assistance offers the same benefits to children under 16 years of age who have not resided in Canada for one year and is intended to bridge the gap until the child is eligible for Family Allowances. The Youth Allowances program is a somewhat more restrictive demogrant which provides a monthly payment of $10 per month (except in Quebec) to all dependent children age 16 and 17 who are either full time students or precluded from full time educational training by reason of physical or mental infirmity.

The three programs are similar and are collectively referred to as Family Allowances in this section except as otherwise noted. While there are some minor restrictions, the Family Allowance program is a categorical demogrant, subject to neither income nor resource testing and is distributed to all eligible families regardless of their need. It might be said that the system is needs oriented as the payments increase with the size of the family and the age of the children. However, as the same payments are made to identical families regardless of their income, i.e., whether they are well below the poverty line or in an 80 per cent marginal tax bracket, the needs orientation is somewhat questionable.

Family Allowances like all demogrant systems, have certain advantages. As all eligible families are entitled to allowances regardless of their needs the program does not distinguish between the poor and the non-poor and allowances are not viewed as welfare payments.⁵ Administration is simple and inexpensive. The major disadvantage of any demogrant system is that payments are made to all eligible families regardless of their need. As poor families are in the minority most funds are paid to the non-poor and considerable "leakage" occurs. Payments to the non-poor divert scarce resources from those who need them and reduce the redistributive effect.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has stated that the program was originally intended to provide for a redistribution of income in favour of low income families and low income regions of the country and noted that the objectives of the program are still being met, but to a much lesser extent than earlier as family allowances have not kept pace with the growth in national income and the purchasing power of Canadian families.⁶

5. In contrast, social assistance payments are viewed as welfare by some persons although they are provided as a right under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Although the effect has diminished over time the program is undoubtedly redistributive. Family Allowances redistribute income vertically to low income families with children (including families receiving social assistance). Funds are taxed from single persons and childless couples and transferred to families with children. Horizontal redistribution occurs as funds from Ontario and some other provinces are transferred to less affluent regions. However the point is not one of whether income redistribution takes place, but rather:

How much income redistribution takes place, and

Whether the amount of income redistribution is acceptable in terms of the cost of the program.

The Department of Social and Family Services is not aware of any up-to-date study on the present redistributive effect of the Family Allowance program. A number of studies have been published in the past. However they have been carried out at different times and some of their conclusions are not totally compatible. It has been noted that "the amount of income redistribution between income groups, family types and geographical regions is much smaller than the amount of money turned over in the program would suggest."⁷

While the precise amount of redistribution is unknown it is relatively simple to determine the approximate proportion of Family Allowance payments which are made to non-poor families. The estimates in Table 4 (see page 10) indicate that approximately 13.4 per cent of Ontario families have incomes below the poverty line. The estimates are gross calculations and do not distinguish between families who are receiving Family Allowances and those which are either composed of adults or have no eligible children. Despite this shortcoming they can be used to illustrate the magnitude of payments to the non-poor, or "leakage" in the Family Allowance program.

If it is assumed that the incidence of poverty among families receiving the Family Allowance approximates the incidence among all Ontario families, then approximately 87 per cent of Ontario families who receive the allowances are above the poverty line. Even if it is assumed that the incidence of families receiving the allowances is understated by as much as 50 per cent then approximately 80 per cent of families receiving the allowance would be non-poor. Conversely if it is assumed that the incidence among eligible families below the poverty line is lower due to the disproportionate percentage of two person families in the poverty group then the leakage estimate would have to be something in excess of 87 per cent.

It might be argued that the percentage of total payments is less than the percentage of families who are above the poverty line as the "poor have more children." However the estimates would indicate that while the incidence of poverty tends to increase with family unit size the number of non-poor families is consistently far in excess of those below the poverty line regardless of family unit size and therefore this factor would not have a significant effect.

In any case it matters little whether the amount of leakage is 80 per cent or 87 per cent. The key question concerns the magnitude of leakage in terms of the cost of the system. The Department of National Health and Welfare Annual Statistical Report for 1968-69 contains annual expenditure data for the entire Family Allowance program. Total expenditures for Family and Youth Allowances and Family Assistance in 1968-69 were approximately $616 million of which $216 million went to Ontario families. If an 80 per cent "leakage" rate is assumed then only $43 million was paid to poor families whereas $173 million was paid to families who were above the poverty line, in Ontario. This would mean that for every 100 dollars in Family Allowances payments only 20 dollars went to a family below the poverty line.

The problem is compounded by the income tax system. The leakage would be reduced but by no means eliminated if some of the funds were taxed back; but Family Allowances are not subject to taxation. Until recently the income tax system created a very minor redistributive effect by allowing a $550 deduction for children who were not eligible and restricting the deduction for eligible children to $300. As the reduced deduction was compulsory regardless of whether or not the family received the allowance, taxpayers at higher marginal rates received less in allowances than the value of the lost portion of the deduction. This particular provision was (and still is) cited to illustrate the redistributive nature of the program by exponents of the Family Allowance system. Its re-distributive effect was extremely limited. However the Income Tax Act has been amended and the relationship between the amount of the deduction for dependent children and eligibility for Family Allowances has been eliminated. Deductions for dependent children are set at $300 for a child under age 16 and $550 for a child over 16, regardless of whether or not the child is eligible for, or in receipt of Family Allowances.

The question is then not whether the program has a redistributive effect but rather whether the cost of the program is reasonable in relation to its relative efficiency and the magnitude of the poverty problem. Is it either reasonable or efficient to continue a demogrant program when even cautious estimates indicate that at least 80 per cent of its payments in Ontario go to the non-poor? It could be argued that Family Allowances benefit all children and hence the cost is not unreasonable. However the major aim of the program as stated by the Department of National Health and Welfare was to "provide for a redistribution of income in favor of low income families and low income regions of the country." The program still has some redistributive effect, but the effect is not high enough and the cost is too great in relation to benefits received by the poor. Furthermore scarce tax dollars are directed to families who do not need them while the needs of low income families are not met.

The Department of Social and Family Services is aware that recommendations have been made to the Federal Government concerning the Family Allowance system. Basically these proposals recommend increases in Family Allowance payments offset by taxation of these payments. The basic argument can be paraphrased as follows: doubling Family Allowances would benefit the poor and particularly the working poor whereas much of the cost would be recovered by taxation.

The Department is in accord with the intent of these recommendations and agrees that increased Family Allowances would benefit the poor. However the degree of leakage would still be excessive even if the allowances were made subject to either the existing or proposed income tax system. The point can be readily illustrated through the use of gross data. (See Table 8)

Table 8 has been deliberately weighted in favor of the proposal. It is based on two unrealistic assumptions. It assumes that the average rate of recovery from the non-poor would be 30 per cent of the allowances, which is unlikely. It assumes that none of the payments to the poor will be recovered.

8. The present tax system applies a 30 per cent marginal rate on taxable income between $8,000 and $10,000. If one allows for personal exemptions this would mean that three, four and five person families would have to have gross incomes in excess of $10,400, $10,700 and $11,000 in order to pay that rate. The 1967 Preliminary Estimates of Income Distribution and Poverty in Canada indicate that approximately 25 per cent of three, four and five person families had gross family incomes in excess of $10,000. Tax returns are made on an individual basis whereas gross family income may represent the total income of two or more family members. While incomes have risen since 1967 it is very unlikely that 30 per cent of payments to the non-poor would be recovered through the tax system.

(a) Eighty per cent of payments are assumed to go to families above the poverty line.

(b) It is assumed that 30 per cent of payments to the non poor will be recovered but all payments to poor families will be retained.

Actually one of the effects of the proposal is that a large segment of the working poor would pay taxes on their allowances whereas social assistance recipients would receive the full benefit.

The Table indicates that even with taxation of the doubled allowance, leakage would still amount to approximately 73 per cent of payments. Although net costs would increase by $320 million, only $123 million, or 38 per cent of the new expenditure, would go to poor families. The greatest part of the funds would still go to the non-poor and leakage would increase to a total of $690 million. The fundamental inefficiencies of the demogrant approach cannot be offset by merely making Family Allowances taxable.

The demogrant approach cannot be justified either in terms of the cost of the program or in the light of the needs of the working poor. Advocates of demogrant systems justify the approach on the grounds of administrative simplicity and the acceptability of the universal payments. Neither argument is unavailable.

Administrative simplicity undoubtedly facilitates economy and efficiency. These are managerial criteria intended to ensure that the objectives of any specific program are met. One major objective of the Family Allowances system is to redistribute funds to low income families. The economic advantages which accrue from the administrative simplicity of the program are insignificant in comparison with the dollars lost through leakage of scarce resources.

There are two main arguments in favor of universal Family Allowances.

Universal payments appear to meet the test of public acceptability.

Since payments are made to all families the poor are not set apart from the affluent and there is no stigma attached to receipt of the allowance.

Universal payments are, in the common wisdom, synonymous with public acceptability. The question is whether they are acceptable simply because they are universal. Old Age Security and Family Allowances are paid to groups outside the labor force who have traditionally been given first priority in social assistance. The aged and the young are economically vulnerable because they are at stages of dependency in the life cycle. Aid to them does not challenge the work ethic of society. Indeed it has a positive appeal. The young should not be penalized because of family circumstances; the old, it is assumed, have made their contribution to society. The acceptability of the universal demogrants is partially attributable to the special characteristics of the groups receiving them.

It is evident that the principle of universal demogrants is well established in Canada. The belief that "everyone benefits" or at least that benefits are widespread undoubtedly helps to legitimate programs to the voting public. But in recent years there has been increasing criticism of the universalist approach, particularly for Family Allowances. Among the reasons for the shifting viewpoint is the apparently unsatisfactory relationship between the cost and the effectiveness of the program. In this context the argument that selective payments are socially divisive may be losing its relevance.

The argument that demogrants do not separate the poor from the affluent may be illusory. The use of flat rate demogrants limits the amount of expenditure which is paid to each recipient. Any government program is limited in its expenditures and, since demogrants are paid to all eligible persons regardless of need, the payment level must be relatively low. The Family Allowance system is a striking example of this phenomenon. At present monthly payments are $6 and $8 for each child, depending upon age. If the program concentrated on the needs of families below the poverty line payments could be increased to four or five times their existing level. Cost considerations prohibit such high levels of allowances in a classic demogrant approach.

The Committee is vitally concerned with the problem of the working poor, who are primarily low income families with children. Such families receive Family Allowances but their incomes are still inadequate for their needs since the allowances are not sufficient to raise their incomes to the poverty line. If the working poor received supplementation under the Canada Assistance Plan they would have to meet a needs test or, assuming modification is possible, an income test. Needs and income tests separate the haves from the have nots. It is true that the use of a demogrant avoids directly identifying the poor but it is defective because low payments will not satisfy their needs. If they cannot increase their earnings and social assistance is provided they must comply with tests and be identified in the process. If social assistance is not provided their needs are not met and a subsistence standard of living identifies them as poor.

The needs of the poor are real. The leakage in the Family Allowance system cannot be justified in terms of public acceptability, simplicity of administration, or a dubious anonymity.

If the Family Allowance system is retained, it should be converted to a selective system which provides meaningful benefits to the poor and the near-poor. (In this section we have stressed two groups: the poor and the non-poor. In terms of revision in the Family Allowance system the needs of the near poor, those just above the poverty line, should be taken into consideration.) In theory the system could be made selective by either:

Converting the program to an income tested negative rates system somewhat similar to the Guaranteed Income Supplement; or Creating a highly selective demogrant program through coordination of the Family Allowance and Income Tax systems.

The second alternative differs from recommendations that Family Allowances should be doubled and made taxable. The allowances could be substantially increased and made available to all eligible families regardless of income. The tax system could then be modified either by reducing (or eliminating) deductions for dependent children or by adding a surcharge. The modified program would recover payments from all but the poor and the near poor and create precisely the same effect as an income tested system. Retention of the demogrant approach would have the frequently cited advantages of universality and simplicity of administration while ensuring that income was transferred only to those requiring it.

The alternatives have been set out without taking into consideration difficulties inherent in the constitutional division of powers. With the exception of the present program of Old Age Security and supplementary benefits there is some doubt that the federal government has the constitutional authority to make selective payments to a specific class or classes of persons.⁹ The

9. Thus Bora Laskin writes: "It has become a truism of Canadian constitutional law that judicial interpretation of the British North America Act has given the Provinces specific legislative authority (especially in respect of social services) that far exceeds their financial resources and their money raising powers while it has left the Dominion with financial resources through an ample taxing power overshadowing its regulatory authority Within this framework (i.e. The British North America Act) the Dominion and the Provinces have had to meet and satisfy the claims and demands for various forms of public assistance. Hence the development of grants-in-aid by the Dominion to the Provinces and the growth of what may be called a Federal spending power involving disbursement of money on stipulated conditions but without any right of compulsory direction or regulation of the beneficiaries" problem of jurisdiction might arise if the federal government attempted to apply the negative rates approach to the Family Allowance system or used its taxing power to achieve selectivity.

Laskin, Bora, Canadian Constitutional Law, Toronto: Carswell, 1969, p.665-66.

The Department suggests that it would be more appropriate to transfer funds expended in the Family Allowances program to the provinces which have the authority to distribute them selectively. The provinces could then establish income tested programs which would distribute the funds to lower income families. This would substantially alleviate the problem of the working poor.

Old Age Security and the Guaranteed Income Supplement

The objective of the Old Age Security program "has been to provide a basic pension as a floor on which Canadians could build a retirement income." The benefit is a categorical demogrant of $79.58 per month (1970 figure) available to all individuals who meet the age and residence requirements, regardless of their needs.

The complementary Guaranteed Income Supplement program is intended to provide additional income support for old age pensioners who because of age will not be assisted by the Canada and Quebec Pension Plans. The supplement is income-tested and Old Age Security recipients who have no other taxable income are entitled to the maximum benefit of $31.83 per month (1970 figure). The supplement is reduced by approximately $1 for each two dollars of taxable income over the basic Old Age Security payment.¹⁰ The use of a selective supplement ensures that additional funds are provided only to pensioners in need.

The basic Old Age Security demogrant system does not involve as high a degree of leakage as the Family Allowance program. This is due to two factors:

The incidence of income deficiency is high in the 65 and over age group.

Since Old Age Security payments are taxable, some of the leakage is returned through the income tax mechanism.

While the Old Age Security demogrant is much more efficient than the Family Allowance system it does incorporate a considerable amount of leakage. The Department of National Health and Welfare Annual Statistical Report for 1968-69, provides annual expenditure data for the Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement program in Ontario. Total net payments for Ontario were approximately $475 million for Old Age Security and $75 million for Guaranteed Income Supplement totalling $550 million. Approximately 314,000 (or 57 per cent) of the 554,000 Ontario pensioners did not receive a Guaranteed Income Supplement. Pensioners who are ineligible would have incomes which would approximate or exceed the poverty line. This means that most pensioners not receiving the supplement would have incomes above the poverty line. However it does not follow that all their Old Age Security payments represent leakage since a significant proportion of pensioners who do not receive the supplement would have incomes below the poverty line if they were not receiving Old Age Security.

It is possible to obtain a rough approximation of the degree of leakage in the Old Age Security program by examining income distribution within the 65+ age group. The Dominion Bureau of Statistics 1967 income estimates illustrate income distribution among the aged in two broad categories: individuals and the combined group of individuals and families. The estimates indicate that 20 per cent of individuals 65 and over had annual incomes in excess of $2,999 per year; and 23 per cent of individuals and families with heads 65 or over had incomes in excess of $4,999.¹¹ Pensioners in those categories would have incomes above the poverty line even if they did not receive Old Age Security. Therefore one could estimate that, in terms of annual income, more than 20 per cent of all Old Age Security recipients are non-poor.

10. Non-taxable income such as social assistance payments do not affect the level of the supplement. This is an interesting contradiction. Although the Family Allowance system is far less effective its allowances are not taxed. Conversely, Old Age Security pensions which involve considerably less leakage are taxable.

Annual income may not be a totally satisfactory criterion for estimating poverty among the aged. The American experience would indicate that poverty among the aged should be viewed in terms of the normal life cycle of income.¹²

The normal life cycle of income presents a somewhat different problem in the definition of poverty. The low incomes of some young people are not indicative of poverty: Consider impecunious students of law or medicine with years of lucrative practice ahead of them. Neither are the low incomes of many old people who are living comfortably by gradually consuming assets they accumulated before retiring. Distributions of annual income exaggerate economic inequality by including differences due to age and position in the life cycle. Unfortunately we do not have good estimates of inequality of lifetime incomes.

When wealth is considered, along with one-year income, in the definition of poverty, the estimated prevalence of poverty among the aged is reduced by about a third.¹³

The Department is not suggesting that the leakage in the Old Age Security program should be completely eliminated. Much of it goes to near-poor pensioners who would be severely affected if their pensions were cut off or substantially reduced. However while the incidence of poverty is high among the aged, not all the aged are poor, particularly when assets are taken into account. The 1967 Dominion Bureau of Statistics estimates indicate that 10 per cent of all individuals and families with heads 65 or older had incomes which were in excess of $8,000 annually.¹⁴ Even that calculation is based upon income only and does not allow for assets. The Special Senate Committee on Poverty, has commented on the cost of combating poverty and has on several occasions expressed concern regarding the source of funds for new and improved programs. The Department of Social and Family Services is simply drawing attention to the fact that the national Old Age Security program, excluding the Guaranteed Income Supplement, cost $1.3 billion in 1968-69. Approximately 10 per cent of that amount appears to be distributed to persons whose incomes are well above the poverty line.

The Unemployment Insurance Program

The Unemployment Insurance Commission brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty cited terms of coverage, benefit levels, eligibility, contingencies and improved integration as possible areas for improvement in the unemployment insurance program. The Department of Social and Family Services contends that these possible areas for improvement are in fact serious shortcomings and that major revisions are urgently required. While the inadequacies of the program affect wage and salary earners whose incomes are well above the poverty line they impact most heavily upon the working poor.¹⁵

Coverage - Certain forms of low wage employment are excluded from unemployment insurance coverage. Workers in hospitals and charitable institutions and employees in private domestic services are classified as non-insurable. Their exclusion is discriminatory and cannot be justified in terms of occupational characteristics or stability of employment. Similar employees in other sectors are not excluded and coverage is extended to workers in highly seasonal employment.¹⁶ Benefit Levels - The unemployment insurance benefit system works to the disadvantage of the working poor. Benefit levels are related to an individual's earnings and like earnings they are not related to individual needs. The working poor are most affected as they suffer from low wages and hence low benefits. For example if the working head of a five person family earns $65 per week he pays an employee deduction of 80 cents. His benefit level is based upon the average rate of the thirty most recent contribution weeks. Assuming earnings do not fluctuate and he is eligible in all other respects he would be entitled to a dependency benefit of $33 per week. This benefit would be the same regardless of the number of dependents. His low wages limit his contributions and his contributions determine his benefits. When unemployment occurs the gap between his resources and his needs increases.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission brief states that "unemployment insurance does not lift a poor man out of his poverty; it only helps to keep him from dropping below the level where he was - before he lost his job.¹⁷ Benefits can only help an individual from dropping below his previous level if there is an additional source of funds, whether it be savings, interest or even social assistance. This argument is quite valid for most employees; their earnings lift them above the poverty line and they may be able to save some of their excess income for emergencies. A construction worker may be seasonally unemployed but may earn more than enough to provide for his family during the

15. For example it is inequitable to exclude salary earners whose incomes exceed $7,800 per year, while extending coverage to hourly rated workers whose annual incomes are well in excess of that amount. Salaried employees are not totally protected from unemployment and may be seriously affected by it particularly when they are displaced after a number of years of service with the same employer. Their age and previous salary level serve as a barrier to re-employment.
 16. Coverage is also denied to most casual workers, farmers and self-employed persons. Casual employment may be the only opportunity available to some members of the labor force; some self-employed persons and farmers are members of the working poor although they are not employees.
 17. Proceedings of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, Ottawa: Queen's Printer, No. 9, Tuesday, June 3, 1969. Appendix J, p. 321.

season and supplement his income through unemployment insurance. There is very little information available concerning asset distribution but there is a correlation between assets and income. If the working poor have inadequate incomes then they cannot be expected to have savings or income producing assets to supplement their meagre unemployment insurance benefits and many are forced to rely on the social assistance mechanism. Concepts which are valid for the more affluent worker are not necessarily appropriate for the working poor.

The Department is aware of the principle of benefit/earnings relationships but does not find the existing benefit/earnings ratio acceptable. The Unemployment Insurance Commission brief states that "for a claimant with a dependent the weekly benefit is about 50% of his normal weekly earnings and for a claimant without a dependent it is about 40%."¹⁸ Presumably this is subject to qualification as the maximum levels are $42 for a single person and $53 for a dependent benefit and many insurable employees earn wages well in excess of $106 per week.

A benefit/earnings ratio of 40 to 50 per cent with a maximum weekly payment of $53 hurts all claimants but it strikes hardest at those with the greatest need, the working poor. A more realistic benefit structure and a higher benefit/earnings ratio are urgently required, particularly by those at the lowest wage levels. It would appear that this could be obtained without departing from the insurance concept nor inducing a higher risk element than certain forms of existing coverage. Similarly more consideration could be given to individual needs than the present "single" and "dependent" structure. While improvements in this area are limited by both administrative and conceptual difficulties a third multi-dependent categorization might be feasible.

Eligibility for Benefits - The Unemployment Insurance Commission brief has stressed two situations in which insurable employees are ineligible for benefits:

Workers who are unemployed as a result of sickness, and Female workers who have to leave their employment as a result of pregnancy.¹⁹

As the Unemployment Insurance Commission brief has made a case for extending benefits to these ineligible; the Department recommends their inclusion, as the denial of benefits weighs most heavily once again upon the working poor.

Unemployment Insurance and Social Assistance - The Unemployment Insurance Commission has acknowledged that the Commission could improve its program through improved integration "with other forms of social development and welfare programs in order to give maximum effectiveness to the overall system by closing gaps and eliminating overlapping."²⁰ Problems in integration exist and more co-ordination is required. For example an unemployed worker may put in a claim for benefits and payments of the claim may be delayed; in the interim he may rely on social assistance payments. This creates two distinct problems for the social assistance structure. First, social assistance is called upon to compensate for a gap in the unemployment insurance program. Second, when the retroactive benefit is paid, the recipient has received funds from both agencies and both administrative and financial overlapping has occurred.

This latter type of problem is minor in relation to the question of the entire relationship between social assistance and unemployment insurance. The problem can be illustrated by the example of the family head with four dependents who earned $65 per week and is entitled to $33 in benefits. As his benefits are less than his needs he may receive supplementation from social assistance. Despite his employment record and his contributions he is forced to resort to the welfare mechanism. In this event he must meet the needs test. He becomes a welfare recipient. He gains no advantage from unemployment insurance despite his contributions as he is entitled to exactly the same gross income as a family head who suffered from chronic unemployment and was not entitled to benefits.

18. Ibid. p. 321

19. Ibid. p. 321

20. Ibid. p. 322

A similar argument is relevant for workers who are left unprotected because of gaps in the unemployment insurance program such as pregnant women, those who lose employment through illness, single mothers, etcetera. The only distinction is that these cases do not receive any benefits despite their contributions. At least a portion of the social assistance structure must serve as a program of last resort but the imperfections of the unemployment insurance system force some individuals into the last resort programs at too early a stage.

Modifications in coverage, benefits and eligibility criteria, would improve the situation and reduce the degree of reliance on social assistance. However the program requires more than minor modification. A complete reappraisal is necessary not only in terms of possible areas of improvement but also in terms of the basic concepts and objectives and its relationship with other income maintenance programs. Unemployment insurance is the first line of protection against loss of employment. It is a right which the worker has earned on the basis of his participation in the labor force and his contributions. The Department contends that there is an urgent requirement for a vastly expanded unemployment insurance system more oriented to the needs of the working poor. This would provide a more meaningful and socially desirable method of protecting the working poor from drifting into poverty than through social assistance. It also reflects the work ethic of our society; a person who has worked has earned the right to an acceptable benefit level.

C. The Working PoorIntroduction

Poverty is most readily associated with persons who are outside the labor force. Unfortunately some fully employed persons have incomes which are inadequate for their needs. The Department of Social and Family Services recognizes the dilemma of the working poor and welcomes the opportunity to discuss this topic.

The Scope of the Problem

Poverty in the context of income deficiency, exists when income is inadequate to meet a socially acceptable standard of needs.

Poverty lines try to express basic needs in terms of required income levels. Needs increase with family size and The Family Benefits Act and The General Welfare Assistance Act adjust allowance levels accordingly. In contrast, earnings are determined primarily by economic factors and are not related to family needs. As a result many fully employed people suffer from income deficiency.

Other briefs have related the problem of the working poor to the minimum wage. Although the minimum wage may produce an income exceeding the poverty line for the single individual it is inadequate for the family with one or more children. Discussing poverty in the context of the minimum wage is particularly useful as it emphasizes that the "working poor" are primarily families with children.

Examination of the minimum wage structure should not obscure two points:

Some low wage earners cannot obtain uninterrupted full time employment and their hours of work and income from other sources are also key factors in determining their annual income.

As needs increase with family size, some wage earners have incomes below the poverty line although their earnings are well above the minimum wage.

The Committee is aware of the problems which are inherent in the use of the minimum wage as a primary weapon against poverty. The minimum wage is an important device and does contribute to the alleviation of poverty.

Undoubtedly, by setting a minimum wage some contribution towards alleviating poverty among the employed poor is made; but this should be recognized only as a by-product of providing protection to workers with little bargaining power and guarding against the outbreak of socially undesirable cut throat competition based on declining wages.¹

1. Whittingham, Frank, Minimum Wages in Ontario, Analysis & Measurement Problems, Industrial Relations Centre, Queens University, Kingston, 1969, p. 53.

However there is no indication that the minimum wage is an appropriate primary device for eliminating poverty and it would appear that the "minimum wage program is a cumbersome tool for redistributing income".²

Therefore while the minimum wage can be effectively used to illustrate the problem of the working poor; it would be inappropriate to consider it as a major redistributive device.

Major increases in the minimum wage may decrease the supply of available jobs and deprive some family heads of their jobs.

It should be noted that the problem of the working poor is not merely that of family heads who are employed at the minimum wage but rather of any employed individual or family head whose income is inadequate for his needs, regardless of his hourly wage.³

Social Assistance and Low Income Employment

It has been noted that it is possible to obtain a higher level of income from Ontario social assistance allowances than from full time employment at the minimum wage.

Table 9 illustrates the relative positions of families composed of two adults and three children under 9 years of age. One receives social assistance while the major source of income of the other is the father's earnings. Although the gross income of the working poor family is approximately $1,200 higher than that of the family receiving social assistance the differential is actually much narrower. The social assistance family is not subject to income tax, pays neither Canada Pension Plan nor Unemployment Insurance premiums, has no work expenses and is provided with free hospital, medical and dental coverage. Therefore comparisons in terms of gross income are misleading because the "gross income" of a family on social assistance is really equivalent to the "take home pay" of a wage earner less work expenses.

The "net income" comparison in Table 9 indicates a difference of only $205 annually (or approximately $18 per month) in favour of the working family despite the fact that the wage earner is employed at a rate of $2.30 per hour.

The comparison is based on a family which is entirely dependent upon social assistance and does not allow for possible part time earnings. The Family Benefits Act has always permitted part time earnings.⁴ The Act provides a basic earnings exemption of $24 for the first person and $12 for each additional family member. Income in excess of the exemption is offset at a rate of .75 cents on the dollar. A recent review of a sample of Family Benefits "mothers" cases in Toronto indicates that approximately 15 percent have used or are using this provision. A similar provision has recently been included in the General Welfare Assistance Act with the distinction that it is available to recipients at the discretion of the Municipal Welfare Administrator. Table 10 compares a working poor family with a social assistance which supplements their allowances with part time earnings.

Table 10 illustrates the case of a social assistance family which exercises the part time work option and earns $1,200 during the year ($100 per month). Their "net income" after allowances for work expenses is $623 or $52 per month higher than a working poor family which earns $4,784.

2. Ibid p. 52

3. Overemphasis on the numbers of persons employed at the minimum wage also tends to obscure the high concentration of female workers in low income employment. In many cases their employment would be a secondary source of family income.

This situation creates an economic incentive for male family heads or "single" mothers to trade-off full time employment for social assistance or a combination of social assistance and part time employment. The potential trade-off element is limited by a number of factors. The fact that the family has a lower real income than the level of social assistance payments does not in itself make them eligible for assistance. A family head who abandoned his employment to apply for assistance might not be able to satisfy the welfare administrator that he was either unemployable or making an effort to find employment. Asset limitations would make others ineligible. Many individuals are probably unaware of the benefits which are available. The needs test and the concept of an investigation may serve as psychological restraint to some people. Despite these factors one can only assume there are many people who still choose work over welfare although there are financial disadvantages.

The existing relationship between low income employment and social assistance levels, particularly when supplemented by part time earnings is not entirely satisfactory. However it is not intended to work to the disadvantage of the working poor. Government programs should be established in terms of a reasonable set of goals and priorities. Historically, the area of greatest need in the income maintenance field consisted of those persons who were either unable to work or could not obtain work and consequently had almost no sources of income. Ontario responded to this priority and while present allowances are still somewhat below poverty lines they are generous in relation to income from some forms of employment.

An unintentional side effect of a progressive social assistance policy based on a logical set of priorities has brought about a differential.⁵ The problem would not exist if the Province had adopted a less progressive social assistance policy. There would be no differential if social assistance payment levels were always lower than the minimum wage or if part time earnings were either forbidden or taxed at a 100 per cent rate.

However the necessity for eliminating the differential has been recognized and the Minister of Social and Family Services has stated that the working poor are the next priority in the development of the income maintenance structure.

Employment Related Policies and Programs

The working poor are affected by factors beyond the absence of an effective income maintenance program to supplement their earnings.

Employment - The working poor are primarily dependent upon their earnings for their livelihood. There is no absolute distinction between the working poor and the social assistance recipients. Members of the working poor who suffer from unemployment may become recipients and "employable" recipients return to work as job opportunities occur. The first and foremost requirement of the working poor is employment and preferably better employment.

5. The point has other implications. The differential can be attributed to two major factors.

The provision of social assistance has improved the position of persons outside the labor force.

The economy has not provided the working poor with employment opportunities which will permit them to earn their way out of poverty.

The combination of these two factors has created a new "poorest of the poor class," the working poor whose incomes are less than those of social assistance recipients. Yet ironically some people are of the opinion that the welfare system has failed. If the welfare system had failed, recipients outside the labor force would still be the poorest of the poor.

Jobs have more than a purely economic significance. We live in a work oriented society and holding a job is the accepted and "proper" way of obtaining money and supporting one's family. "Jobs are also a 'good thing' in their own right because, in addition to providing income, they confer status and dignity."⁶

This point has led many social scientists to the conclusion that more and better jobs offer the most attractive solution for poor families. Allowing them to earn their way out of poverty through their own efforts not only appears to be the most appealing solution to the employable poor but also to the rest of society as it conforms to the work ethic.

Many of the working poor are unskilled and find it difficult to compete in labor markets which are highly skill oriented. Some do not succeed in obtaining regular employment, and others may find only marginal employment in the "last hired, first fired" category.

There is considerable evidence that the American poor made the greatest gains during periods of economic expansion. A "tight labor market" is of particular advantage to the poor. It not only increases the number of available jobs but improves their position in the labor market.

As employers compete for increased work forces to meet the new demands for their products, they find workers tailored to their job specifications increasingly scarce and expensive. They reach further back in the queue of unemployed workers. They relax their requirements and broaden their preferences; they overlook deficiencies in education and skills and undertake themselves the expense and trouble of training . . .

Workers at the rear of the queue gain not only in reduction of unemployment, but also in greater availability of full-time work and chances for advancement. In other words, private employers and free markets do much of the work of the war on poverty - without public expenditure and government bureaucracy.⁷

A tight labor market means not just jobs, but better jobs, longer hours, higher wages.⁸

Although authorities on poverty may disagree regarding some aspects of the problem there is consensus on the requirement for high aggregate demand and a strong labor market:

The maintenance of high employment and strong and stable economic growth is crucial. No policies are more effective in helping to move families and individuals out of poverty than the combination of demand and supply policies required to sustain new job creation and the increasingly efficient use of manpower, capital and other productive resources. Without success on this front, other anti-poverty policies are unlikely to be of much avail.⁹

In contrast, policies which reduce the supply of jobs aggravate the poverty problem. Unemployment not only deprives the worker of the ability to earn a livelihood but also increases dependency and has other undesirable sociological and psychological effects.

The costs of unemployment are not borne equally by all Canadian citizens. It has little impact upon the affluent; few professionals, managers and other highly skilled persons are affected. Unemployment strikes from the bottom and hits hardest at those who are least able to bear the cost. A five or six per cent rate of general unemployment represents a significantly higher rate among low wage earners and a widening of the gap between those who have and those who have not.

The aged, the retired and others on fixed incomes must of course be protected from the effects of inflation. However, it would appear to be more reasonable to protect them through automatic compensatory payments rather than through unemployment which takes its heaviest toll from another sector of the poor.

The 1970 Ontario Budget acknowledged the importance of inflation control but noted that the Province "does not agree that the objectives and methods of current fiscal and monetary policy are irrefutable." The Budget also states that:

Ontario, with a rapidly growing population and labor force, needs a continuous stream of private and public investment to create new jobs and raise living standards. Any attempt to cure inflation by creating unemployment runs counter to the Ontario Government's objective of keeping unemployment at no more than 3 per cent of the labour force. This is a reasonable economic objective and it is imperative that a more sophisticated strategy than induced unemployment be found to cure inflation. The Ontario Government is not willing to accept the view that unemployment is a just and effective way of solving the problem. The effects will fall on the lowest income-groups in the community. It is inconsistent to propose economic goals of tax equity to help these citizens, while contributing to their loss of livelihood as the price of solving inflation.¹⁰

Unemployment Insurance - Section B reviewed the present unemployment insurance system in some depth and noted serious inadequacies in coverage, benefit levels and co-ordination with the social assistance structure. There is a requirement for an adequate and efficient system of unemployment insurance even during periods of strong labor markets. This need is even more acute during periods of unemployment.

Manpower Services - The Committee is aware of the problems which exist in retraining and therefore the Department will limit its comments to repeating the point that meaningful and appropriate retraining is essential in a highly skill oriented society.

The Economic Council of Canada has stressed the requirement for stable economic growth and noted that a full scale war on poverty should embrace the four inter-related and mutually supporting categories of anti-poverty programs:

Individual improvement programs

Community betterment programs

Manpower development, training and mobility programs

Income maintenance.¹¹

Assistance to the working poor is not only income maintenance but rather an appropriate blend of all four types of anti-poverty programs.

11. Economic Council of Canada, Fifth Annual Review, p. 127.

Taxation of the Working Poor - Taxation provides the revenue for transfer programs and is one of the most efficient methods of redistributing income. At present the tax system provides the funds for social assistance programs but is not directly related to them. For example the Old Age Security program is financed by taxation (and as previously noted Old Age Security payments are taxable) but the Old Age Security system is not an integral part of the tax structure. Many forms of guaranteed annual income systems, particularly those which are based upon the negative income tax concept, would result in a much closer relationship between the taxation and transfer payment mechanisms.

Future developments in income maintenance may proceed along present lines (i.e. with income maintenance systems as separate programs) or may involve more integration with the tax structure (as in negative income tax programs). In either case the tax structure must be effectively co-ordinated with the income maintenance system not only in the context of financing but also in terms of operation. Effective co-ordination of the taxation and income maintenance structure is axiomatic for any form of future development and most particularly for the creation of selective programs based upon income deficiency.

The Department would like to draw attention to the fact that the income tax system tends to affect the relationship between social assistance recipients and members of the working poor. The point can be readily seen by examining the effects of excluding social assistance payments from taxation.

The existing income tax system exempts social assistance payments from taxation and the Proposals for Tax Reform state that this provision will be retained:

Social assistance payments for those in need would not be taxed if made under federal or provincial legislation or by a registered charitable organization subject to a needs test or means test. The test would be sufficient evidence of inability to pay, and the circumstances of those to whom the payments are made would normally make reporting of income and assessment of tax impractical.¹²

The exclusion of social assistance payments from taxation tends to increase the differential between social assistance recipients and some of the working poor. Table 11 illustrates this situation in terms of both the present and proposed income tax systems. It compares a 5 person social assistance family which supplements its allowance with part time earnings, with a similar working poor family whose major source of income is derived from full time employment. Although the social assistance family has a higher gross (and real) income they are not required to pay income tax as their social assistance allowances are not taxable and their exemptions and deductions exceed their earnings. In contrast the working family is required to pay:

$292.04 under the present income tax system

$153.49 under the Proposals for Tax Reform

A similar situation occurs when a family head who is unable to obtain regular employment derives part of his income from social assistance or unemployment insurance benefits.

If the unemployed family head has several dependents the existing maximum unemployment insurance benefit is likely to be less than his needs as defined by The General Welfare Assistance Act and he may be eligible for assistance. In some cases the unemployed person is ineligible for unemployment benefits and proceeds directly to the social assistance system.

12. Proposals for Tax Reform, Ottawa: Queen's Printer, 1969, p. 18.

It should be noted that payments under the Old Age Security Act are excluded from this provision.

(a) Two adults and three children under age 9.

(b) Part time earnings of $100 per month.

(c) The maximum allowance of $345 or $4,140 annually. (This has been used as the question in one of the maximum levels of exempt income. The amount $3,888 represents the net allowance after earnings have been offset by the earnings exemption and 75 per cent offset rate.)

(d) Family Allowances are not taxable and do not affect the calculation.

(e) Unemployment Insurance premiums are not deductible under the present income tax system.

(f) The social assistance family has no taxable income as social assistance payments are exempt and earnings are less than total exemptions and deductions.

(g) Exemptions and deductions are: $1,000 per adult, $300 per child, $100 medical/charitable.

(h) Exemptions and deductions are: $1,400 per adult, $300 per child, $150 work expenses, $100 medical/charitable.

In either case neither unemployment insurance benefits nor social assistance payments are taxable under the present income tax system. Therefore it is possible for a family head whose total income is well above his exemption level to pay no income tax as his earned income is less than his exemptions and unemployment insurance and social assistance payments are not taxable. Yet a fully employed family head whose annual income was derived almost entirely from earnings would be required to pay taxes on a lower or equivalent level of annual income.

The Proposals for Tax Reform have acknowledged the problem created by the exemption of unemployment insurance benefits and recommended that they be taxed as "Tax exemption for these payments is unfair to the person who earns the same total income but who must pay more tax."¹³

The preceeding point is by no means the only way in which either the present or proposed income tax systems contribute to the relative disadvantage of the working poor. For example both systems contain provisions which are of far more value to the high income earners than to low income earners, such as:

(1) The use of exemptions rather than tax credits. Exemptions when combined with progressive marginal tax rates increase in value as taxable income rises. A $1,000 exemption is worth $200 in terms of taxes for foregone to a low wage earner in the 20 per cent marginal tax bracket whereas the same exemption is worth $800 to a man at the 80 per cent marginal tax bracket. A basic tax credit of $50 is worth that specific amount to all taxpayers regardless of whether they owe $51 (actual tax payable would be $1) in taxes or $51,000 (actual tax payable would be $50,950).

(2) The use of an individual rather than a family tax unit. As the marginal tax rates are progressive the provision is more valuable to higher income families in which two or more members have incomes than to similar low income families.

The Proposals for Tax Reform emphasize fairness in taxation and state that fairness implies two principles:

That persons in similar circumstances should carry similar shares of the tax load.

That people who are better off should be expected to pay a larger share of their income in taxes.

The exemption of social assistance payments illustrates not only the need for reconsidering fairness in taxation but most particularly the requirement for more effective harmonization of the income tax and social assistance structures.

Work Supplementation in Other Provinces - The Committee has noted that it is possible to subsidize incomes of the working poor under the Canada Assistance Plan and that provinces which do so are entitled to receive 50 per cent of the cost from the federal government. The Committee has also stated that "seven out of ten Canadian provinces" have done so whereas "rich Ontario" has failed to exercise this option.

The Department acknowledges that income supplementation is shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan and that, with the exception of some female headed families and disabled persons, Ontario does not provide this form of assistance.

The significant factor is the scope of supplementation in those provinces which allow it. The Department has made enquiries on this point from the provinces. Only one failed to reply and British Columbia states that it does not keep separate statistics on wage supplementation. Of the others the largest caseload of working poor reported in any one province was a little less than 1,000; and of these over half were cases of families headed by women. No province is yet operating a full-scale work supplementation program under the Canada Assistance Plan. In each province the numbers supplemented are very few and they make up a very small percentage of persons in receipt of social assistance.¹⁴ The Department of National Health and Welfare has summarized the situation accurately:

13. Proposals for Tax Reform, p. 18.

In practice . . . payment of assistance in such provinces is on a highly restricted basis and is usually confined to families in which extreme hardship can be identified.¹⁵

Permissive supplementation has not yet brought assistance to the great majority of the working poor in any province. No Canadian province is operating a full-scale work supplementation program which provides assistance as a right to all fully employed persons whose income and resources are inadequate for their needs. The point is emphasized because there appears to be an impression to the contrary.

Supplementation of The Working Poor

At present, Ontario operates two major income maintenance programs under the Canada Assistance Plan, Family Benefits and General Welfare Assistance. Both programs provide assistance as a right to eligible persons in need. They provide a guaranteed income for persons who are either outside the labor force or are unemployed. (See Chapter II.) The extension of assistance to the working poor would close the last major gap in the income maintenance structure.

It has been noted that Ontario has not supplemented the working poor under the Canada Assistance Plan. The Department's position concerning this issue depends upon the interpretation of supplementation. There are two possible interpretations:

The extension of assistance to a limited number of the working poor as some provinces have done.

The introduction of a full scale program which provides assistance as a right to all members of the working poor whose income is less than their needs.

Permissive Supplementation - The provision of permissive selective but consistent assistance to certain members of the working poor is a possibility and might be the most effective approach to the problem. If assistance were provided in terms of a logical set of needs oriented priorities to a selected target group in an experimental mode it would be possible to:

Assist the most needy segment of the working poor and develop urgently required information concerning potential problems which might be encountered in supplementing a segment of the poor, when remarkably little is known.

Assistance as a Right - The provision of assistance as a right involves a number of complex factors which are not directly related to the Canada Assistance Plan. These factors can be readily demonstrated by approaching the problem from the perspective of the Canada Assistance Plan and the existing social assistance programs.

14. There also appears to be some variation in the form of assistance. It would appear that in one province assistance may be provided in kind rather than in funds. Similarly, assistance may be not provided on a continuing basis but restricted to certain periods and conditions.

15. Department of National Health and Welfare, p. 26.

The terms of the Canada Assistance Plan would allow the Province to supplement the wages and salaries of the working poor. There are a few minor problems but these could be readily overcome.

For example the Canada Assistance Plan requires the use of a needs test involving assessment of an applicant's income and resources in relation to his needs. Although there is a wide-spread impression that the provinces set needs tests, criteria are not determined unilaterally as they must be approved by the federal government. The present Ontario social assistance structure is designed for persons who are either outside the labor force or are unemployed. In these cases it is not inequitable to assess both the income and resources of an applicant. An individual may have little or no income yet have considerable assets. For example an unemployed single man may have no income but may have saved several thousand dollars. It would neither be just nor in the public interest to provide him with social assistance until he had used a reasonable proportion of his savings for his own support. This problem has resulted in the traditional welfare investigation which was created to ensure that the applicant did not retain an unreasonable amount of liquid assets while drawing assistance.

The Department feels that certain aspects of this approach are undesirable and is currently conducting a study to develop a simplified and more effective method of determining eligibility.

The majority of the working poor present an entirely different problem. They are actively engaged in the labor force and are primarily dependent upon their own earnings. In contrast to the "traditional" social assistance recipient who is either entirely or primarily dependent upon assistance, the working poor require only supplementation as long as they are able to remain employed. As their incomes are inadequate to meet their needs they are unlikely to have any significant amount of liquid assets to sustain themselves. Normally their savings would not exceed the exemption levels under The Family Benefits Act and in any case forcing them to deplete their savings in order to be eligible for a wage supplement would be equivalent to penalizing thrift and making them even more dependent by eliminating any small contingency reserve they might have. However assets cannot be completely ignored as it is possible for some individuals to have a high level of liquid assets and limited level of income. While exceptions of this nature are rare they are significant as abuses undermine public confidence in a social assistance program and stigmatize recipients. Therefore, it would appear possible to develop a combined income and liquid asset declaration method to ascertain eligibility for this group. This would meet the terms of the Canada Assistance Plan while providing an efficient and socially acceptable method of determining eligibility without a detailed investigation of every applicant.

It has been suggested that Ontario social assistance could be modified to provide assistance to the working poor. Present programs were designed to provide full assistance to persons outside the labor force and are not designed for supplementation of earnings. Both General Welfare Assistance and Family Benefits have three basic components:

A high basic guarantee or needs level

An incentive provision for part time employment which consists of an earnings exemption of $24 for the first person and $12 for each additional dependent and a 75 per cent offset rate on all income which exceeds the earnings exemption

A breakeven point, or point at which benefits cease.

If the Department extended assistance to the working poor under the existing programs it would be necessary to modify The General Welfare Assistance Act or The Family Benefits Act to include the fully employed. The objective of this modification would be twofold:

To assist the working poor

To eliminate the income differential between social assistance recipients and members of the working poor. That is, to provide a work incentive for the working poor and allow them to "profit" from their earnings.

The Department could not simply supplement to the basic support or needs level as this would not eliminate the discrepancy. That is, supplementation to the needs level would only allow a few working poor families the same "gross" income as an equivalent family on social assistance which did not have any part time earnings. A working family would not have any reward for their efforts: they would receive exactly the same gross income as the fully dependent family and their "net" income would be lower due to deductions, work expenses etcetera. While they would receive assistance, there would be no incentive to continue working. There would still be an incentive to trade off work for welfare. The differential would not be eliminated as a working family would still be considerably "worse off" than a social assistance family which supplemented its allowances with part time employment.

Therefore it would be necessary to provide an incentive feature which would eliminate this differential and at least provide the same work incentive which is available to present recipients. Theoretically this could be achieved by removing the full time employment restriction and applying the earnings exemption and offset rate to the incomes of the working poor. In essence the plan would operate in the same manner as a negative income tax with two important exceptions:

It would not be an integral part of the income tax structure

Recipients would still be affected by the present income tax structure which has not been harmonized with the social assistance structure.

All "negative rates" systems (regardless of whether they are incorporated in the income tax structure or operate independently) include:

A basic guarantee level

An offset rate to provide incentives (an earnings exemption may be included)

A breakeven point.

The basic guarantee level provides an income floor and a recipient is guaranteed that amount even if he has no other income. For example a typical negative income tax plan might have a guarantee level of $1,500 for a family of four and apply a 50 per cent offset rate to all other income. If a recipient has no other income he receives the full guarantee. If he earns income, it is "taxed" and his guarantee is reduced by fifty cents for every dollar of earnings. If he earns $2,000, his $1,500 benefit is reduced by $1,000 and his total income is $2,500. If he earns $3,000 or more his benefits cease.

Negative rates plans are specifically designed to provide assistance to the working poor. The offset rate is intended to discourage "trading off" work for welfare and to encourage the working poor to at least maintain if not expand their work effort. The use of the offset rate ensures that an individual always profits from work. As the offset rate takes only a part of his earnings he always profits by increasing his earnings. When the hypothetical "modified" Ontario social assistance program is analyzed in these terms a number of undesirable features become evident.

Tables 12 and 13 illustrate the results of the hypothetical modification of the existing program.

Chart 1 shows that the breakeven point for a five person family would be $6,384 per year. As this is approximately $1,200 higher than the poverty line for that family unit size, payments would be made to the near poor. Any five person family which earned less than that amount would be supplemented. For example, an eligible family which earned $500 per month would be entitled to a supplement of $24.

Table 12 illustrates the undesirable aspects of the plan. Offset rates should be designed to provide a high degree of work incentive. The use of an earnings exemption and a 75 per cent offset rate (which were intended to provide a moderate work incentive for fully dependent recipients) creates a pronounced disincentive effect. A fully employed person who earns $3,000 per year would only receive $543 more in net income than a similar individual who traded full time employment for part time work and restricted his earnings to his annual exemption of $864.

The disincentive is even more pronounced when effects of the positive income tax system are introduced. The offset rate will reduce the gross earned income of an "assisted" employee who earns $6,300 per year to only $825 more than that of a similar recipient who earns $3,000 per year. However the latter is not subject to income tax as his earnings are less than his exemptions and his social assistance supplement is not taxable. The $6,300 wage earner has $3,200 in taxable income and is required to pay $637.74 in income taxes. Therefore his net income is only $187.26 higher than the net income of a man who earned less than half as much.¹⁶ The optimum net income position is attained when the recipient earns $6,100. At that point his combined net income is higher than that of either the man who earned $6,300 and received a small supplement or a person who earned $6,385 ($1 more than the breakeven point) and was ineligible for assistance. If he increased his earnings by $285 and became ineligible for assistance his net income would be 87 cents lower than when he earned only $6,100. A plan of this nature is more likely to encourage dependency than to provide an incentive for a recipient to help himself and become independent.

The disincentive effects would be compounded if free hospital, medical and dental benefits were extended to the working poor to provide them with the same benefits as fully assisted families. A wage earner whose income was close to the breakeven point would have no incentive to increase his earnings as an increase would result in loss of his free hospital medical and dental insurance (which is not available to persons who are ineligible for social assistance).

The Department has been informed by a number of recipients that they cannot afford to return to work and lose the protection provided by these services. Apparently the gap is simply too high for some persons to overcome. Presumably a parallel phenomenon could occur in a work supplementation program.¹⁷

16. The maximum differential occurs at the $6,100 earnings level. Individuals earning between $6,101 and $6,385 actually have a slightly lower differential due to a "notch problem" produced by the combined tax rates.

17. There are other complications. Many of the working poor pay full or partial OHSIP premiums and all of them would presumably pay full hospitalization premiums. In some cases their employers might pay a portion of their premiums. The administrative problems are apparent.

It should be noted that our experience indicates that most employable persons would prefer to be self supporting. The economic aspects of the hypothetical program (including incentives, differentials etcetera) have been stressed for a number of specific reasons:

First, the difference between the working poor and social assistance recipients is, in the first instance, one of money. Similarly the question of incentives is not merely one of maintaining the labor supply but also one of relative monetary equality.

Second, while very little is known about the effects of supplementing the working poor, incentives and the labor supply are the major public issues. While our knowledge is limited, it would be undesirable to build pronounced work disincentives into a program which is intended to eliminate economic differentials, particularly when one of the major criticisms of social assistance has been the lack of incentives in some programs.

Third, dollar values can be readily quantified. It is possible to calculate breakeven points, and compare the incomes of one family to another. In contrast, it is much more difficult to predict, let alone quantify psychological and sociological effects although they may be extremely significant.

The program would also create serious administrative problems. In contrast to many salaried employees the incomes of the working poor do not consist of uniform monthly payments. Their incomes may be cyclical, peaking in one season and declining in another. Many suffer from periodic unemployment and have fluctuating incomes. Yet their needs must always be met and assistance must be prompt and adequate.

The problem can be readily seen by comparing this situation with an operational negative rates system, the Guaranteed Income Supplement. The program is designed for a group which is outside the labor force. It is income and not needs tested and is only applied to one or two person units. The income patterns of its recipients are relatively stable as income is primarily derived from pensions, annuities, interest, etcetera. Payments are calculated on the basis of a recipient's income in the preceeding year. A recipient files one application per year and receives his supplement in arrears in twelve equal installments. The program is efficient and easy to administer and the negative rates approach appears to be quite appropriate for this group.

Application of the negative rates approach to the working poor is an entirely different matter, and creates problems concerning the timing of payments and over-estimates and under-estimates of income. If payments are made on a monthly basis to ensure that current needs are met other problems occur. The process involves continuous determination of eligibility and presumably at least twelve calculations per year for a recipient who maintains his eligibility. The use of an essentially unrealistic time period for assessment of income creates a situation in which recipients are being continually suspended and reinstated.¹⁸ It also produces situations in which payments might very well be made to people whose annual incomes would be well above the poverty line. If payments are made in arrears on the basis of a submission of proof of earnings delays may occur and there is no provision for current contingencies. If payments are made in advance over-estimates and under-estimates of earnings will occur. Conversely if payments are made quarterly or biannually assistance is not related to current needs; lump sum payments

18. This creates some disincentive effects. A recipient who receives a small subsidy of perhaps $30 per month may prefer to forego an opportunity to increase his earnings through overtime rather than go through the process of suspension and have to re-apply for benefits when his income returns to its normal level. This is both costly and demoralizing.

do not appear to be the most satisfactory form of assistance.¹⁹

The Department has acquired considerable experience in the operation of negative rates plans through the administration of The Family Benefits Act. Experience indicates that fluctuations in part time earnings of even long term recipients create administrative problems. There is every indication these difficulties would be considerably more pronounced in a work supplementation program. In short, the program would appear to incorporate most of the major administrative problems of the negative income tax system, without the advantages offered by integration with the income tax structure.

The hypothetical modification of existing Ontario social assistance programs serves a useful purpose as it illustrates a number of key points.

(1) One must not readily modify programs to meet new problems. Income maintenance programs must be specifically designed to serve the needs of the assisted group and all relevant socio-economic factors must be taken into account in their design. The preceeding examples indicate not only that modifications would produce a disincentive rather than an incentive but also an undesirable "income equalization" side effect. That is, the difference in net income for all heads of five person families with three children under age 16 who earned $6,300 or less was reduced to $188.40.²⁰ If the modified program had been introduced as a right for all working poor families a general income equalization effect would have occurred in the earnings range $3,000 to $6,400.²¹ The potential effects on labor supply are not known, however it is not difficult to imagine some of the possible results which this might produce in the areas of collective bargaining and employer-employee relations.

(2) The use of high offset rates in the 75 per cent range appears to produce a "double disincentive effect." First, the worker has little incentive to increase his earnings as the offset rate takes $3 of every $4 which he earns above his earnings exemption. It also appears to have a reciprocal function. That is, a pronounced "cushioning effect" is created as the recipient only loses $1 out of each $4 when his earnings decline. Therefore a man earning $6,000 per year could cut his income in half and only lose $750 in gross earnings (or $187 in net earnings if the current positive income tax is taken into account).

(3) The income tax system must be effectively co-ordinated with the income maintenance structure. The model illustrates both what would have occurred if the Department had introduced a modified program and what might

19. The preliminary report of the New Jersey experiment might appear to contradict this point. The report contains selective preliminary data from an extremely important social science experiment. However valid conclusions cannot be drawn from "first significant data." In the words of the Office of Economic Opportunity Report, "it will be necessary to await a detailed report from the social scientists." It would be premature to draw conclusions from preliminary data, particularly when it does not contain details concerning all aspects of the experiment.
 20. The equalization effect would take place regardless of whether income was obtained from part time or full time employment. For example, a $3,000 per year marginal employee would have little incentive to take a higher paying job which required more responsibility and longer hours. Similarly, a man who earned a high hourly wage but suffered from frequent unemployment would have little incentive to attempt to obtain more employment.
 21. The maximum differential occurs at the $6,100 earnings level. Individuals earning between $6,101 and $6,385 actually have a slightly lower differential due to a "notch problem" produced by the combined tax rates.

happen if new programs are developed without co-ordination. The model illustrates two obvious but often overlooked points:

Incentive oriented plans must allow for the effects of the income tax structure as well as the offset rate (or conversely, the tax structure must provide compatible levels of exemptions and deductions).

The exemption of social assistance payments from taxation creates a situation in which a recipient can trade off increased earnings for tax free social assistance payments. For example the income equalization effect is aggravated by the special status of social assistance payments. If the latter were taxed the net income differential for the $3,000 to $6,300 earnings range would increase from approximately $188 to $642.²² Harmonization of the taxation and social assistance structures appears to be a prerequisite for the introduction of an assistance program for the working poor.

The hypothetical program is not an exaggerated example of what would occur if wage supplementation were to be "built in" to existing programs. Other alternatives have been fully explored with equally unsatisfactory results. Chart 2 and Table 13 illustrate the effect of decreasing the offset rate to 50 per cent and eliminating the earnings exemption.

This hypothetical modification produces a breakeven point of $8,280, or $3,100 per year more than the poverty line for a five person family. A reduced offset rate does not appear to eliminate the disincentive effect and the combined tax rates range from approximately 65 to 79 per cent. The wage equalization effect occurs in a reduced but still unacceptable form. A recipient who earns $3,000 obtains a net income of $5,690, whereas a similar individual earning $8,280 nets only $6,816.30. Although he earns almost three times as much, his net income is only 20 per cent higher. In short the leakage is excessive, neither the disincentives nor the taxation problem are resolved and the wage equalization effect is unacceptable.

The hypothetical models have been introduced to illustrate two points:

Our existing social assistance programs are not suitable for modification to provide assistance to the working poor.

The models illustrate a few of the many complex variables which would affect any program which offered supplementation as a right.

The question of assistance as a right for the working poor involves considerably more than the existence of a permissive clause in the Canada Assistance Plan. The entire issue is dependent upon a number of key factors.

Knowledge - Income maintenance systems must be designed to meet the needs of the target group in the most effective and efficient manner without introducing seriously undesirable side effects. At this time there is a significant information gap. Very little is known about the working poor per se, the incentive and labor supply, potential economic sociological and psychological side effects, potential costs and benefits etcetera and hence the most effective method or methods of providing assistance.²³

Co-ordination - The model illustrates the lack of co-ordination between the taxation and social assistance structures. However co-ordination embraces many other areas including employment related policies and programs. Even "a guaranteed income program in no sense diminishes the need for government

22. Similarly increased exemptions and deductions such as those contained in the Proposals for Tax Reform would also increase the differential.

23. These working poor can also be assisted by other means such as taxation credits, public housing etcetera.

to follow an active full-employment policy."²⁴ The cost and effectiveness of any supplementation program for the working poor would be seriously affected by increasing unemployment.

Public Acceptability - Social assistance programs must reflect the values and objectives of society. Public recognition and commitment are an essential prerequisite for any meaningful assistance program.

The preceeding points are by no means an exhaustive list of the related variables and are only intended to illustrate some of the factors which affect the development of an appropriate supplementation program.

However it is not feasible to approach the problem of assisting the working poor in isolation from the existing income maintenance structure. A complete re-evaluation of the existing income maintenance structure is required, not only as a prerequisite for further development but also because of the unique problems of supplementation. Introduction of an income guarantee for fully employed persons would create a form of guaranteed annual income even if the existing structure were to be retained in its present form. Present social assistance programs provide income as a right to persons who are either outside the labor force or unemployed. (Old Age Security and Guaranteed Income Supplement provide for the aged; Family Benefits assists the blind, disabled, mentally retarded, some of the aged and single mothers; General Assistance is a program of last resort for persons who fall through the gaps in other systems.) Only Old Age Security and Family Allowances offer income as an unrestricted right; the remainder are selective providing assistance as a right, based on need. Introduction of a program providing assistance as a right to those who suffer from income deficiency would close the largest gap in the structure and, together with other social assistance measures, create a guaranteed income structure. Gaps would still exist, levels of support would vary and each program would retain its own eligibility criteria. Nevertheless the result would be an imperfect form of guaranteed annual income.

Therefore it is necessary to re-evaluate the entire income maintenance system in terms of a set of socially acceptable goals to ascertain whether the objectives can be best obtained through:

The introduction of a new program

The modification of existing programs

The development of a completely new and more effective income maintenance structure.

The question of assistance as a right for fully employed persons is essentially the question of a guaranteed annual income.

IV. FUTURE OF INCOME MAINTENANCE

At present the income maintenance system consists of a variety of selective and universal programs operated by three levels of government. There are gaps and overlaps in coverage, payments are made to the non-poor and the programs are not effectively co-ordinated among themselves and with the tax system. Future developments in income maintenance are dependent upon a re-evaluation of existing programs, the establishment of short and long term goals and the application of modern research and policy evaluation techniques. These developments are dependent upon two key factors, information and co-operation.

It is necessary to understand a given problem and its variables in order to find a set of appropriate solutions. The Special Senate Committee on Poverty has received a large number of briefs from a wide range of sources during its hearings. The Committee has continually sought accurate and current data regarding the poverty problem. Despite the fact that a great deal of information has been developed there are large information gaps. There are no current statistics on family income patterns, much of the data consists of projections of refinements of 1961 census data or the 1965 and 1967 income distribution samples. Information concerning the working poor is almost completely lacking, it is doubtful whether any agency can provide current and accurate data concerning their numbers, expenditure patterns, characteristics, etcetera. The Department has examined this problem in some depth. The choice appeared to lie between the development of estimates based on obsolete data or to simply admit that timely and accurate data are not available. The Department has chosen the latter alternative with the intent of demonstrating the magnitude of the information gap. Accurate and timely information is a fundamental prerequisite for the evaluation of our existing program and the development of new programs.

The irony of this situation is apparent when one considers the range of information which is available from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. It is possible to determine the number of greenhouses in the Province, the monthly production of soft drinks, quarterly statistics on the shipments of flush type doors (wood) by Canadian manufacturers and stocks, purchases and sales of scrap aluminum, brass, bronze, copper and magnesium. Accurate and highly current data is available concerning the Consumer Price Index, wages and salaries, and the labor force. Yet, there is virtually no data available concerning the working poor and the major source of data on poverty is the 1961 census. The census was not designed for this purpose, the next census will take place in 1971 and the data will not be immediately available.

The problem is simply that the information system has not been designed to produce the type of data which is required for an attack on poverty. It would also appear that all the available sources of information may not have been fully exploited. Current data concerning income distribution are not available and the major source of information on family incomes has been provided by Dominion Bureau of Statistics samples. The Federal Government has a number of exclusive data sources. Presumably computer tapes exist for the Old Age Security, Guaranteed Income Supplement, Family Allowances, Canada Pension Plan, Unemployment Insurance programs and other transfer payments such as War Veterans Allowances. If these tapes were made available in conjunction with income tax data from the Department of National Revenue it might be possible to "match" the data and obtain a much more current concept of family income distribution. The Province could provide some information concerning payments made under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The information gap is not confined to any single level of government. Although the Department has statistics concerning its own programs the data is far from complete and it is necessary to develop data on the existing caseload. This problem is under review and the Department is redesigning its entire information system.

Future developments in income maintenance must involve basic decisions concerning:

Goals and objectives

The appropriate blend of income maintenance programs and

The respective responsibilities for development and operations

Financial arrangements.

These issues cannot be resolved unilaterally and co-ordination is essential not only in terms of major decisions but also such issues as research programs, standardized evaluation criteria and so on. Similarly, co-operation and co-ordination are necessary between various federal government departments. To this date, the required degree of co-operation has not been achieved, and the data output has been inadequate.

It is not possible to predict the form of future developments in income maintenance at this time.

Will developments take the form of additions to our existing program inventory?

Will Canada establish a national income floor under the Canada Assistance Plan which will be complemented by specialized programs for specific groups?

The key issue lies not in the form of the developments but rather in ensuring that an appropriate and effective set of programs are developed to meet the needs of the poor.

This goal cannot be obtained by modifying unsuitable programs to meet new needs and perpetuating old problems and reducing the effectiveness of the entire income maintenance structure. An appropriate income maintenance inventory can only be obtained through co-operation at all levels of government and evaluation of existing and future programs in terms of meaningful objectives in the light of accurate and timely information.

The development of an improved income maintenance structure will take time and some form of interim assistance is called for for the working poor. The Department is examining alternative methods of assisting low income families. It would appear that a selective payment to working poor families might be feasible. Payments could be related to family unit size and related to income levels. However there are a number of major unresolved problems as the data concerning both the working poor and possible side effects is extremely limited, no conclusions can be drawn at this time. While an interim program is essentially a short term measure it must meet all relevant program criteria without introducing any seriously undesirable secondary effects.

The development of an interim solution is also dependent upon other external factors. The Federal white paper on social assistance will be released shortly. The Province has not been consulted regarding its recommendations and it may have far-reaching implications which would affect the development of an interim program. Similarly, the possible extension of assistance to an entirely new segment of society re-emphasizes the necessity of reviewing the entire question of Federal-Provincial tax sharing. Future development in that area may well affect the potential form of future income maintenance programs.

V. SOCIAL SERVICES: PROVINCIAL PROGRAMS

Social service and income maintenance programs are not mutually exclusive, however, it is convenient to make a distinction between them. Some social services are concerned with care and sustaining individuals at their present level of functioning while others are aimed at helping them overcome their difficulties and handicaps. The following sections describing the impact of our social service programs on the alleviation and prevention of poverty are organized along departmental structure lines. Although many of the services are shareable under the Canada Assistance Plan, some are either not shared at all or are shared under other legislation.

A. Child Welfare and Children's Institutions

Services to children are provided for the most part by Children's Aid Societies and children's institutions. Children's Aid Societies are private corporations whose operating expenses are financed by municipal governments, the Province, and the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan. There are 51 societies in Ontario, generally established to cover the geographical territory of a county or district (a number of counties have combined, there are 3 areas with 2 societies separated by religious affiliation, Metro Toronto is not part of a county). Children's institutions are operated by private agencies such as religious orders, the Salvation Army and the Big Sisters. They provide a range of services from board and lodging through to treatment of the emotionally disturbed child. At present there are 30 institutions in operation with a capacity of 658 children. Local associations for retarded children operate residential homes for the retarded child. This legislation is relatively new, at present 23 corporations have been approved and eight homes are now in operation. The capacity of these homes is 115 beds. Most direct government services for the mentally retarded are, of course, provided by hospitals, schools and other facilities of the Ontario Department of Health.

The principal services supervised by the Child Welfare and Children's Institutions Branches are:

- adoptions,
- prevention, protection, treatment care and maintenance of children,
- help to unmarried mothers.

Adoptions and help to unmarried mothers have little relation to poverty. Treatment services for emotionally disturbed children are being transferred to the Department of Health and will no longer be our concern; therefore an examination of their relation to poverty has not been included here.

In 1966 new child welfare legislation came into effect, the principal changes being emphasis on preventive services, introduction of staffing standards and entirely public financing. This new Act provides that membership of the Board of Directors and Executive Committee of the Children's Aid Society is to include four municipal representatives so that those who pay for the services participate in establishing policies; this arrangement was to ensure co-ordination with other welfare services of the municipality.

Protection services are undertaken by Children's Aid Societies when parents fail to meet their responsibilities to their children. Children may be physically abused, neglected physically and emotionally, or inadequate attention may be paid to their health and education, their home may be an unfit place for them to live or their parents may be unable to care for them properly. Protection services are carried out by social service staff of the Societies; the objective of supervision and counselling is to ensure adequate care for the child and to help the family function more effectively. If this cannot be achieved, the child is removed from his home and taken into care as a ward of the Children's Aid Society.

Unfortunately no income distribution statistics are available on families to whom Children's Aid Societies provide family counselling and protection services. Rough estimates which have been provided based on the personal knowledge of the staff of the provincial Child Welfare Branch indicate that most prevention resources are directed to low income families. These families appear to have somewhat different structures than the community generally, i.e., many are one parent families (where there are two persons living together they may not be married.) It is also believed that many suffer from intermittent employment, insecure marginal incomes, and some of them have to depend from time to time on social assistance. Many problems giving rise to intervention by Children's Aid Societies occur among persons with a relatively low socio-economic status. The average number of children in a prevention case is almost three. Undoubtedly much work needs to be done in obtaining background information on the clients of protection services of Ontario Children's Aid Societies. If poverty is one of the causes of the environment in which child abuse and neglect occur, then one must be realistic about what can be accomplished in alleviating it, by counselling and prevention services. While they may prevent further deterioration in the family situation and enable the child to remain living at home they do not deal with the economic condition of the family, that is they are not equipped to provide training courses, basic upgrading and related benefits. If parental behavior problems are another cause of child abuse and neglect, the results to be expected from prevention and counselling services depend on the capacity of staff members to diagnose and treat the social and psychological difficulties of their clients. Evaluation of protection, prevention and counselling services is difficult to achieve because the standards against which they are to be judged are not explicit.

When prevention and protection are impossible or likely to be unsuccessful in-care services are the alternative. However, it should be noted that most children admitted to care of Children's Aid Societies do not come through this route, but are the infant children of unmarried parents. Other than infants, those coming into care in recent years tend to be older children with emotional problems which require group care or expensive institutional treatment. About one half of all the children in care in any one year are adopted, the remainder are either eventually returned to their families or wardship ceases at age eighteen. Over 60 per cent of all of the children in care at any one time are in foster homes, 20 per cent are on adoption probation and the remainder are in group homes or other institutions. Approximately one quarter of the net expenditures of Children's Aid Societies are board for foster children and all services to children in care account for about one half. Foster home rates are established by each Society, as are clothing allowances and spending allowances; amounts vary locally and with the age and sex of the child. Twenty-six of the 51 societies operate group homes; rates for care in these are established locally. Per diem rates in children's institutions are established by the Province. (About 5 per cent of the children in care are disturbed and in need of institutional treatment care, about 3 per cent are mentally retarded.)

A table listing the Children's Aid Societies and indicating the provincial and municipal share of their operating expenditure may be found at the end of this section. It is evident that there is a wide range in size and complexity of operations. Children's Aid Societies employed 2,075 persons at the end of 1968, providing service to about 102,400 children. The smallest society employed 5 persons, the largest 550. Six societies had no professionally trained staff.

Services are provided to detached youths through the Children's Institutions Branch. For instance, one institution assists young women just released from reformatories and another is a group residence for young women aged 16 to 22.

Financing of services to children is provided by three levels of government. In addition, many of the private agencies which operate institutions for children make a financial contribution.

B. Family Services

This branch was established in 1968 to assist recipients of Family Benefits in achieving economic independence or to help them function more effectively. This is a family counselling service for social assistance recipients. The recipients who benefit most from these services are mothers with children. Counselling is given to help with marital problems, budget management, conflicts with employers, housing, employment and other social and domestic problems. Cases are referred from field staff to the counsellors who screen and assess the potential of the recipient. Some experimental projects have been carried out to assess the relative effectiveness of various methods of delivering this service. At present there are about 25 persons on staff, of whom 18 are professional social workers in direct service positions.

This program is still in a developmental stage and it will continue to be expanded.

C. Day Nurseries

Day nurseries are operated by either municipal governments or private groups. In areas without municipal organization the Department may establish nurseries. The Department licenses and inspects nurseries unless they are part of the educational system. In addition financial assistance is available through public agencies to encourage the establishing of new nursery places.

Nurseries which provide all day care for children are referred to as "day care centres." A "day nursery" offers day care to children between the ages of 3 and 10 for periods of less than twenty four hours. "Nursery School" is a term often applied to half day nursery programs. The Department licenses nurseries for children: the usual age range is 2 - 5. Some nurseries provide day care for children 6 - 10, beyond the normal school attendance period.

Nurseries must provide various play facilities for children in accordance with the length of attendance and their age levels. Where children are in care all day, a hot meal is required at noon and other nourishment as needed. The Department assists operators by advising them on the social and recreational programs which may be appropriate.

Nurseries are financed by provincial grants, municipal expenditures and fees paid by parents. Private nurseries under contract may have other sources of income such as community funds. Responsibility for the operation of the public nursery program is at the municipal level. A needs test is applied to the family to establish the portion of the fee which they are able to pay. This test is somewhat similar to that used to determine eligibility for special assistance under The General Welfare Assistance Act. Assets are considered but no limits are defined so that each municipality may establish its own criteria. Budgetary needs include many items not considered in the pre-added budgets of social assistance programs such as debts, dental services and drugs. Available income, which is deducted from needs to determine ability to pay, includes monthly net earnings and other sources of income; 25 per cent net monthly earnings of the family are exempted for contingencies. If the available income is less than the cost of nursery services, the nursery fee schedule may be subsidized and in some instances may be eliminated altogether. Municipalities apply this test to the nurseries they operate and when services are purchased the private nursery operator applies the test.

Unfortunately no statistics are available on the proportion of children in public day nurseries who are fully or partially subsidized. Nor is there any information on the characteristics of parents who use these services, their family structure, their income levels, whether or not the mother works and other similar data.

Private proprietary day nurseries are not subsidized. The Province licenses them, inspects the physical plant and advises on play and other activities for the children. Almost 9 out of every 10 nurseries are operated as private services.

At the end of 1969, there were 625 nurseries in operation. A number of municipalities operated nurseries or had contracts for services with private operators.

D. Programs for the Aged

Services for the aged are provided for the most part in the form of residential care in homes for the aged. Such institutions are either municipal institutions or are operated by private agencies such as fraternal organizations and religious groups. At the beginning of this fiscal year there were 77 institutions operated by private charitable agencies and 76 municipal homes; together they have a capacity in excess of 20,000 beds. Municipalities are required to establish and maintain homes for the aged, either by themselves or in co-operation with other municipalities. Generally, it is the county which establishes the home for the aged or in northern Ontario the district (one district has not done so to date). Cities may operate their own homes and many of the larger ones do, however it is not uncommon for them to operate homes jointly with the county. When a by-law is passed in a territorial district authorizing the establishing and maintenance of a home, all municipalities are required to contribute to it. Indian bands may also operate homes for the aged, however no band has established one to date. Charitable groups must seek the approval of the Department both as corporations and for their institutions before they are able to receive grants.

The principal services provided in these institutions are supervised sheltered residential care. It has been the policy of the Department to separate facilities in the home for persons who are senile, those who need some nursing care and are confined to bed and those who need minimal care and supervision. Both municipal and private institutions are required to provide certain minimum medical services to residents. A physician for the home must be appointed to see that the residents receive periodic examinations, x-rays and other care. Emphasis has been changing from residential supervision to include provision of social and recreational services, handicrafts and other activities. Staff trained in the techniques of reactivating the handicapped are being employed in greater numbers. Some of the private organizations have developed group programs and have extended professional services into the community to help persons remain in their homes longer. The Department has advisers on staff to help develop these programs; some of the specialties are crafts and social work. Most direct care services in the homes are provided by attendants on the staffs of the institutions.

The council of a municipality establishing a home appoints from among the members of the council, a committee of management for the home. In this way the home for the aged is integrated with other municipal welfare services. There are no requirements for public representatives on the boards of management of private institutions.

Few statistics are available on the characteristics of residents in homes for the aged. A needs test is applied by local municipal welfare administrators and a great deal of information is compiled. Unfortunately this data is not centralized in any one place. An application form is completed and medical data assessed for each person seeking admission. Admissions are based on the need for care as well as on the resources a person has with which to maintain himself. Policies on admissions are established locally. On the basis of assets and resources, monthly payments by an individual for care in the home are arranged. With the lowering of the age for eligibility for Old Age Security most residents now have some income with which to assist in maintaining themselves. A comfort allowance of $15 is provided; other income and assets are available for maintenance of the resident.

The impact of the homes for the aged program on the relief of poverty is difficult to assess. Undoubtedly these institutions provide essential services to those who are no longer physically able to care for themselves. The objectives of the service are not exclusively to provide help to those whose incomes are low. Almost one half the operating expenses of municipal homes are covered by receipts from paying residents, while in the private institutions 75 per cent comes from this source. Perhaps it is not really relevant to assemble statistics on the income levels of residents in these homes in order to measure the poverty "gap", for service support is more significant in the program than income support.

The financing of the homes for the aged program is provided by three levels of government. In addition many of the private agencies which operate institutions make a financial contribution toward the capital and operating costs of the homes.

In addition to the provision of homes for the aged there are a few other programs of benefit to the elderly. These are outlined briefly below.

(1) Rest Homes - These are for persons in need of long term maintenance, not necessarily or exclusively elderly people, however; services are for those who are unable to care for themselves but who do not need treatment in a hospital. Nursing care standards are somewhat higher than in a home for the aged. Seven such homes are in operation.

(2) Boarding Homes - Private home care is now being provided to some elderly persons through municipal welfare departments. This care is in lieu of admission to a municipal home for the aged.

(3) Elderly Persons Centres - These are established by private agencies such as Lions' Clubs to provide social and recreational services to elderly people during the day. Activities typically include games, entertainment and crafts. Meals may be provided and a place to rest.

The Homes for the Aged Branch also supervise several half way houses for released prisoners. These are operated by private agencies.

E. Vocational Rehabilitation

Vocational rehabilitation is designed to assist physically and socially disabled persons to be more self sufficient and to help them become gainfully employed. It is a public service provided by the Province to help handicapped persons. Services are available to persons ordinarily resident in Ontario who have physical or mental disabilities which prevent them from earning a living. Several basic approaches to rehabilitation are included in the program so that counsellors can develop a plan based on an individual's capacities and needs.

(1) Assessment - Social, medical and psychological needs are assessed to determine whether or not an individual can benefit from the program, and to develop the rehabilitation services likely to be required. Assessment is undertaken by counsellors in the Department in consultation with the person's physician, psychologists, teachers, employers, hospital personnel and others.

(2) Counselling - Professionally trained counsellors assist the handicapped persons in choosing an employment goal. A counsellor is available throughout the period during which such services are needed.

(3) Medical Restoration - Appliances are made available to take the place of a part of the body or to improve hearing. In spite of the fact that many persons have been receiving medical treatment before they come on to the program, the demand for appliances is high. Medical, surgical and psychiatric treatment are also available to help restore the capacity of a disabled person.

(4) Vocational Training - Training is provided by business and trade schools, vocational schools, community colleges, universities and sheltered workshops. There is no limit on the time that may be spent. Tuition costs are covered by the program. It is estimated almost 10,000 disabled people will receive training in this fiscal year.

(5) Employment placement - Much of the placement function is carried out by counsellors of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. However, many require specialized employment services not generally available from Manpower Centres.

(6) Maintenance and Transportation Allowances - These are available to pay for the living expenses of a disabled person and his family if he is unable to take advantage of rehabilitation services without financial assistance. An asset test is applied: the disabled person must have less than $1,000 in liquid assets plus $200 in addition, for each dependent. Detailed statements are taken from persons applying for a maintenance allowance, concerning their income, living expenses, personal and real property and debts. Monthly allowances are paid to eligible persons; the amounts paid are $147 for a single person, and $315 for a person with dependants. Extra maintenance allowances are available if a person is required to move in order to benefit from training. Transportation allowances are available to cover travel, accommodation and meals for the disabled person and an escort, if one is necessary; these are available when the person who is to receive the training is required to be absent from his home or to change his place of residence and needs the financial help.

(7) Tools and Equipment - Tools and equipment are available where they are necessary to enable trainees to obtain a job (for instance as a barber).

In addition to the foregoing services vocational rehabilitation clients also receive free hospital and medical insurance.

The number of persons receiving rehabilitation services has been increasing at a rate of about 20 per cent per annum. There is a staff of 124 providing such services, of whom more than 60 per cent are in direct service positions. The degree of severity of problems among recipients of the service has been increasing; in 1964-65 only about 57 per cent of the successfully rehabilitated clients received services of over one years duration; in 1968-69 this group accounted for 70 per cent of rehabilitation clients (of this group 33 per cent received services of over two years duration). Younger clients and persons with psychiatric disorders now make up a substantially greater proportion of the caseload than they did several years ago. These tend to be the clients requiring the most help.

In some instances the Department purchases counselling services. Certain disabilities require specialized knowledge e.g., the blind, the deaf, the retarded and paraplegics. Subsidies are paid to the Canadian Hearing Society, the Ontario Association of the Mentally Retarded and the Canadian Paraplegic Association for rehabilitation counselling.

In addition to direct services to disabled persons, the vocational rehabilitation program also assists various private, non-profit organizations who assist the disabled. Advice and guidance is given to them in developing programs and co-ordinating their activities. Sheltered workshops are assisted where the severely handicapped can be employed; sheltered workshops are also used for assessment purposes to determine the potential of individuals.

At the beginning of this fiscal year there were 61 approved organizations, operating 89 sheltered workshops with a capacity of about 2,500 persons.

F. Legal Aid

Ontario's legal aid plan came into effect on March 29, 1967. Its purpose is to ensure that no resident of Ontario is denied the services of a lawyer before the courts because of lack of money. Legal representation is available in criminal cases and appeals and in certain civil proceedings. Applications for legal aid may be made through any lawyer in the Province, to lawyers on duty in the courts or to an Area Director under the plan.

The Department of Social and Family Services assesses the financial needs and resources of persons referred by the Area Directors; field workers in district offices examine income, living expenses and assets. Tests applied are similar to those developed for social assistance programs but include more items such as debts. In addition the applicant's equity in real property is determined and included in his resources, when this is beyond a certain value. These factors determine whether or not the client is eligible, and if he is whether he receives full or partial assistance.

In York County the legal aid assessment function is located close to the Area Director's Office; in other areas the staff are attached to our field offices. Most recommendations are made locally; however some more difficult cases are referred to a central office for review. The assessment indicates the amount that can be paid and the time over which it should be collected. All welfare recipients are automatically eligible; applications are not referred for assessment when the charge for legal services is likely to be small. Area Directors are not bound by the assessment recommendations made by this Department. Generally, Area Directors provide an estimate of the legal costs at the time that an application is referred. Frequently persons applying for legal aid need other services such as debt counselling, family counselling or social assistance; referrals to community agencies are made by our field staff.

A brief review of some of the statistics in the annual report on the legal aid plan, issued by the Law Society of Upper Canada may be of interest.

In 1967-68, the first year of operation, the Province contributed $3,890,000 and in 1968-69 $7,032,000 to the plan. In 1967-68 there were about 55,000 applications for legal aid certificates, in 1968-69 about 58,000. In 1967-68 48 per cent of the certificates issued were for criminal cases and 52 per cent for civil cases; the distribution was approximately the same for 1968-69. The most significant change in the two years is the number of people assisted by duty counsel i.e. 67,200 in the first year, 79,600 in the second.

An analysis of completed cases for the year ended March 31, 1969 may be found at the end of this section. The most frequent criminal cases involved theft, break and enter, possession of stolen property; the most frequent civil cases involved domestic matters.

Costs of this program are born by the Province.

G. Homemakers and Nurses Services

There are services provided to individuals in their own homes to enable them to remain there. Homemakers services are furnished to homes where there are children under 16, during the absence or convalescence of their mother; there must be an adult available to care for the child when the homemaker is off duty. Nurses services may be furnished when a physician certifies that they are necessary to enable a person to remain at home or return home from a hospital. Nurses are defined as registered nurses; homemakers may have a certificate or if not have training acceptable to the welfare administrator.

In addition to homemaking services, some municipalities themselves hire teaching homemakers to assist particular families on social assistance. They go into a home to show a mother by example how to improve her ability to cook, manage her household and look after her home.

Homemakers services may be provided by a municipality directly by hiring staffs of trained personnel or they may purchase the service on a fee for service basis from private homemakers associations. The majority of visiting homemakers are privately employed by such organizations as the Red Cross and the Visiting Homemakers Association. Nursing services are usually purchased from the Victorian Order of Nurses or the St. Elizabeth Visiting Nurses Association.

Applications for services are made to the local welfare administrator. A needs test is applied to determine what part of the fee a client is able to pay. This test is similar to that used to determine eligibility for special assistance but somewhat more generous; More items included in the definition of requirements and in addition 25 per cent of net monthly earnings may be excluded from available income. Asset tests are not defined. A person in need is not required to pay the full fees; social assistance recipients are automatically eligible for services of homemakers and nurses.

If the municipality supplies homemakers services itself, no needs tests are required. In 1968-69 about 6,200 families received homemakers services and about 14,800 received nurses services.

The Province makes annual grants to the Victorian Order of Nurses and the St. Elizabeth Visiting Nurses Association for general purposes.

VI. SOCIAL SERVICES : MAJOR CHALLENGES

A. Role of Private Agencies

In the last decade there has been a pattern of an increasing injection of public funds into privately operated social service agencies. In 1966 operating expenditures of Children's Aid Societies became entirely financed from public sources. Legal Aid came into effect in 1967: over 90 percent of the funds sustaining the plan are provided by the Province. Subsidies have been increased for such services as day nurseries, homemakers and visiting nurses. Family counselling services for welfare recipients have been initiated by the Department. Vocational rehabilitation services are expanding at both the government level and through grants and purchase of service agreements with voluntary organizations. Social services are being extended into the community by homes for the aged and the financing of these is being at least in part provided from public sources.

The quality of services expected by the public is rising. Homes for the aged programs in recent years have been developed to include recreational services, adjuvant services, and other social activities. Similar examples of rising expectations could be selected from almost every other social service sector. Demands for services are outstripping the resources of the public treasury; however since financing comes from citizens who are both taxpayers and subscribers to community funds, there are restraining influences built into the system.

An expanding role for the state in financing the development of social services generally, suggests that it must become more active in policy making and planning for the provision of programs and facilities. For instance at the present time there are 51 privately operated publicly financed Children's Aid Societies of varying sizes, at various levels of development, which provide family counselling services. They supply a variety of professional, consultive and preventive services. In particular they have a statutory responsibility to protect children from abuse and neglect. Juvenile probation officers also provide counselling services to families with children in trouble; after release from training schools, rehabilitation personnel perform a similar function. At the local level boards of education and public health units have been developing counselling services to families in their own homes. In some areas municipal welfare departments have initiated family counselling programs.

Recently associations and organizations traditionally supported by the private sector have been having exploratory meetings with the Department to see if public funds might be available to them in financing their present services and in expanding into new programs.

Similar examples of the complex interrelationships between private agencies and various government departments may be found in most social service program areas. Generally, where the Province has provided capital grants it has become involved in the development of local social services and in establishing guidelines and evaluating priorities. This may be seen by contrasting the deep involvement of the Province in the homes for the aged program at the local level with the role it has played in the provision of family counselling services.

Co-ordination of services is a major concern. At present, one aspect of a social problem is the concern of one agency and another aspect of the same problem is the concern of another agency in another place. Co-ordination at the delivery level between public and private agencies has not always been too effective: co-ordination at the planning level has been even less efficient except in some aspects where large capital investments have been required.

Private voluntary social service agencies appear to face a future in which they must seek out more public financing and consequently accept a greater degree of public intervention in their internal operations. The future role of the state and what limits should be set on its authority are key questions. As public financing becomes more substantial so does the requirement for public accountability. Reports to legislatures on how public funds were spent, to what end and with what result, are part of our governmental process. This can only be accomplished by governmental examination of the effectiveness of the internal operations of private social agencies receiving public financing. The problem then is one of determining the most appropriate degree of public accountability.

A clarification of the roles of private agencies and government departments seems to be indicated. At the operating level the tendency to fragment and subdivide functions needs to be examined to see if more effective organizational patterns could be devised. At the delivery level ways of co-ordinating existing services is a basic issue.

B. Role of Municipal Governments

All municipalities must provide care homes for the aged and they are all required to contribute to the operating expenditures of Children's Aid Societies. Otherwise the development of municipal social services is left to local initiatives. If municipalities provide social services such as day nurseries or homemakers services, the Province subsidizes them. A recent local government review commented on the scarcity of services as follows:

A good deal of the difficulty arises from the municipalities' lack of interest in welfare services. This can be explained in part by their feeling that their revenue resources are inadequate and inappropriate for welfare services; part of it is due to Canada having only recently become a heavily urbanized country so that there is no strong tradition of welfare as a local service; and in part it is due to the fragmentation and voluntary provision of welfare services, with children and family services and homes for the aged each dealt with by special arrangements unrelated to the general welfare service.¹

The Smith Committee (Ontario Committee on Taxation) commented on the problems of local welfare services and in particular on the geographical discrepancies in levels of service. They advocated that child welfare programs and homes for the aged programs be incorporated into a regional government welfare service department, and that the financial arrangements for both services be altered.²

Altering local government responsibilities for the provision of social services raises issues which go well beyond the purview of the Department of Social and Family Services into the broad area of municipal finance. The problem of who should do what in this field is inextricably related to who should pay for what.

One of the objectives of local government reform in this province is to rationalize the structure of municipal finance. Municipalities must have a resource base large enough to enable them to meet their responsibilities. While the Province has been giving increasing financial support to the municipalities, it in turn is concerned about the necessity for altering fiscal arrangements between itself and the federal government. In short, re-arranging responsibility for social services between the Province and municipalities is only part of a much more far reaching requirement for tax-sharing reform between the three levels of government.

In addition to the problems of organizing and financing municipal social services there are other important issues. One of these is which services should continue to be optional and which ones obligatory. Social conditions are changing; and some services which historically were left to be implemented at the discretion of local officials are now more important to society. Should the services of visiting homemakers be available generally?

1. Fife, Stewart, Waterloo Area Local Government Review, Toronto: Department of Municipal Affairs, 1970, p.91.

2. The Ontario Committee on Taxation. Report, Toronto: Queen's Printer, 1967, Vol. II, p. 427.

Rather than the Province supplying social services itself it has given grants and subsidies to municipalities and voluntary agencies to enable them to develop programs. Advice, building standards, inspection and licensing have been typical provincial functions. Such almost mutually exclusive roles may no longer be suitable; there may be social services which should be entirely sustained by the Province and perhaps some advisory and inspection functions would be more effective if delegated. As noted in the local government report quoted previously there has not been a tradition in Canada of municipal social services. With the introduction of larger local government units in Ontario there may be an opportunity to take a new look at this arrangement.

C. Role of the Semi-Public Agencies

Studies of the structure of local municipal government in Ontario have brought to public attention variations in the standards of services provided by semi-public agencies within the local review area and across the Province. These reports have examined the relationship between the two levels of government and the agencies, both from an organizational and financial point of view.

Local autonomy and local self determination of social service needs were the accepted philosophy until recently. Even now it is not clear what degree of equalization of access to social services is desirable. Children's Aid Societies' standards of service vary and indeed it appears there is not a common understanding among the Societies themselves regarding the scope of their functions. In recent years, as financing for family counselling services became more difficult to obtain from Community Funds, some Family Service Associations have been absorbed by the local Children's Aid Society. Organizers of Community Funds have recommended to their member organizations that since their activities fall within the scope of activities of the Children's Aid Society, they seek additional funds from them.

In many areas of the Province there are few semi-public agencies to provide social services. Facilities for children who need institutional care need to be extended; not all Children's Aid Societies have group home facilities. Visiting homemakers' and visiting nurses' services are not available everywhere.

To what degree social services should be a matter of local self determination is a matter that is receiving attention.

D. Manpower Problems

Remedial education and training programs are for the most part administered by other governments and other departments; the exception is our own vocational rehabilitation service. In Canada the employment service comes under the federal Department of Manpower and Immigration; and this Department also operates adult retraining programs.

While there are aspects of Manpower training programs which could be altered to improve their effectiveness, it is not these problems which are of greatest concern. In common with many other critics of Manpower, the Department of Social and Family Services does find that rules regulating eligibility for admission and eligibility for allowances under the Occupational Training for Adults program create difficulties.

However a more fundamental weakness in the employment and adult training services as anti-poverty measures is their lack of outreach into the community where they can make direct contact with the working poor and with recipients of social assistance. Not only do these people need educational opportunities and skills upgrading they need to know what help is available and in some instances they need to be motivated to seek it. Many do not believe that training would enable them to escape; they do not see opportunities in their local community. Referrals to Manpower counsellors are made by welfare field staffs however the system is not complete and integrated: each agency remains responsible for its own part of the individual's problem. Liaison between our vocational rehabilitation counsellors and Manpower counsellors is much closer; the special group of disadvantaged people whom this program serves appear to be reached effectively. The system does not work as well for other poor people.

In the Manpower employment service there is a lack of continuity with the social assistance system; together these systems do not reach poor people to help with their employment problems. Referrals are made from one system to the other; however people who are difficult to place require special attention and in some instances even job finding. Adaptation of the placement service to more effectively assist the unskilled and disadvantaged is urgently needed. In our vocational rehabilitation program some counsellors are beginning to specialize in locating employment for disabled people. Difficulties in filling in application forms, handling interview situations and other similar problems of the poor have been well documented in other studies. Special attention needs to be paid to this particular group in the planning for the future development of the Manpower service.

An important link between training and employment services and the poor seems to be missing; not enough has been done to make the services accessible to the persons who need them most.

E. Measurement of Results

Many contemporary social services have evolved from a belief that they are necessary to make the lives of clients more comfortable and happy or that they are required in order to effect certain behavioral changes. No evaluation measures of comfort or happiness have been developed; in fact it is doubtful if "psychic" values can be quantified. Preliminary evaluation measures of the degree of behavioral change induced by counselling and social work treatment services are available, although these, too, are difficult to quantify. Since they are still in a developmental stage it is not possible to use them generally to measure the results of prevention and treatment programs. The contribution of treatment and counselling services in raising people out of poverty has not been demonstrated. Even if there should prove to be little relation between them, it is highly unlikely such services would or should be discontinued.

Other programs such as vocational rehabilitation of the physically disabled do alleviate poverty and there are techniques for measuring their effectiveness. Although conclusions based on follow up studies of rehabilitants are tentative, it seems from analyses made of American programs that "increased aggregate lifetime earnings" are impressive. The increased productivity of rehabilitants is included as a factor in the evaluation measures. However, whether or not rehabilitation programs should expand depends on an assessment of unmet needs. Not enough is known about this. Characteristics of the handicapped population not served by present programs are unexplored, nor are we fully aware of the geographical gaps in coverage of existing services. An assessment of the unfilled potential of the vocational rehabilitation program as an anti-poverty measure would be worthwhile.

Another program which has received considerable attention as a device for developing the potential of children is early childhood education. Results of the Head Start program funded originally by the Office of Economic Opportunity are inconclusive; it was designed to help deprived children make up the deficiencies which handicap them when they enter school and never overcome. The criterion of success was the degree to which mental and verbal skills and the ability to learn were improved.³ Evaluations concluded that unless there was an intensive follow up on the program in early school years, Head Start did not reduce the achievement differential between deprived children and other children. Other studies on early childhood learning have indicated that the principal development of personality takes place in early childhood. It appears from research done at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education and elsewhere that enrichment of the environment of disadvantaged children when they are very young has exciting possibilities. Any such pre-school program probably must also be accompanied by ancillary social services outreach to alter the environment at home. The long term prospects for lifting people out of generational poverty seem rather promising.

3. Subcommittee on Employment, Manpower and Poverty of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, U.S. Senate, Examination of the War on Poverty. Staff and Consultants Reports, 90th Congress, 1st Session: Washington, D.C., September 1967, Vol. IV.

It is difficult to evaluate the effects of counselling and treatment as primary poverty preventive measures. This being the case, perhaps services should be developed on an experimental basis in large public agencies, where different delivery structures can be incorporated into the system. It does not seem practical to take the individual approach of the small voluntary agency with middle class clients and apply this without adaptation to semi-public agencies serving the poor.

F. Client Involvement

Anti-poverty programs funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity have had as a goal participation by the poor. Very considerable efforts went into this and on most boards of directors of community action projects, the poor were actively represented. The U.S. Senate Subcommittee which evaluated results of community action projects recommended that community action programs continue. An analysis of the effect of Office of Economic Opportunity policies on voluntary agencies concluded:

No consensus has yet been achieved as to who should receive what services in what manner, and the role of the consumer in the voluntary welfare system . . . It seems clear that before meaningful negotiations can take place around any of these issues, a strong force will be required to exert pressure on the welfare structure because of the resistance to change . . . Program changes ultimately will depend upon the decisions of agency Boards. The introduction of consumers on these Boards and their involvement in the policy-making functions of these organizations is one method for bringing about institutional change . . . Yet, until negotiations directed at increasing the involvement of indigenous leadership in the shaping of programs affecting their interests are successfully concluded, pressure will continue to increase for the separate financing of citizen groups, and the creation of duplicate welfare system apart from the established agencies.⁴

In Ontario, there have been a few representatives of the poor elected to boards of directors of private welfare agencies. How successful this will be in attaining sought after goals remains as much in doubt here as in the United States. Meanwhile as predicted above numerous citizens groups have sprung up.

G. Integration Services

Debates concerning whether social assistance and social services should be delivered from the same administrative unit are spilling over into Canada from the United States. If services must be accepted as a condition for eligibility for assistance then their effectiveness becomes questionable. However if social assistance recipients can be referred to social service agencies within the same unit, greater possibilities exist for co-ordination of services given to a family. Referrals to other agencies are not necessary and clients' problems are looked at as a "whole" rather than being divided into several aspects. The Department of Social and Family Services is experimenting with differing organizational structures in its field offices. While there are advantages to integration there are difficulties too. It may be that separation into special services may still be necessary. Undoubtedly the need to provide money services is urgent. Other services may suffer because they can be postponed.

In summary, then, there are many unresolved aspects in evolving the most effective social services delivery system. Co-operation between all of those involved, provincial and municipal governments and private agencies, is essential.

VII. FUTURE OF SOCIAL SERVICES

Planning and administration of social services at the private agency community level has been segregated from similar functions at the municipal and provincial government level. Services have been proliferating in some areas, languishing in others. Generally, the entire system has been becoming more difficult to co-ordinate as it is subdivided into more highly specialized functions. There are a variety of approaches which would help to alleviate these shortcomings. These particular difficulties are not unique to the Province of Ontario nor to the social service field.

In Great Britain, the Seebohm Report recently examined the organization of social services for the nation, found them wanting and recommended far-reaching changes. The essence of these was a unified approach at the local government level to be achieved by creating a social service department which would be responsible for: children's services, welfare services for the aged, education welfare services, home help services, mental health and social work services, adult training centres, day nurseries and social welfare work carried out by housing departments. Recently a bill was introduced in the House of Commons to implement some of these changes.

The Royal Commission on Health Services in Canada saw somewhat similar problems in the provision of health services. The work of this Commission has been continued by the Ontario Council of Health, an advisory body made up of citizens appointed because of their outstanding reputation or interest in or association with a particular health services function. Hundreds of people have been involved in the sub-committees of the Council.

There are a variety of ways in which the future overall planning of a balanced pattern of integrated social services and community development services may be approached. Whatever happens, it will be essential for provincial and municipal governments, specialists, educators, representatives of the professions and private agencies and others to come together to plan a future course of action.

The major problems in the social service field involve deciding on who is going to do what, who is going to administer what and who is going to pay for which services.

A comprehensive review of the kinds of community development services which might be encouraged and developed is nearing completion. In the near future we expect to undertake new initiatives in community development programs for social assistance recipients. Some services are presently being provided by our field staff.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, May 26, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9.30 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would remind you that the meeting on Thursday of this week will commence at 9 o'clock. We will have two hearings on that day. Instead of 9.30 we will meet at 9 o'clock in order to give both groups an opportunity of being fully heard.

Today we have before us the brief of the Province of New Brunswick. Sitting on my right is the Honourable L. Norbert Theriault, the Minister of Health and Welfare. He was first elected to the legislature of New Brunswick in 1960; he became Minister of Municipal Affairs in October, 1965, and assumed the Health and Welfare portfolio in 1967. Sitting beside him is Mr. Clarkson, the Deputy Minister of Health and Welfare. He was the first Deputy Minister of Health and Welfare when the two departments were amalgamated. We also have here Mr. Junk, the Director of Research and Planning of the Department of Health and Welfare.

The minister will make a short statement and then we will proceed to the questions.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, do we have any simultaneous interpretation?

The Chairman: The minister says there is no need for it.

The Honourable L. Norbert Theriault, Minister of Health and Welfare, Province of New Brunswick: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Good morning senators. I am very pleased to notice that the Maritime provinces are well represented on your committee, and I am particularly pleased that it includes three people from my province. I am happy to see Senator Fergusson here, of course, with whom I have had a number of contacts since becoming involved as a member of the Government of New Brunswick.

I hope, honourable senators, you have our brief, which is in fact more or less a summary of the white paper presented to the legislature of our province by the Premier on March 26 last, plus the joint brief presented by the Atlantic provinces to Mr. Munro, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare. For those who have had time to peruse our white paper and look at the brief presented by the Atlantic provinces, plus I would hope maybe the brief presented to the federal Task Force on Housing by the New Brunswick Housing by the New Brunswick Housing Corporation in 1968, I think these papers set out pretty well the problems with which we are faced in New Brunswick, as well as in the other Atlantic provinces. I trust you will also have knowledge of some of the recommendations we have made over the years to the federal Government, hoping they would find ways and means to make special efforts to come to the rescue of the Atlantic provinces. In this I am probably repeating what has been said by the delegations from Nova Scotia, P.E.I. or Newfoundland.

We have been particularly concerned that the federal programs or at least some of them which were initiated for dealing with extreme poverty were not geared, as far as I am concerned, to the benefit of the Atlantic provinces. For instance, the Canada assistance Plan is regulated in such a way that it is much more difficult for New Brunswick to take advantage of it than it is for the wealthier provinces. I think it is as simple as this. We have a lower per capita income and we have a lower participation of our labour force because of the mobility of our younger people to other provinces. The other reason is that we have a higher percentage of old people and children in our population. It has been impossible to take as much advantage of the Canada Assistance Plan in New Brunswick as we would liked to have done.

We presented to the legislature and to the people of New Brunswick the White Paper for a number of reasons. Probably the main reason was to try and get people involved at the community level to try and cope with this problem of poverty. We have also tried to get people on a whole to realize the problems faced by those who live in poverty or who are under public assistance programs. It is surprising that in such a small province as New Brunswick how a great number of people sometimes do not really seem to be concerned or aware of their neighbours who are living in poverty. We hope that by this White Paper and the creation of a task force which we hope will move around the province hearing the people's views, ideas and suggestions, that eventually those who have been deprived will be given the consideration they deserve. In fact, if nothing very much can be done for those in the old age group, there may be ways and means found to cope with the problems faced by the children of those families and give them the same privileges enjoyed by other children in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, that about sums up our position.

The Chairman: That is fine, Mr. Minister.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Theriault and other members of his delegation know how pleased I am to have them appear before us to outline the situation in New Brunswick, because they are most familiar with it. I am particularly pleased that they are here at this time to explain the White Paper, for which I have the greatest admiration.

Mr. Theriault, I may say that I was fortunate enough to be in New Brunswick the day the White Paper was introduced in the legislature. I was in the gallery and could hardly refrain from clapping. These plans are really the first undertaken by a province dealing with welfare as well as industrial economy. You are trying to take actual steps to integrate these plans, and in my opinion this is a pioneer project in Canada.

As anyone from New Brunswick will remember, I have a special interest in family allowances. At the top of page 9 you recommend restructuring the family allowances. This is mentioned in section (B) on page 21 of the White Paper. In the third paragraph of that page you refer to the increased allowances, but you do not say how you suggest they be restructured. We take for granted that they should be increased, but how would you go about doing that?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It has been my feeling over the years that the purpose for which the family allowance program was initiated has been lost throughout the years. It seems to me, for instance, family allowances are not needed, generally speaking, for the one-child or two-child families.

The way it is geared, if I remember correctly—I should know something about it, being a father of ten . . .

Senator Fournier: Is that all?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Don't they reduce with the number of children?

The Chairman: Not much.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In age rather. I would like to see the family allowance program based on needs. I know it would not be a means test but it should be geared towards helping the families who need extra financial assistance. Whether you want to keep it for the one- or two-child family providing there is an increase with the need or the number of children in the family—the real need comes in with the wage earner or labourer who has a family of five or six children.

It might be that in totally restructuring the family allowance program the federal government should take a look at the income tax situation and possibly do away with the deductions that are allowed for children and tax the family allowance as an income. Of course, if you do not raise it there is no need of talking about this.

I have had discussions with people in Quebec, and although they are not satisfied they feel that their provincial program goes far enough and it is based on this principle. The cost in Quebec has not been all that much more. The problem, of course, in our system is that the economy is not geared in such a way that the employer can take into consideration the need of the family of his employee. I do not think there is a solution to that problem because the employer has to deal with what the employee is doing for him or his company. In the meantime you will have maybe two people earning $5,000 and they are each producing about the same for the company. One of them has one or two children, and the other one has seven or eight. The one with seven or eight children is probably living in poverty and because of this his production, instead of increasing with the years, will probably decline. He is loaded with problems when he goes to work Monday morning and he has no way of solving them when he goes home on the weekend.

Senator Fergusson: If you increased the family allowance three, four and even five times and did nothing else do you think that would solve the problem of poverty?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I cannot say that I have any suggestions to completely solve the problem. I am sure that in New Brunswick, if there was an increase, especially, and I repeat, especially in the families where there are a number of children, it would go a long way to help alleviate the problem.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Minister, you feel it should be based on need or on a means test. Do we not have that right now, in fact?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In the family allowance?

Senator Hastings: You give me money every month, but you take it back every month as well, because I don't need it, and you give it to the man who needs it. You don't take it from the man who needs it. So in fact we do have a means test in that sense, and have we not learned that these plans will operate better universally in taking from all those who don't need it and giving it to those who do need it?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We don't actually take back from the family allowance program.

Senator Hastings: Would you like to see my cheque?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: If you have children you get the money.

Senator Hastings: That is right. You are giving me a cheque every month, but you are taking it right back.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: That cheque you are getting is not counted as part of your income.

The Chairman: It does not hit you until after you are earning $10,000. It is only over that income that you start paying it back.

Senator Fergusson: It has been suggested that if the family allowance was increased sufficiently, that would be an answer to the question, Mr. Minister. What is your opinion about that?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It would go a long way, but I am not prepared to say that just that one program could do the whole job.

Senator Fergusson: Having administered family allowance for many years I am very much in favour of it. As it is some time since I had anything to do with it, however, I am not prepared to argue whether it is still doing what it was intended to do. I realize that there is still the argument that even if you did increase the family allowance that would not take care of childless families, of which there are many among the poverty stricken people of Canada.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman, first I should like to congratulate the witnesses from New Brunswick for having prepared a French "mémoire au comité spécial du Sénat sur la pauvreté", which is something we have never had before. We appreciate it very much, because it is very much in order.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is the least we should do in New Brunswick.

Senator Fournier: I should like to comment on your White Paper at page 7. You say that "Industrial development and technological change mean fewer work opportunities for persons of little education or training".

I agree with that statement. But I believe there is much room for improvement in the manpower training programs we have across Canada.

In New Brunswick, as in the Atlantic provinces generally, the standard of education is somewhat lower than in Ontario and Quebec. That is the situation we have to live with at the moment. We have quite a number of drop-outs from our technical schools owing to lack of education. I believe that is a serious problem. Now, in relation to that problem my criticism of the manpower training scheme is directed to the upgrading system it sponsors, because, although it has some merit, it comes to a dead end for too many people. For example, how can you expect a person with only grade 4 or grade 5 to upgrade himself to grade 12 within a matter of one or two years at the most. It is not possible. It has been tried and has been found unsuccessful for many reasons, not the least of which are the worries of a family man with dependents. And yet manpower has very rigid rules with respect to this grade 12 regulation.

On the other hand, I fully realize that if a person wants to reach a particular level in certain trades, such as the electrician's trade and the plumber's, he really needs that grade 12 standing. I suppose it depends on how far he wants to go. But I am concerned about those people who cannot reach that level and are thus deprived of the benefits of schooling because they have not got their grade 12.

I am certainly not convinced that a person needs grade 12 in order to become a barber or a hairdresser or possibly even a cook—and I am sure there are many other areas of endeavour like that. He certainly needs some physical abilities. I grant that.

To repeat, then, the problem in New Brunswick, and right across Canada, is that when people are deprived of schooling facilities because they have not got their grade 12, then, when they go back to the trades, there is no employment for them. To illustrate how absurd the situation is, I may say that in New Brunswick certain companies even insist on a grade 12 standing in order for a person to be employed to cut pulp wood and do hand labour. Those companies argue that employees would have no chance for promotion without the grade 12 standing.

Perhaps the answer is that in our manpower training program there should be some middle road so that people can be trained in semi-skills in all trades—the electrician's trade, plumbing and so on. In that way they could take employment equivalent to their ability and would not be sent out into the wide world without any skills.

Furthermore, we must not forget that we live in a technological age of scientific advancement which may be having the effect of depriving semi-skilled workers of their livelihood. There are many people in the age bracket of 30 to 50 who have families and, with their present abilities, are capable of earning only $50 a week, or perhaps $60. But that income is not sufficient to give them a living allowance which will also take care of their families and supply them with the needs of life.

As a result of these various forces at play in our society I believe many people are coming to the realization that they are better off on welfare than trying to eke out a meagre existence. I personally feel that applies right across the country.

Bearing all those things in mind, can you tell me what you are doing to try to overcome these problems?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Mr. Chairman, there is actually a lot of merit in what Senator Fournier has said. I am inclined to agree that manpower seems to be more concerned with finding jobs for people with trades and qualifications than it is with trying to find ways and means of supplying jobs to and upgrading those people who have not got the qualifications.

At least that is true in New Brunswick, and I can really speak only for New Brunswick.

However, I am not of the opinion that a large number of people would sooner be on welfare than be at work. Naturally, it is hard to document that one way or the other. We have not done it in New Brunswick and I doubt whether any province has done so. We hear that argument from people on the street, especially from people who are working every day of their lives and who have really never been in the position of having to go to the welfare office.

I was in conversation last week with a lady in St. John who is the mother of six and who was a welfare recipient. She has now pulled herself up by her own bootstraps and is fully employed with Family Services in St. John. She told us she had made a special survey of a given area in St. John and she came up with the suggestion that 95 per cent of the people in that given area who were on public assistance or welfare, as it is commonly known, would prefer to be working. She was pretty determined about this, and she seemed to know what she was talking about. However, I must say that in New Brunswick at least when we embarked on this provincial program, and, as you know, the administration of public assistance or welfare in New Brunswick is a provincial program, we did not give the proper consideration to the work incentive. For instance, we say to the welfare recipients "once you earn over $20 a month—if you earn even $21 a month, we take the whole $21 out" and of course this destroyed the incentive. We mention this in our White Paper. But I am still convinced that the great, great, great majority of people living on welfare if offered a job that they could do, even at the minimum wage in New Brunswick, they would prefer to work. Now I do not know if I would go so far as to agree with the 95 per cent that this lady found in her survey of her given area, but the proportion would still be very high. Of course the problem in rural New Brunswick is that the only jobs available in many areas are those in lumber camps, and these are getting fewer and fewer, as Senator Fournier pointed out, because of automation and we must keep in mind that these people often have to go 75 or 100 miles to work.

The Chairman: There was a study made by a professor of the University of Calgary who took Calgary as the area for his study. He indicated to us that as a result of his study, 5 per cent of the people on welfare were not capable or did not want to take a job.

Senator Fournier: He did not know very much what he was talking about.

The Chairman: This was the result of his study, and he presented it to us.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Minister, I recognize what you are saying, but I do not agree with you when you say great, great, great; I will just leave it at one great because of course there is a wide variety. However, Mr. Chairman, while I have some questions, I will pass for the moment and come back to them later.

Senator McGrand: I have a number of questions I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman. As we know, the problem of low incomes varies from area to area. What percentage of the people of a given area, and we will say one of the worst areas—what percentage of the people in that area are on welfare as compared with an area that is not as bad?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In our province, you mean?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not know what you mean by the level of income.

Senator McGrand: There are certain areas in New Brunswick where the income is low. Take for instance Brantville, which is one of the worst areas. What percentage of the people are supported by welfare and are depending on welfare in that area as compared with, let us say, the Parish of Ludlow?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not know if we have a definite figure based on the population. The Tracadie area, which includes Brantville and all that area, sometimes in the wintertime has as high as 38 per cent of the population depending upon public assistance. This of course does not mean that these people depend on welfare all the year round. These would be people working in lumber camps for four or five months of the year. Of course in these poverty-stricken areas, what you have is the end result of a long history of poverty, and you have naturally a low, low level of education. You have the problem of mentally affected people and physically affected people because they did not have the proper health care in their childhood. Therefore the working capability of these people is very, very limited. And so a number of these people, if not all, have reached the age mentioned by Senator Fournier, 45 or 50 and they cannot read or write, so there is really not very much you can do with these people to make them productive members of society. But what we are not doing or what society has not been doing in New Brunswick, and I am sure this applies to many other areas of Canada, is trying to make sure that the children of these families are provided with the equal opportunity in health—and I think it probably has to start with health, because health services are needed even before you can start with educational services. You know the old saying that their fathers were on welfare and their grandfathers were on welfare and their children will be on welfare. I personally do not believe this theory, but I think the system has caused this situation to a large degree, because when these children who are born in a shack and live with parents who have no education and who are not productive members of society, reach school age at grade 1 which is about six years old in New Brunswick, they are just not able to cope with other people in society.

Senator Hastings: What do you mean by mentally affected?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Some of these people are mentally affected because of the surroundings in which they live. I think they are mentally affected because they have not heard in their homes from their parents the discussions of what is good in life and what is not good in life.

The Chairman: You mean culturally?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes. But it is all part of this mental ability, and I think you start developing that at a fairly young age.

Senator McGrand: I would like to ask now, if it varies from area to area and if it depends on this background of cultural poverty, would you take the area I referred to and compare it with the Parish of Hardwicke. As you know, there they have the same natural resources and depend largely on fishing, some small farming and lumber. Now do you find this cultural poverty you have just referred to or, let me put it this way, what is the difference between those two communities? They are not equally bad, are they?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No.

Senator McGrand: And going on from there, what percentage of the people of the Parish of Hardwicke are on welfare?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It would be much lower. I do not think it is fair to say that the opportunities for earning are the same. First of all, both largely depend on the fishing industry, and that industry over the years has been much better in the Parish of Hardwicke. We have more variety and more fishing opportunities, and the returns have been much greater in the Parish of Hardwicke from the fishing industry than they have been in the area that you are talking about, in the Tracadie area, first of all, because it is a very much smaller population and there is a disparity in level of education. Because of their poverty, under the old system the people could not provide the schools and qualified teachers in the Tracadie area such as were provided in the Parish of Hardwicke.

Senator McGrand: But the first rural regional high school in New Brunswick was in the Parish of Hardwicke. I remember because I was there the day it was opened in 1940. It takes a long time to discuss this, but what you mean is that the people in this area of Hardwicke did not suffer from the same cultural poverty as people, say, in the Mactaquac area. It was because of this they had more physical resources from which to get a livelihood. Where you get a living from the natural resources, conditions are never as bad, is that not right?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Unless you are living in an area where secondary manufacturing is; but if you are living in the rural areas, you are right.

Senator McGrand: Well, New Brunswick is mostly rural.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

Senator McGrand: At the very bottom of page 10 you mention housing and say:

Special emphasis should be given to financing better housing and the services required for such housing in some of our rural communities.

Would you develop that a little and outline what you are doing in those particular areas regarding housing?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We are not doing anything because actually the way the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is operating, if you have not the basic services of water and sewage they will not advance money to build houses in these areas, and it is a vicious circle. I feel the real problem of housing in New Brunswick is in rural New Brunswick.

Senator McGrand: I agree.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In spite of the need, as we mention in this paper some place, for years Ontario, for instance, with, I think, 35 per cent of the population of Canada, was able to use 95 or 97 per cent of the money that was spent under those programs in Canada.

The Chairman: That is at the top of page 8.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am thinking here of subsidized housing, of course. Even if these monies are available in New Brunswick, because of our limited resources it is not only because of the 10 per cent to build but it is the subsidy we have to pay to those low-income people, and the subsidy is the same in New Brunswick and Ontario.

Senator McGrand: So these people in these areas we are talking about are simply caught?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, that is right.

Senator McGrand: They cannot get the money from public sources and they have not it on their own, so they are just frozen right there.

Now, would you outline what improvements have taken place in the areas where ARDA has been functioning for some time? That would take in the Brantville area.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: You are talking of the FRED agreement. As far as the ARDA program is concerned—and I do not pretend to be too familiar with it, because agriculture is not . . .

Senator Fournier: Nobody is.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: But when you look at the figures—and I have looked at the figures of the Department of Agriculture under ARDA for this year and the proposed extension of the federal Government offer to the Province of New Brunswick—you find, again, the improvements that were made under those programs were made mostly on the farms along the Saint John River.

Senator Fergusson: Where they had the best farms anyway.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Where they had the best farms anyway, in King's County and those areas. Again, you had to have something to start with.

Senator McGrand: In the ARDA program did they not spend money to raise the standard of education in the area?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Under the FRED program, yes, and in the County of Restigouche and Gloucester and one parish in the County of Northumberland . . .

Senator McGrand: The Parish of Alywick.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, the Parish of Alywick—quite a few dollars have been expended in upgrading educational facilities. We will now have no high school complex in Tracadie, Caraquet, Shippegan and those areas. This is fine; this has to be done; but my concern is this. 38 per cent is the whole area, but take Caraquet and Shippegan, for instance. The majority of the people living in those villages are providing themselves and their families with a fair standard of living. Because you know the area, take a child that comes from Brantville and lands in that high school complex coming from a shack where his father and mother cannot read or write, and he is badly dressed and possibly has not the 35 or 45 cents to buy lunch at the cafeteria, and there are 75 per cent of the children in that school who have all this. He is just not equipped to cope with the situation. In spite of the facilities, unless special efforts are made to deal with these people we are not going to rectify the situation.

Senator McGrand: This program has been in operation for a number of years. Is there evidence of favourable results?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I think education-wise, yes.

Senator McGrand: Just one more question. On page 2 particular stress is given to equipping persons who are displaced from primary industries with skills to cope with the more complex world. Would you talk a little on that?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: What we mean here is people who were in the fishing industry—that is a primary industry—or in the wood-cutting industry. Because of mechanization and advances in technology, fewer and fewer people are going to be employed in those trades, although production will increase.

What we are concerned with here is that because of the growth centre concept that has been accepted by the federal Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the two areas that have been declared growth centres in New Brunswick are Saint John and Moncton. We want to make sure that we do not have an influx of those unprepared people rushing into those centres because they know there is going to be growth and development, along with land in those centres being unprepared and the cities not being prepared to receive them.

The thinking behind the White Paper, I repeat, is to involve the community, and also to involve the different departments of government, because anybody who has had experience with government knows that all departments do not co-ordinate their efforts as they should. I am sure you have had that experience in New Brunswick. Senator McGrand, and you too, Senator Fournier. This is why we in New Brunswick, in order to try to cope with the situation, have to have complete co-ordination between the departments of health and welfare, education, labour, municipal affairs, and so on. If we can get the bureaucrats to think in that way then maybe we can get some place.

Senator Hastings: How are you succeeding?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am not ready to say yet that it has been a total success, because we are only starting.

Senator Carter: I would like to come back to the question raised by Senator Fergusson at the beginning with respect to family allowances, and I would refer you to page 21 of the White Paper, where at the bottom of the page you say:

If increased allowances are combined with changes in the Income Tax Act designed to remove the benefit from those that do not need it, the overall cost would not be great.

I have two questions to ask you. If you were to increase the family allowance, how much of an increase would you have in mind?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not know if my people have given any thought as to what the figures might be. I am not prepared to suggest an amount at this moment.

Senator Carter: Have you any idea as to what would be adequate, based upon the surveys you have made?

Mr. D. J. Junk, Director of Research and Planning, Department of Health and Welfare, Province of New Brunswick: Quebec produced this paper in November, 1969 entitled: "Guidelines for a New Quebec Family Allowance Policy", in which they have worked out the increments of cost for additional children. It starts at $353 for the first child, and goes down to $297 for the fifth child.

Senator Carter: Is that per year?

Mr. Junk: Yes, per year. They suggest—and this is really what we are talking about here—that there be some sort of system in which you start approaching this incremental cost of $300 a year for about the fourth and fifth child, and perhaps down as low as the third child, and that you lower the amount paid for the first and second children. One of their suggestions as to how this can be restructured comes up with an additional cost for Quebec of something like $29 million a year. I do not have a detailed breakdown, but that appears to be something like $100 million or $110 million for Canada. If you added in changes in the Income Tax Act which would recover some of the money from those who do not need it, by either taxing family allowances or reducing exemptions, you could reduce the cost to below that figure. It seems to us that a restructuring and a change like that would go a long way towards solving the problem, and it is something that could be done immediately and at reasonable cost to the country.

Senator Cook: Could you give us those figures again so that we are sure of what we are talking about?

Mr. Junk: They have done some calculations based on the assumption that the first child costs $350 a year; the second child, $322 a year; the third child, $303; the fourth child, $302—these are incremental costs per child—and the fifth child, $297.

Senator Cook: Is this universal?

Mr. Junk: That is their estimated cost of looking after a child. Then they suggest a restructuring which would pay that incremental cost of $300 for the fourth and fifth children, but not for the first, second, and third children.

Senator Fergusson: That is, they would not pay anything for the first, second and third children.

Mr. Junk: They have various alternatives here. The first is to pay nothing for the first child, but to pay something for the second child. Another alternative is to pay something for each child as per a graduated scale. The one that was estimated to cost $29 million, if I can find it here, involved paying nothing for the first child, and something for each additional child. I cannot put my finger on it right now.

The Chairman: We will let Senator Carter proceed, and when you find it you can break in.

Senator Carter: I want to be sure that I have the correct picture of what this plan is supposed to do. This plan would be aimed at the family below the poverty level with the purpose of bringing them up to the poverty line? That total cost was related to that particular group, was it not, and not to a plan of universal application?

Mr. Junk: The total cost of $29 million for Quebec, and $100 million to $110 million for all of Canada, was for a plan of universal application. That is the increase in cost over the cost of the present family allowances.

Senator Cook: That means that nobody would get anything for the first child?

Senator Carter: This is a new plan in which the bread-winner would look after the wife and the first child, or the first and second children, and the Government through family allowances would look after the additional children?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, in principle that is right.

Senator Carter: You talk about changes in the Income Tax Act to remove the benefit from those who do not need it. We had the same idea expressed yesterday by Ontario. We did not get much help from them as to just what changes they had in mind. They did mention a surcharge on the income tax. Have you pursued this idea very far?

Mr. Junk: I think that the method suggested was that family allowances should be included in income which would be taxed. This could then be compounded by a reduction in or an elimination of exemptions for children. This would result in recouping that money from the higher income groups.

Senator Carter: Yes, there are all sorts of alternatives and combinations of alternatives. You could impose an extra tax, or you could reduce the exemptions. Obviously, you would apply it only to the people who get the family allowance. If there is a special method of taxation, it would not apply to those people who have no children, otherwise you would be taking something from them that they did not get in the first place.

Mr. Junk: That is right.

Senator Carter: But you have not developed it to the point where you can say: "We will put a 10 per cent surcharge on the normal amount of tax"?

Mr. Junk: No, we have not worked it out in detail. There are a number of alternatives.

Senator Carter: He wants to recover $190 million.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: If you accept the fact that you want to recover the whole $190 million.

Senator Carter: Yes, from that particular group who pay taxes, receive family allowances and do not need them.

Dr. J. G. Clarkson, Deputy Minister, Department of Health and Welfare, Province of New Brunswick: The Income Tax Act would have to be restructured sharply in order to recover the whole $190 million. We have to think in terms of contributing some money.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We are in the unfortunate position in New Brunswick of not being able to consider a 10 per cent surcharge tax.

Senator Carter: At page 6 of your brief you say it is necessary to discuss the improvement of mechanisms and co-ordination of private and public concerns.

I presume this refers to your own province?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

Senator Carter: In the next paragraph you refer to proceeding on two levels, with a new effort to co-ordinate and integrate the many related programs.

Could you expand on that? Are you referring to co-ordination and integration of programs under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Dr. Clarkson: There are many federal programs directed at tackling the same problem and that disparity of distribution of benefits.

There is the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which is looking after unemployment; the Department of Manpower and Immigration, which is really to some extent also concerned with unemployment; the Canada Assistance Plan; and the FRED and ARDA programs. In addition there is the vocational rehabilitation agreement.

If you consider these to be social services, health service programs are administered by the federal Government. There could be a great deal more co-ordination between these programs. Furthermore, some of them could be amalgamated to tackle the basic problem in a very much more concrete fashion.

For instance, why is the Unemployment Insurance Commission not amalgamated with the Department of Manpower and Immigration; a much closer link between the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the Canada Assistance Plan; and provision in these programs to take into account one group of the disadvantaged, namely the physically disadvantaged, which in actual fact has a separate program all to itself under the vocational rehabilitation agreement?

These are some of the aspects we considered when stating that there has to be a much more co-ordinated approach on the part of the federal Government to the whole question of the disadvantaged.

Senator Carter: In the fourth line of the second paragraph of page 6 you state:

We are presently applying ourselves to this problem within the Province of New Brunswick and hope to soon greatly improve our methods of co-ordination.

Would you elaborate as to what exactly you are doing?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We made a start in New Brunswick in trying to co-ordinate our health and welfare programs, for instance. We are making efforts to co-ordinate our mental health programs. We hope to integrate them as a result of discussions throughout the province on the White Paper. This does not mean total integration of the departments, but integration of educational programs.

For instance, in New Brunswick at the present time there is a movement afoot, which is common in some other provinces, for kindergarten programs. These are desirable, but if a kindergarten program is introduced in New Brunswick, who is going to benefit most from it? Again it is going to be those people who can probably provide kindergarten services for their children.

This is what we are trying to do and have done to some degree in New Brunswick. As Dr. Clarkson has pointed out, we feel that at the federal level there is room for some co-ordination and integration.

I have always felt, for instance, that the Department of Manpower and Immigration has not, in New Brunswick at least, provided the kind of services that they should. I wish to make further reference to this, because there are a good many people from the Maritimes and Dr. McGrand mentioned the Tracadie area. The Department of Manpower and Immigration counsellor leaves Bathurst, for instance, and goes to Tracadie for half a day per week. What kind of services are they providing for those people?

I believe there could be greater co-operation and co-ordination between some of the federal programs and those of the province. I have attended a number of conferences where Ontario and, particularly, Quebec stated that manpower should be a provincial matter. While I do not say that for New Brunswick, when I see what is going on in some areas I understand why Quebec takes that stand.

It is improving now, but we have had trouble for years in even getting these people to come and talk to us about our welfare, training and poverty programs and problems.

Senator Carter: I can understand that the manpower programs are lacking in quantity. You say one person goes to Tracadie and is there half a day and what use is that? To my mind that is quantitative.

Have you any complaints with respect to the quality of the service? Even if there were two people going to Tracadie for a week, what type of services would you expect that you are not getting now?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: The Department of Manpower and Immigration is too much concerned with placing people with qualifications and abilities. Often those people would find jobs in any event. They are not sufficiently concerned with those people who cannot do it on their own. A person gets his cheque from the federal Government or the provincial Government and the taxpayer is paying it.

Senator Carter: It is geared to those people who have trades?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes; there could be more co-ordination between the Department of Manpower and Immigration and our welfare officers, for instance.

Senator Carter: In the last paragraph on page 7 of your brief you state:

Present welfare benefit schedules do not reflect cost of living variations across the country nor do the services provided reflect the relative need for those services.

Are you now speaking only of New Brunswick, across the province or across the country as a whole?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am talking of the country as a whole, although the benefit levels are set at the provincial level. We have no choice when we set out welfare benefits. We have a choice by law, but we have no real choice because we have not got the resources.

Senator Carter: What I want to get at is this. Do the benefits in New Brunswick reflect the cost of living variations across the province?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No. I do not believe the cost of living varies across the province that much, and I do not believe it varies across the country that much either. For instance, we are sure that the cost of living is as high or higher in the Atlantic provinces, specifically in New Brunswick, as in any other place in Canada.

Dr. Clarkson: I think the difficulty here is that just because New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces pay low benefits, one feels it is cheaper to live in New Brunswick. The inference is not that. The inference is that the standards under which these people live are very much lower than the standards under which the poor of other parts of Canada live. The big question we want to pose it: should not it be fundamental to Canada as a nation to adopt minimum standards in terms of the health and welfare of its people, irrespective of whether they come from the Atlantic region, Ontario, the western region or any part of Canada?

Senator Carter: On page 8, in the last paragraph you say:

Provision of special federal assistance for the development of human resources similar to that provided under the present FRED agreement.

You say further:

In our case it would complement the economic development program now being implemented through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

My first question is this. When you talk about the development of human resources as provided under FRED, what resources do you have in mind?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: One that has been made possible under FRED is education. There has been special provision for upgrading education in the area covered by FRED which we think should apply . . .

Senator Carter: Is that not being continued under DREE?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is, but there are those two growth centres in New Brunswick of Moncton and Saint John, there is the FRED agreement covering Restigouche, Gloucester and one portion of my country of Northumberland, then there are the rest of the province that is not included.

Senator Carter: What you are talking about, then, is an application to the whole province?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In our case. We are, of course, speaking for New Brunswick.

Senator Carter: Whereas DREE and FRED apply only to specific areas.

Senator Inman: On page 17 of the White Paper on Social Development and Social Welfare you speak about:

Persons living in poverty need especially to be informed of the opportunities open to them.

What has the Province of New Brunswick done to solve this problem? How can these people secure information about opportunities open to them?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: This really is a problem. It is probably not peculiar to New Brunswick but is applicable to all poverty areas. We believe we will have achieved something by publishing this white paper. Also we have had our local television stations put on what are called public service programs, in which they invite people from all walks of life, including welfare recipients, to participate. Then again, by establishing a task force that will go about New Brunswick and publicized, advertised, hold hearings, and bring in people from below the poverty line, whether they are the working poor or welfare recipients, eventually we might be able to make at least some of these people aware of their rights. We have recently instituted what we feel is a pretty broad appeals board under our welfare act in New Brunswick. True the ombudsman is there, but many of these people do not really...

Senator Hastings: They have no idea.

The Chairman: They do not warm up to them.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Through this dialogue that we hope to get going throughout the province we believe we will make these people aware of this, and also try to involve people at the community level—and in the social agencies, and indeed all organizations that have as a goal the betterment of their community. We hope we can reach these people and make them aware of their rights.

Senator Hastings: You have established an appeal board?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

Senator Hastings: But you have no representative of the poor on the appeal board?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No.

Senator Inman: Up to date you have no special agency to inform these people?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No.

Senator Inman: Do you have such a thing as legal aid?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No, we do not have legal aid in New Brunswick yet. It is very much a live subject right now, as of the last session of our legislature. To my mind legal aid is a very basic service that should be provided. I do not know why this service cannot be provided under the Canada Assistance Plan.

The Chairman: Who said it cannot?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not think the legislation allows it. Ontario says it does not anyway.

The Chairman: Not quite. No, Ontario did not say any such thing. Miss Crittenden mentioned that the minister said that it was not allowable, or words to that effect. However, you must realize the circumstances under which he said it. Ontario spends $7 million for Legal Aid. The rest of the provinces spend very little. It meant handing over to Ontario almost $1 million or $2 million for legal aid and very little to the rest of the provinces. It was not the sort of position the Government could readily face. The Canada Assistance Act is a basic social act. Is legal aid a social need in the same way as medical aid, dental aid and drug aid, or is it not?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I think in some cases it is.

The Chairman: It is up to you people to decide whether it is or not. Certainly I think it is, but it is up to you.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Even if the cost-sharing were available under the Canada Assistance Plan, a province like New Brunswick is not able to cope with all these services because of the sharing formula at the federal level.

Senator Inman: On page 7 of the white paper you mention industrial development. I know you have gone into that in New Brunswick, but what other special programs do you have that are working? Do you have Headstart or Newstart, or anything like that?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: There is a Newstart program in one county of New Brunswick. I am not familiar with the total program. I think it is a total federal program. They think it is a total need program. It is more of a fact-finding program in a given poor area of the province. What will come from that program after they have geared all the facts? Whether this program will carry on with some basic working programs, I do not know.

Senator Inman: You do not have a program of trying to get people off small farms?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: This is being done.

Senator Inman: I was very interested in what you said about the manpower program. It is not very satisfactory in Prince Edward Island.

Senator Hastings: Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the witness this morning for both the presentation and the profound knowledge and appreciation the minister has for this problem. We have covered about five areas of federal participation which seem to be inadequate. We have the family allowances which were designed for the sharing of wealth and distribution of the wealth. It is not working. We seem to have a consensus that the manpower programs are not working. You indicated that the budgetary limitations placed on you by the Canada Assistance Plan and the National Housing Act and FRED and ARDA are also not working. Do you agree with the statements, sir, that these are not working and are a failure because they were not designed to help the poor but to help the middle and upper incomes?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I would not go that far. I am not prepared to say that these programs are not working.

Senator Hastings: They are not adequate.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: There is room for improvement. I think the country as a whole, including probably the Atlantic provinces, is a much better place to live in because of these programs. I do not believe in this changing age that any given program which was established 20 years ago can be as effective 20 years later, or even that it was meant to be when it was started. I do not have all the solutions; if I had I would not be here.

Senator Hastings: They seem to be inadequate to reach the people in poverty.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: They can be improved upon, but I believe that the shared cost programs based on a 50-50 formula have aggravated the situation in the poorer parts of Canada.

Senator Hastings: They have made the rich richer and the poor poorer.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: That is right.

The Chairman: I have a few basic questions. How many people have been on welfare in New Brunswick during the last two years?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It runs between 50,000 and 60,000, which is roughly ten per cent of our population, including dependants and all.

The Chairman: You are saying total.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

The Chairman: How many would you say in family numbers, four to a family?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: About 15,000.

The Chairman: Has it increased or decreased within the last year?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We had a radical increase in 1967 when we took over the responsibility at the provincial level because up to that time it was left with the municipalities and, of course, the poorer the municipality the lower the benefits were. Of course, when we equalized the benefits a whole group of people became ineligible.

The Chairman: The statement indicates that the increase was $3 million in 1967. You are quite right on that, from fourteen to seventeen.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Probably we have budgeted for seventeen.

The Chairman: From fifteen to seventeen.

Senator McGrand: Have you gotten those broken down by counties?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It has increased in every county.

The Chairman: Has the number of families remained about the same or did it increase in 1968 and 1969? Never mind about 1970.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: From 1968 to 1969 I would say the increase was not that drastic.

The Chairman: What is your total budget in New Brunswick?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: $450 million. If you include our loans, it was about $475 million.

The Chairman: You spent approximately seventeen.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: That figure is for 1970-1971. We are spending about $30 million.

Dr. Clarkson: Our budget for the current fiscal year is $450 million. The amount of moneys budgeted for welfare services is $30.6 million which is seven per cent.

The Chairman: All of the other Maritime Provinces are higher than that.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Let me analyze our budget. Our budget in New Brunswick is probably the highest in the Atlantic provinces because of the fact that the provincial responsibility is much wider than in the other Atlantic provinces. The Government of New Brunswick is totally responsible for all educational costs, administration and construction, from grade one. It is not totally responsible at the university level, but it is responsible for administration and construction. It is also responsible for our welfare, hospital services, administration and construction, and our justice expenditures. Our budget reflects the total municipal expenditure in that $450 million. In Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island, these expenditures would not be totally reflected in the provincial expenditures. It is in Newfoundland to a considerable degree.

The Chairman: The figures we had from Newfoundland pretty well confirmed our own. The amount of money they spent on welfare as compared to what they had in the way of a budget were higher no matter what basis you put it on. In Newfoundland it is almost 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: That would be higher.

The Chairman: In Nova Scotia it is ten point something.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: They do not include municipal expenditures. We reflect the total municipal expenditures in our budget.

The Chairman: You are lower, not higher. They do not reflect at all. They only reflect the provincial. They have about 10.6, and you reflect all and you have about 7 per cent.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It makes our budget higher in comparison.

Senator Fergusson: That is why the percentage is lower.

The Chairman: When you speak of family allowances are you considering youth allowances? Does the youth allowance help you at all in your province?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It helps a little, but for a poor family that $10 youth allowance doesn't go very far. It would not even provide the child in high school with petty cash to buy his lunch at the cafeteria.

Senator Hastings: The child of the poor in all probability is not in school.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In that respect we have improved greatly.

The Chairman: The province is responsible for education now. It is not at the local levels.

When the sharing and equalization formula came in in 1966 or 1967, did your province raise objections to it at that time?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I was not the minister responsible, but I would expect the end result was the same as my experience has shown in the federal-provincial conferences: they look for a consensus, and when they get agreement from Ontario and Quebec that is consensus.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, any time they get agreement from Ontario and Quebec that is a miracle; it is not a consensus.

The position of the maritimes has been placed squarely before us and we understand it perfectly. We believe the formula is unfair to the maritime provinces. The question is how to solve the problem. An agreement was made with the provinces for sharing benefits. That agreement has continued throughout the last three years. In 1967 or 1968 you became aware of the seriousness of your position with respect to finances. What has been done since then?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Actually, from the federal point of view, nothing. But what has been asked for is a different story, and this is not the first time we have asked for it. I can only go back as far as am concerned personally, to my first conference of 1967 when I became responsible for this program. The situation is not quite as bad now as it was, but we still have people leaving New Brunswick to go to Toronto, even if only to be on welfare in Toronto. In that way what the Government of Canada is actually doing is spending 50 per cent of the cost of the person's move to Toronto, and that is costing the Government of Canada more in many cases than it would if the Government paid the 100 per cent cost of keeping the person in New Brunswick.

The Chairman: What is your maximum allowance?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Our benefits are shown in our White Paper at page 43, table 6.

The Chairman: I see there a monthly budget of $207 for a couple with two children. You have indicated that is inadequate but that there is nothing you can do about it.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is impossible to do much better for two reasons: first, our resources are limited and our taxation is high. Some people say our taxation is the highest in Canada. I would not go that far, but I would say it is just as high as anywhere else in Canada.

Senator Fournier: I say it is higher.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: If you take the municipal tax structure into consideration it is not the highest, but it is as high as people can afford to pay.

Second, and this is perhaps true of the country as a whole, the majority of taxpayers have to be made familiar with the problems and circumstances in which these people live. I would include, of course, our people in the Treasury Board.

The Chairman: You mean the federal Treasury Board?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I would hope so, yes, both at the provincial level and at the federal level.

The Chairman: Looking at table 6 on page 43 of your White Paper, Mr. Minister, I notice that the recommendation of the Economic Council for the 1961 level was $400 lower than the 1969 level. It was $1,500 compared to $1,900. The committee can see from that what the province of New Brunswick is up against. The figures speak for themselves.

Mr. Minister many of the senators have made the point that the educational qualifications under the Manpower Act make it almost impossible for people to qualify. As you say, they are trained people with whom they are dealing. But there is a provision under the Canada Assistance Plan for a Work Activity Program in which the province sets the standards. Under that arrangement, if a person has no educational qualifications at all, the province can train him for a particular activity and the federal Government will pay 50 per cent of the cost of the training activity. Has the province of New Brunswick taken advantage of that opportunity?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No.

The Chairman: Why?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Money.

The Chairman: You cannot afford it. I see.

Dr. Clarkson: I don't wish to belabour the point about manpower, but I think I should point out that it is not quite correct to say that manpower will not give assistance to persons unless they have grade 12. They do have upgrading programs. Our concern, however, is that manpower tends to act as the representative of the employers rather than the representative of the employees. Manpower tends to go out and search for jobs for the employer rather than search for jobs for the employee. That is our major concern with respect to manpower.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, we have had evidence before this committee to show that it is a fact that there is a lack of uniformity of allowances across the country. In view of that, and in view of the limit that you have on the allowances which you say are unsatisfactory and unrealistic in respect of larger families, and in view of your limited resources, what is your opinion of income support being on a uniform basis across the country? Bear in mind that the ability to pay taxes is proportionate to the need for income support: both depend upon the means of the family, and there is very little difference, practically, in the extra-provincial taxation between provinces.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We stated our position, Mr. Chairman, when we said that the federal Government's responsibility should be to see that a minimum standard of services is available to all.

The Chairman: We are talking about income.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Well, income would surely go a long way, but if you look only at income provided to individuals, you are not equalizing opportunities, because minimum income would not provide housing, for instance, and under the present system the richer provinces can take more advantage of the housing policies of Central Mortgage and Housing. This would be a start. But I think as far as New Brunswick is concerned, we must recognize that we cannot as a provincial jurisdiction at this time think of a guaranteed income on the provincial level.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, we were thinking of it from the constitutional point of view. Constitutionally, income comes from the federal Government and services come from the provincial Government.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: What is your definition of services?

The Chairman: Well, services—social services. That is one definition I can give.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: But what is your definition of social services?

The Chairman: My definition of social services would involve the disadvantaged people, the blind, the crippled, the aged and making it possible for these people to make the best use they can of whatever income they have. To be rehabilitated wherever possible by guidance and counselling. This must be done at the provincial level. One might call it rehabilitation and counselling services.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: But in all social service programs, ways and means must be found so as not to totally destroy the incentive to work. If Canada ever succeeds in bring about a guaranteed income, I hope the same mistakes will not be made that we have made when we implemented our program under the Canada Assistance Act because there we did not provide for the incentive to work. If you say to a breadwinner, the head of a family "you are going to get $4,000 a year whether you work or not", and if there is a job available for him at $3,600 or $3,000, well, if he takes it, he is still only going to get the $4,000 in which case the statement I made earlier regarding the 95 or 99 per cent of people now on welfare who are willing to work might not be true in 20 years from now.

The Chairman: But that situation exists in your province now because you are helping the working poor. In your province, if a man is earning $250 a month, and if on welfare he would be entitled to $300 a month, you make up the $50 difference to keep him working.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, but on the other hand we say to the head of a family now receiving $150 a month, and this particularly applies to single-parent families, particularly women who are deserted or widowed, "if you are entitled to $150 a month on welfare and if you take a job at $160 a month, you lose the total welfare benefits." And of course if such a person works, they have to spend more than if they were not working because they have to dress better which usually costs more and they have to pay for transportation. But, as I say, if this person gets a job at $160 a month, while under welfare she would receive $150 a month, then she does not get anything.

Senator Fournier: She works for $10 a month.

Senator Fergusson: She is in fact worse off.

The Chairman: In those circumstances, do you think the province would be further ahead in making a contribution to keep them working. In some provinces in those circumstances they give them medical care, dental care and drugs to ensure that they receive some useful benefit. You have been assisting the working poor for a couple of years to a greater extent than anybody else. What has been your experience?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I think our experience in helping the working poor, while what we have provided has been minimal, has been one of the good facets or our program.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Minister, I have some questions, but before putting them, I am going to praise you a little and then I am going to blame you a little. First I want to praise you for your attitude towards the CMHC. When you say it is a vicious circle, I agree with you. I have said worse things than that about them on many occasions publicly myself. You are talking about people moving to Toronto and outside. I can give you a short example in a few words. Right in my own region we have eight school teachers who bought lots, and they all had about $8,000 in the bank ready to build homes. They have been waiting for a couple of years and CMHC will not even talk to them. I think it is a crime and I think it is waste and it is a scandal. If you follow the policy as it is laid down here, there will be 10 miles with nothing at all between different communities. That is against my policy. We should try to spread out and build up the country that way. There are some stubborn bureaucrats in this office and I could give you the names but I do not want to put them on record.

I want to talk about abuses in the social services, and I am sure you are aware of some of them but probably you are not aware of all of them. Most of the abuses here in New Brunswick are coming through what I call credit cards, provincial credit cards. The poor have these little cards in their pocket and they have an open door to medical care, dental care and anything else they need. That is something I do not have but many people do have. I understand you have something like 35,000 credit cards in circulation and there is a lot of abuse in connection with these credit cards. I am going to give you some examples. I don't know whether you have corrected some abuses, but I hope you have. I have some notices of enquiry which reveal some of the facts of what I am saying and I am sure you have seen these notices of enquiry.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I have answered them.

Senator Fournier: I know you have, because I have your answer here. Now I want to refer to this, and it reads—"under the Welfare Act, in each district in the province, April 1st, 1968—" that was the latest available date. I do not think it is the latest available date but I think it was in 1969. Now I do not intend to read all of these by any means, and I do not intend to present the one about the dental society because it is worse than this. During the discussion, you have mentioned the Tracadie region here, so let me give you some figures of what took place in the Tracadie region. In that area you had 14 doctors who operated mostly under this credit card system, and those 14 doctors have collected among themselves something in the region of $270,000, which makes for an average of about $19,000 per doctor. One doctor collected $1,000, another one collected $14,000, another one $4,000, yet another one $8,000—I am not giving the hundreds—another one $34,000, another $13,000, another $23,000, yet another $17,000, another $1,000—that must have been some great oratory, I would say,—and the next one is $32,000. Then there is $7,000, $7,500, $11,000 and $20,000, all under welfare.

Mr. Minister, if you are going to tell me there were no abuses, there is something critically wrong with my hearing.

Senator Hastings: Could the Minister explain this?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am quite familiar with this situation.

Senator Hastings: What is this credit card? This is interesting.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: When he speaks about the credit card, our welfare recipients are provided with a card, what we call a medical card, which entitles the welfare recipient to go to a doctor and his doctor's bills are paid. It entitled him to dental care. I will come to what we have done about it, although I regret we had to do it. He goes to the drug store and he is supplied with drugs.

Senator Hastings: Prescription drugs?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Glasses?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, the optometrist or the ophthalmologist provides him with glasses or an eye refraction or whatever he needs.

Senator Fournier: Little aches and pains here and there?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: This is what I say is lacking in New Brunswick and across the country, the knowledge of the conditions under which those people have lived for years. If you take dental care, for instance, there are hundreds and thousands of families in New Brunswick—as I am sure there are across the country, especially large families—that were never able to afford to see a dentist. Now you put at their disposal a program which entitles them to go to see a dentist. These persons are 40, 50, 65 years old, they have children ranging from six to 18, and they have never seen a dentist.

In a number of cases the dentist has no alternative but to take this person, who has three or four old hooks left in his jaw, into the hospital, and he pulls them out and has to give him a denture. Often it happens in cases of children of 10, 11, 12, or 13 years of age.

You can say these are abuses. I am not saying that there may not be a few exceptions, but to my mind it is not an abuse but is providing a service which society should have provided at least 50 years ago in our country. When you talk about those doctors, what you fail to say is that these doctors in that area—and this is not good—also provide their own drugs, which I do not like. I do not know what the medical association can or should do about it. I have some ideas on it, but maybe I should not say what they are right now. This includes medical and drug services. And why there is such a difference between one doctor receiving $1,000 and another receiving $75,000 or $87,000, or something . . .

Senator Fournier: I have not got that one on my list.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Maybe your list is not completed—is because you have a number of doctors who will not see these people. We have talked about 38 per cent of the population at a given time depending on public assistance for a living, but you have another 62 per cent of the population that pay their own doctor bills and have their own Blue Cross, Blue Shield or private insurance. A number of doctors will not see the welfare recipients, and often they have to pay a dollar even to come into their office. As far as our program is concerned in New Brunswick—and I defy anybody to say otherwise—we could not care less about and politics does not enter into the picture. I do not care what a doctor's politics are. What I care about is that he provides services to people who need them. This is why you have one doctor with $75,000 or $85,000 and another with $1,000, because some of the doctors will not see those poor people. Like one of the union leaders said, they do not smell good enough.

The Chairman: You do not have Medicare?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No, not up to the present time.

The chairman: You provide your welfare recipients with this service that you have mentioned?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes, the welfare recipients. Unfortunately, and probably what is in your mind, Senator Fournier, is that what we have done to correct the abuses was forced upon us by public opinion and because these questions were raised in our legislature the way you have raised them here. We were forced to impose a deterrent charge, and now a welfare recipient has to pay $2 for every prescription he has filled, and, believe me, often times they have not got the $2. They also have to pay 50 per cent of the cost of a denture, because one dentist who had worked mostly for welfare recipients happened to be a member of the legislature and had taken in $75,000 and there was a public outcry. But I believe that before a deterrent charge our program was a much better one than it is now. Because of public outcry and because the dollars were not available we had to impose the penalties on the poor people. I am not saying doctors are not human. I am not saying one doctor does not supply more drugs than he should or would prescribe if he were sending his patient to the drug store. We have to deal with human beings as they are. Whether you are a doctor, senator, minister or anyone else, there are the human elements of life involved. But believe you me, when it comes to doctors, you had families in a certain area with seven, eight, nine or ten children. You talk about a headache. When we have a headache, we take an aspirin; but in some cases they just did not have an aspirin, so they went to the doctor.

In New Brunswick, until this became a public issue, many people felt strongly about this. For a year after I became Minister responsible for welfare, I could not go anywhere but that someone would come up to me and mention this. My standing answer is, "Provide me with a name and a case of a person who is abusing the program." I am still waiting for names.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Chairman and Mr. Minister, I certainly appreciate the way you defended your case, like a gentleman. I like that kind of debate. You and I could argue on these things and I could cite many cases, but we will get nowhere. We are well aware of the situation, but I think the $2 you impose today has cured some of these abuses I know of, and I could give you some shocking examples. In the first place, that $2 they get from the welfare and it does not cost them anything.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: But it comes from their regular benefits, and their benefits are low.

Senator Fournier: I will give you another example of a credit card. I know a railroad trainman who must get about $6,000 or $8,000 a year. Not very long ago he took his brother-in-law's credit card and got a upper plate from the dentist. I am not going to give you the name because I am not that type, but these things happen. I think the dentist was guilty because I am of the opinion that he knew the man was not the bona fide holder of the card, because in an area like that, in which my home is, they practically know everyone and everything.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: There is a regulation under our legislation by which, if we could get the name, this man would be prosecuted—not only the dentist, but the brother and the holder.

Senator Fournier: Mr. Minister, you are aware of all these things and I am confident that you have taken some action to correct them. I can very well see that a couple of years ago these things went sky-high, but you were not aware of the things that were taking place. I say there was too much politics involved. Maybe you are not aware of that. It is not done at your level, but the local level. There are people who are screening recipients, and if the recipient is a Tory it is very difficult for him to get something. I know what I am talking about.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I wish, senator, you would provide me with names. Let me explain the situation. When we took over that program we took on every municipal employee. You get it from one side of the fence, and I get it from the other side. The ones who come to me say: "We can't get anything because we are Liberals. That municipal employee was a Tory when he was hired and he is still working for the Tory party." These things do not impress me very much. There might be a few exceptions, and I think there will always be exceptions as long as you are dealing with humans. But, our files are open. The Telegraph Journal writer came to my office and looked at the files from A to Z. We get hundreds of letters a day, and a standing answer goes out under my signature to all of those people who complain saying that I will not give any direction to the regional offices, and that the regional directors are the ones that decide because they know the situation.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that I do not think Senator Fournier has the right to put cases that he says he knows about on the record unless he is prepared to give the names and addresses.

The Chairman: We do not want names.

Senator Fergusson: Anybody can say anything.

The Chairman: Has not the minister met the situation?

Senator Fergusson: Yes, very well.

Dr. Clarkson: There may have been an implication in Senator Fournier's comments that the poor abuse physicians' services and health services. Personally, I do not think the poor abuse physicians' services and health services, and perhaps I can point out some statistics that demonstrate this.

First of all, in New Brunswick, when compared with the rest of Canada, the doctor-population ratio is reasonable, but when you look at New Brunswick in detail you find that the doctor-population ratio is extremely low in the northern part of the province. In northern New Brunswick there is a great shortage of doctors. In the same areas of northern New Brunswick there is a large number of families on welfare, and this automatically makes it difficult for those families, particularly those in rural areas, to obtain health services.

In addition to that, if you look at the cost of health services on a per capita basis you find that the per capita cost for medical services under the welfare program is approximately $23, while if you look at the figures now coming out for the national medical care plan you find that the cost is $50 per capita.

Senator Hastings: The rich get sicker.

Dr. Clarkson: This would seem to negate the comment that the poor families are abusing medical care services.

Also, we know that the rich tend to use medical care services to a greater extent than do the poor. Furthermore, when you realize that the poor, by and large, are less well educated than the rich, and that the rich find it difficult to decide when they need medical services, then you will understand that it is extremely difficult for the poor to determine whether they should be seeing a doctor. You must remember that everybody is confused about when they should see a doctor. On the one hand you have the medical societies saying: "We are going to be snowed under by trivial complaints", yet the Cancer Society flashes on the TV screen every day: Prevent cancer with a cheque and a check-up. If this does not confuse the public, then I do not know what does. The moment you say that the public is over-using doctors' services then you are assuming that the public has the ability to determine when it needs those services.

Senator Fournier (Madawaska-Restigouche): Why do you not tell us who sponsors those commercial messages. They are sponsored by the medical societies themselves. They want the business. Thank you, Mr. Minister.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I have noted many things, but it seems that they have been answered. I particularly wanted to ask how sympathetic New Brunswick is to providing assistance to heads of families who are working full time, and I think that has been covered. One suggestion made to this committee is that there is not much profit in spending money on training and re-training people when there are no positions open for them when they are trained. There is a high rate of unemployment in New Brunswick, and I wonder how you feel about that.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is true that we have a too high rate of unemployment in New Brunswick, and this presents a problem when you are dealing with the federal Government. I can understand some of the problems that the federal Government has in its fight against inflation, but, believe me, in New Brunswick we do not need measures to fight inflation; what we need are measures to expand the economy, and the federal Government has not found a way of dealing with this problem on a regional basis. The fact of the matter is, Senator Fergusson, that a large percentage of our unemployed are in the untrained and unskilled labour force, and at any given time in New Brunswick, in spite of the lack of employment opportunities, there is some demand for some skills and training. We are finding that new industries coming in are bringing in people from outside. This is good, and we welcome those people, if the skills are not available in the province.

Senator Fergusson: But if you had them trained then they could fill those positions.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: That is right. We need the population, and the skills, and the education. For too long people have been moving out of the province, and if they are starting to move in from other parts of the country then we welcome them, but I do not think we have reached the point yet where we can say: Why train people? After all, if a young man or woman is able to receive training at one of our trade or technical schools, then even if a job is not available in New Brunswick they can find one elsewhere in Canada, and they become productive members of society, and thus pay taxes and help to reverse the trend. I do not think we have reached that stage yet.

Senator Fergusson: I want to come back to the matter of kindergartens. We have heard a lot of evidence about how extremely important it is for children of below school age to have some training if we are going to lift them above the poverty level. I quite agree with what the minister has said. If we set up kindergartens in New Brunswick now we will probably be helping the people who do not need that help—the people who can send their children to kindergarten at the present time. Is there anything we can do to train those children who are under school age and who have no opportunity of receiving any training? We have had it pointed out to us very often that the whole future of the child may depend upon what happens to him at that stage of his life.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not think that this is something that can be achieved overnight, and probably the problem will never be completely solved. However, I think we can approach it by instituting what are commonly called home-care programs. There are already operating in Canada home-care programs for the very young. You see, this becomes very involved. The basic need is for housing. I agree with Senator Fournier. In Toronto or Montreal it is not uncommon for a worker to travel 25 or 30 miles by subway or bus, on streets packed with traffic, to get to work. It seems to me that the future of this country, if we are going to have heavily populated centres in Canada, depends largely on people. New Brunswick and the other Atlantic provinces are ideal areas for the development of communities that are 25 to 30 miles away from where people have to work. I am thinking of your area of Edmundston, and my own area around Bathurst and Saint John. Under the present program everybody is flocking into those centres, which are sometimes not properly organized or planned. This has already happened, in my view, in cities like Toronto, Montreal and New York. People rushed into those big cities 50 years ago and there are now real problems there because it was not properly planned. There are slum areas which are probably worse than any other given area in the world.

With proper planning this can be prevented. A person working in Edmundston does not necessarily have to live there. He can go to St. Basile, St. Jacques or other places where he will be happier.

However, under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation procedure he is forced to move to a little lot where the services are available in that town or city, in order to obtain a mortgage or subsidized housing.

I am afraid the problem is not being properly tackled.

Senator Fournier: Did you ever discuss that problem with the authorities in Ottawa?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Most decidedly. I take pride in the fact that I was minister of municipal affairs when the New Brunswick housing corporation was created. I look upon it as my creature, but it is not doing what I hoped it would. However, it has been a great help.

Senator Cook: In what way are the minimum standards of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation too high or difficult to meet?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Because 15 or 25 years ago there were communities in New Brunswick known as good rural communities. Their housing standards were fairly good for that period.

If a boy is working at the pulp and paper mill in Newcastle or Chatham, in my own area, earning fairly good money and would like to build in this area 10 miles away where the basic services are not provided. . .

Senator Cook: Which are what?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Water and sewage.

Senator Fournier: And they do not accept artesian wells.

The Chairman: They do accept artesian wells in some areas.

Senator Fournier: They do not any more.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: They do for senior housing.

Senator Fournier: But not for individuals.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: They will not accept it for low rental housing.

The Chairman: Will they not take limited dividend housing?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No. I have been endeavouring to arrange this for my own community.

Senator Cook: Should another agency not be set up?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is a vicious circle, because the cost of providing water and sewage in these communities is prohibitive.

Senator Cook: Not artesian wells and septic tanks.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No. Assistance is being given for the provision of services in the growth centres of Saint John and Moncton. If this assistance were provided for the surrounding communities, in 10 or 15 years time there would be better sleeping and living quarters there. This would be better than forcing people to go to Saint John or Moncton.

Senator Cook: If the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation will not lower their standards, should provision not be made for some other agency or subsidiary?

Senator Fournier: They were accepted by them at one time.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: They were never accepted as a general principle. As far as I am concerned exceptions were made.

Senator Fournier: Yes, they certainly made many exceptions.

The Chairman: Who did?

Senator Fournier: The Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. Four or five years ago one could build out in the country. 15,000 square feet was needed a certain distance from the well and cesspool. All these regulations were incorporated and followed. All of a sudden someone closed the door and there was no more of this.

Senator Cook: Has this been the subject of representations from the provincial Government to the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am sure that the brief which the New Brunswick Housing Corporation presented to the federal task force placed much emphasis on this problem.

Senator Cook: Have you a serious problem in New Brunswick arising from isolation?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes. I am not suggesting that every little community 50 or 60 miles in the back country should be provided with the services.

Senator Cook: I am thinking generally, not only of housing, but in tackling the problem of poverty. Have you a serious problem arising from isolation of communities and families?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is a problem. I do not think we would consider it major, but it is part of the problem.

Senator Cook: Have you any program for resettlement?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes. We are using all the means at our disposal. The Department of Natural Resources is working in conjunction with the Department of Highways, which has to maintain 30 miles of road in some cases for three or four families. School buses have to be provided for them.

While we are not forcing anyone to move, I know of cases where the Department of Natural Resources will buy these areas and include them in Crown lands. The people living there are provided with funds in order to relocate.

Senator Cook: Have many families taken advantage of this?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Very few.

Senator Cook: I have nothing more, except to thank the minister and the witnesses.

Senator McGrand: In what particular areas of the province is the Department of Natural Resources buying people out?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am not familiar with the individual cases. However, I have heard discussions between the Minister of Highways and the Minister of Natural Resources with respect to the county of Kent.

Senator McGrand: That is in preparation for the park.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: No, there were other areas. There is provision in the FRED agreement for Restigouche county, but this has not been so successful as was hoped.

I repeat that it seems that people prefer driving 25 or 30 miles to their work than moving.

The Chairman: That is not unnatural, Mr. Minister; we hear that from quite a number of people. It is very difficult to give up a community.

Senator Carter: What was the amount set forth in the Quebec plan for family allowances?

Mr. Junk: This is not the plan, but the amount they said it would cost per child.

Senator Carter: My point is that they did not make any variations for different ages.

Mr. Junk: No, they did not. I do have those figures.

Senator Carter: They had the same figure for an infant as for a child of 14 years.

Mr. Junk: No, they were average figures. Variations would be applied by age of child, but they did not attempt to cover that in their paper.

For example, the average of the family allowances now is $81 per year right across the six-, eight- and ten-year age brackets. One of the alternatives that they suggested was nothing for the first child, $80 a year for the second, $130 for the third, $168 for the fourth, $195 for the fifth, and $225 for the sixth and succeeding children.

Senator Carter: What they did was add the averages together and arrive at a formula.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I think there are some countries in the world that have that system, or something similar to it. I believe France is one country that uses this to quite a degree.

Senator Carter: Yes, I believe so. Another point, which I think the Chairman raised, concerned the agreement between the provincial and federal governments under the Canada Assistance Act. In case 10 you talk about the arbitrary 50/50 cost sharing. I think you have covered this, but I am not quite sure whether I got the answer. When you say this is an arbitrary 50/50 formula, do you mean the federal Government said, "This is it. Take it or leave it"?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Oh yes. I know that at the time there were discussions, and I am told that at one period the federal people were thinking seriously that this was not the right formula for the poorer provinces. I believe they have accepted this now, because in my humble opinion this is proven by the fact that they are sharing in medical care programs.

The Chairman: The federal Government gives two answers to that. The first is that the 50/50 formula was better than you previously had; and secondly, there was an equalization formula that made up for the difference. Then they go on with one more thing, which they say rather sotto voce, that the equalization aspect is being used for other purposes than welfare.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Of course, equalization started before welfare, so they cannot use that one very effectively.

Senator Carter: You are talking about the equalization grant now.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Furthermore, I think the equalization formula was devised to help keep up, but never made allowance for catching up.

The Chairman: But you see, the equalization formula was changed in 1966. You will note that when this agreement came into effect there were changes in the equalization formula. That is what they say.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Let us be honest about this. Let us take east of Ontario, including Quebec—some parts of Quebec are different, but eastern Quebec—the total Province of Quebec and every Atlantic province have as high or higher total taxes than any other province. We are not able to provide the same level of services. We have had governments of the two main political parties at one time or another, and I am sure each has tried to do its best. No amount of money is being squandered, although there may be small exceptions here and there, which can be found probably anywhere. For instance, our sales tax is 8 per cent; Ontario sales tax is 5 per cent. We know that per capita the 5 per cent in Ontario brings more than our 8 per cent sales tax in New Brunswick. With income tax we have the same situation. Nothing that has yet come from the federal Government really achieves equalization. It helps but it does not equalize.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, what I have a hard time in understanding is that in your dealings with the federal Government you accept equal treatment for at federal income tax purposes; we all pay the same uniform rate. Yet, at the income level it varies greatly, not depending on the cost of living. Where are the protests about that. I have been here many years, as have others, but where has that point ever been made? You do say this in the sequel to Equitable Sharing of Costs, and lately you have said you wanted more money. But since 1967 there has been inequality in maintenance across this country, yet equality in taxation. Where are the protests from governments that are hurt in that fashion? The Maritimes are hurt.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not know, but I have heard it from Premier Smallwood every time we meet. I am sure our province has protested. I have heard it at conferences from ministers from Nova Scotia and P.E.I. every time I attend. What do you do? What do you call protest? Do you want us to take to the streets?

The Chairman: I agree that every one of these premiers has time and again made the point that it is no use talking about 50/50 sharing, that it is no good for some rich provincial treasuries but it is no good for others. But I have never heard the point made with reference to the people in need on welfare. That is what I am getting at. They have made it broadly for provincial treasury purposes.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Let us accept the fact the poor are a minority. They are a big percentage in New Brunswick, but still only 10 per cent of the voters. I mean the destitute poor on social assistance. They are not very well organized. There have been pioneers in this field, and thank God there have been. I think in that respect of Senator Fergusson in New Brunswick, and others. But none of us has been as concerned as we should have been. I have had experience in municipal politics, from the lowest level to my position as the minister responsible, but never was I as concerned as I am now, because I am now directly involved. The majority of the people are not directly involved.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, you are a grass-roots. How do we involve the people in this? The problem is there. You are very knowledgeable. How do we involve people in this country in this poverty problem. How do we make them aware of it? How do we make them feel they have a stake?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I do not know how many copies we have of this, which is an address or speech given by the Premier on our TV program in which he suggests some of the ways in which we can involve them. The conscience of the country is awakening to the fact that something has to be done to deal with this problem.

Senator Hastings: It seems a strange indictment against the middle and upper class, the point you just made with respect to medical care in that particular county. The first time you have them involved they put a penalty on the poor to keep them sick. That must surely be our greatest objective, educating the middle and upper classes as to their responsibility.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: In my case, as the minister responsible, if it had not been for dollars I would never have accepted it. Dollars were just not available in spite of the fact that there might have been some exception in some cases.

Senator Hastings: There was never a government program that was not abused. Surely we are not going to institute programs on the basis of the one or two percent who abuse them.

Senator Carter: I would like to pursue this a little further. These agreements have some kind of mysteries. Is the agreement between New Brunswick and the federal Government identical to the agreement between Nova Scotia and the federal Government?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I think they are available in identical ways, but all provinces have not been able to take advantage of them in an identical manner.

Senator Carter: I realize that. There is the implication that you have got this 50-50, and we all agree with that, but the reason we agree is that there were some fringe benefits on the side which made up the difference for the smaller and poorer provinces. I have not been able to pinpoint what those fringe benefits were.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I felt this was the case in Newfoundland, but I am not sure.

Senator Carter: There were no fringe benefits in New Brunswick. In your case it is just an arbitrary 50-50 which you had to take.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It was better than what we had.

The Chairman: They say that it was better than what you had and we changed the equalization and the present base is 50-50. We know now and they have known for sometime that the equalization would not work.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Pardon me, but I hope nobody at the federal level, either elected representatives or bureaucrats, are saying that it was better.

The Chairman: The 50-50 was better.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I hope they do not say it.

The Chairman: They said it with money.

Senator Carter: I would like to look at table six again. You have $60 a month across the board for rent. If a person owns his own house or is living out of the country you cut off that $60.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Right.

Senator Carter: And replace it with something for maintenance?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Yes.

Senator Carter: And he is out.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: This aggravates the housing situation. Sometimes when the breadwinner of a household dies his widow has to depend immediately on public assistance, and she gets $123 a month to raise her family. If a door falls off its hinges, through special permission we can replace that door. Anything over $500 has to be approved by Ottawa before we can do anything about it.

Senator Carter: Suppose a fellow is living in an urban apartment and he cannot pay the $75 rent, does the extra $15, the difference between $60 and $75, come off his food bill?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We have $60 as a guideline, and if faced with a higher rent we pay it.

Senator Carter: He is not penalized.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Of course it is a problem, but usually the rents available to welfare families are not much above $60.

Senator Cook: Does the same apply to fuel?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Fuel is paid.

Senator Carter: When you drew up this plan I presume you had some principle involved, but in looking at this it would appear that the fellow with four children is better off than the fellow with only three. How do you explain that? He is $300 better off. He is only down $1,000 where the other fellow is down $1,300.

Dr. Clarkson: Economic Council standards go up $3,000 or $4,000 and maintain the same level for the family of four as the family of three. I think the Economic Council is wrong.

The Chairman: The Economic Council uses the figure of $2,000 for one, and $3,000 for two and moves up $600 a child.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Not here.

The Chairman: They have changed the rules on you. That standard now coupled with two children would be $4,200 instead of $3,500. Is there anything else, Senator Carter?

Senator Carter: Yes. The only difference between that family with the four children and the one with three is that the one with four has a child aged four and the others have children seven, nine and twelve. I suppose it is the difference between the child aged four and the child aged six. He gets $17 for the child aged four, and you do not get that for any children older than that. The fellow with one child or the family with three would only get $13 for a child of eight.

Dr. Clarkson: Perhaps it is best that I read what we give for food allowances according to the regulations. For food the ordinary allowance is as follows: for the first adult $6, the second adult $4, each additional person $4, each child under 12 years $3 per week.

Senator Carter: I take it this is the new scale you introduced when the province took over from the municipalities.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: I am afraid you made a point that 6 for food coupled with three children it is $82, with four children it is $99, and then coupled with two children it is $73 and with three is $82.

The Chairman: It is the age that makes the difference.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: One has reached the age of 12.

Senator Carter: Is this much better? You said before that when you took over there were great variations between municipalities. Is this scale here as good as that which the best municipalities had?

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is better than the best.

Senator Fergusson: Is it better than they were giving in Fredericton.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: It is more comprehensive. As you know, before that the categorical pensions were fixed at a maximum. For example, the widow's allowance was $115, I believe.

Senator McGrand: First, Mr. Chairman, I am going to make a request, if I may. As you know, Mr. Minister, the poverty committee will be travelling through New Brunswick some time this summer. They will be in Moncton, Bathurst and the Miramichi area. I think they should see the area around Point Escuminac, and they should also go up through the Burnt Church area, Tracadie, to Tabusintac and the Neguac area. Sitting listening to people present briefs is not as effective as going and seeing the places themselves. I would request, Mr. Minister, that you provide not only transportation but a guide for the committee.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: We will give you transportation and a guide and we will do our utmost to have you accompanied by poor people. We will even offer you lodging in Brantville.

The Chairman: Mr. Minister, we accept with thanks.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Minister, the problem is to get the people aroused. I have received quite a few letters from people of rural areas complaining about the amount of money the Government is spending on relief. They say it only encourages people to get lazy. As I say, those letters come from people of rural background—the type of people you would expect me to know since that is also my background.

If as much publicity were given to the problem of poverty as is given to the problem of cancer, for example, there would be no trouble in getting people acquainted with the problem of the poor. We need to arouse the middle class people.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: During the height of the controversy last year, along with other ministers I was asked to appear on a panel before the Association of Professional Engineers in New Brunswick. That year our total budget for health and welfare was $91 million, if I remember correctly. More than half of those engineers believed that the total budget was for welfare. They forgot that over $50 million of it had been allocated to hospital services. Many are the editorials urging the Government to build new and bigger hospitals in Moncton and Fredericton, New Brunswick. I am not saying hospital services should not be expanded in certain areas, but the fact is that New Brunswick provides hospital services on a par with the average for Canada. It is one area in which New Brunswick equals the other provinces. The number of hospital beds is equal to the Canadian average. Nevertheless, there are all these requests for more and better facilities; but there are few requests for better provisions for our poor people.

On that occasion I asked the professional engineers how many of them were against welfare. Almost 75 per cent of them were against it. I asked them how many were against mothers' allowances, and pensions for the blind and disabled. Ninety-five per cent of them were in favour of those things. They did not realize that almost 80 per cent of our welfare expenditures are for those latter categories.

Senator McGrand: They need to be educated.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: The main purpose of our White Paper is education. When you get people involved in discussing this problem you find that 99 per cent of the time they agree. The fact is they just don't know. Furthermore, there is a stigma attached to welfare. Perhaps the time has arrived to change the name, although that probably would not achieve much. The word "welfare" is poison to a lot of people who don't know anything about it.

The Chairman: The word "welfare" is poison to a lot of people on it.

Recently we had a recommendation on the study of Information Canada to the effect that information centres should be established in various parts of the country so that people can be advised what is available to them in the way of Government services. That would be under federal jurisdiction, so that it might very well include some provincial information. To that extent there is an attempt to get information to the people.

May I say to you, Mr. Minister, and to your staff how much we appreciated the thought and imagination and forward-looking ideas contained in your White Paper. It was a delight to hear that you were thinking about the problem of poverty and doing something about it.

We know how strapped you are for money. On the other hand, we realize how hard you are attempting to serve the people of your province with your limited means.

The discussion this morning was helpful to us. I hope it was helpful to you in understanding the problem we have before us.

On behalf of the committee I thank you and the members of your staff.

Hon. Mr. Theriault: Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, thank you for giving us the opportunity of appearing before you this morning. When your report is drafted and presented I hope you will give consideration to at least some of the points we have made. As we stressed to Mr. Munro, on behalf of the four Atlantic provinces when we presented our brief to him, while we know it is not an answer to all problems, nevertheless, we feel that in our brief the federal Government has at its disposal suggestions that can help us tremendously in taking care of our destitute at least on a short-term basis. If the federal authorities could get consensus from Ontario and Quebec, and it is not really a major expenditure, I think it could be done in a short time. It would be of tremendous help. As the Deputy Minister from Newfoundland stated when we had our meeting, "It is later than you think".

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

The committee adjourned.

APPENDIX "A"

Brief to the Special Senate Committee
On Poverty

Department of Health and Welfare

Province of New Brunswick

May 26, 1970

The White Paper on Social Development and Social Welfare which the Honorable Louis J. Robichaud, Premier of our Province, tabled in the Legislative Assembly on March 31, 1970, sets out, clearly the problem of poverty in the Province of New Brunswick and outlines some proposed approaches to this problem. Therefore, the purpose of this Brief is to summarize the points made in that White Paper and to enlarge on the section on the role of the Federal government.

It must be stressed that the purpose of the White Paper is more than just an attempt to place in perspective the difficulties which New Brunswick shares with all other jurisdictions in seeking workable and equitable programs to alleviate poverty and its causes. It is also intended to bring out some of the broad social problems and necessary policies related to accelerated economic development and rural to urban shifts of the population.

It must also be stressed that the Government of New Brunswick is under no illusions that the changes proposed will produce miraculous solutions. The adaptation of human lives to changes in society is not like financing a highway or building a bridge. The final results of social programs may take years or generations to appear.

The White Paper does not dwell on the dimensions of the problem of poverty in New Brunswick. Additional information is to be found in the Brief presented to Mr. Munro on May 1, 1970 by the Atlantic Ministers of Welfare.

As well, the Brief of the New Brunswick Housing Corporation to the Federal Task Force on Housing and Urban Development presented November 12, 1968 sets out clearly the problem of very inadequate housing existing in our province.

Finally, Table 1 and 2 give infant mortality rates by major causes. High infant mortality rates are most often associated with poverty. These tables show that the rates for New Brunswick are well above the Canadian average.

The White Paper outlines an overall policy of Social Development which by means of co-ordinated programs will not only be designed to improve the human conditions of all our people but will give special emphasis to the problems of the poor.

Particular stress is given to equipping persons who are displaced from primary industries with the skills to cope with the more complex world of secondary manufacturing and urban living. In this connection we will be stressing special programs for adjustment from rural to urban living modes, providing more educational opportunities for the young, the underskilled and the uneducated in order that they will be equipped to compete and developing improved programs to increase the mobility of the labor force within the province.

For the cities we must plan for accelerated growth and ensure that they have the capacity to provide larger populations with services essential to the adjustment process. In this connection we will be particularly concerned about housing, protection of the environment against pollution and generally the development of social recreational and cultural activities which help to prevent people from becoming alienated in a new and strange environment.

Special programs to support family units would stress housing, the problems of working mothers, the promotion of responsible parenthood, and the promotion of special programs of assistance to family units particularly those having heavy expenditure burdens related to ill health.

In addition to the above we think that the poor require special assistance. In particular special attention must be paid to ensuring that they are informed of opportunities and services available to them and know how to utilize those services effectively.

In relation to the Social Welfare program it is perhaps useful to outline briefly some background to the main proposals contained in the White Paper.

Prior to 1960 welfare was, except for specific categories of blind, disabled, aged, widowed or deserted mothers, regarded as a purely local concern. The scope of the service was very directly related to the adequacy of local resources. As often happens where the need was greatest the resources were least.

During the next seven years the administration of social assistance was, except for the designated categories, the responsibility of the local municipal units organized for that purpose into welfare districts. The province shared the cost on the basis of one dollar ($1.00) per capita plus 70 per cent of specified welfare costs above that amount. The Federal government, in turn, shared 50 per cent of the total cost under the Unemployment Assistance Agreement. Benefit schedules, except for food, were established by each municipality or welfare district (group of municipalities). There were quite strict residence requirements and benefits and criteria for eligibility tended to vary greatly from one area to another. Many areas still lacked resources sufficient to meet the needs.

On January 1, 1967 with the introduction of the Program for Equal Opportunity the province accepted full responsibility for the administration of the welfare programs. This included child welfare which had previously been the responsibility of Children's Aid Societies assisted by substantial provincial grants.

Table 3 attached shows an analysis of our social assistance caseload in December, 1969. This shows clearly that 25.7 per cent of the cases were then receiving assistance due to lack of earnings. Of these 18.5 per cent were in the age group 20 to 49 years where it would be reasonable to expect they could be fairly readily employed if opportunities existed. The large number in the aged, disabled and ill category clearly shows that persons existing on the edge of poverty do not have reserves to carry them through periods of prolonged unemployment.

The White Paper outlines the problem faced by governments in establishing social assistance levels that provide a decent minimum standard of living without removing the incentive to work.

We believe that in approaching this problem governments must ensure that the welfare economy and the industrial economy are more closely related, and that earning potential should be a factor in assessing the level of financial assistance which an individual receives. We, therefore, propose to experiment with an approach that is involving supporting persons with relatively good earning potential at a lower level than that considered necessary for an adequate standard of living but allows them to retain a portion, perhaps one half, of any income they earn.

The other proposals for improving our welfare program, while important, are we think secondary to this basic proposal.

As we looked at this problem it became increasingly clear that problems of poverty, of dependency and of social and economic maladjustment could not be dealt with adequately by any single government program, or any single level of government. Certainly, if welfare programs were provided with additional manpower, increased funds, and a wider scope for developing new and imaginative programs, more could be done in this area than is being accomplished at present. But the fact is that these programs in order to be truly effective would have to overlap those of almost every other government department at both the Provincial and Federal levels. This would obviously be a costly and inefficient approach to the problem and one which would tend to perpetuate the chronic dependency of a substantial segment of the population.

It follows that every government program has a welfare component and a particular requirement to provide effective services which reach all of the population regardless of social and economic levels. Every government program has as its goal the promotion in some way of the welfare of society. Within the community, many organizations and most individuals have concrete concerns for the welfare of that community and particularly for those people who cannot cope with the demand for changing social and economic structures.

One of the major priorities in the development of new approaches to poverty is therefore to improve the mechanisms necessary for the co-ordination of all those private and public concerns, so that resulting programs work in reinforcing one another rather than at cross purposes. In facing this priority requirement we face problems of human organization and co-operation and of governmental structures which have baffled policy makers everywhere. To succeed it will be necessary to break new ground.

We think that it is necessary to proceed on two levels. First of all within each Provincial government and within the Federal government there must be a new effort made to co-ordinate and integrate the many related programs. We are presently applying ourselves to this problem within the Province of New Brunswick and hope to soon greatly improve our methods of co-ordination. The Welfare Department will no longer only provide services and financial assistance but will also be responsible for identifying the causes of poverty and promoting among other government agencies and non governmental institutions programs to meet these causes.

The Federal government must in turn ensure that it is adopting a comprehensive approach to the problem and must provide some means for integrating the large number of programs presently operating in the field. There appears, for example, little indication of a comprehensive approach between unemployment insurance, the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons agreement and the Canada Assistance Plan just to name three related areas. We hope that present efforts that are being made to develop a more integrated approach will receive the emphasis needed if they are to be successful.

As well the Federal government must develop some means for ensuring that its various programs are oriented towards the problems of the poor and are designed to help alleviate the causes of poverty. For example the programs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration must place greater emphasis on assisting disadvantaged persons to obtain employment and policies of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation must recognize the provision of physical accommodation alone will do little to solve the housing needs of the poor.

At the second level there must be developed a mechanism for implementing comprehensive and co-ordinated Federal-Provincial programs. We support the Economic Council's plea for the establishment of such a mechanism. We believe that Federal and Provincial resources must be fully integrated without regard to constitutional responsibilities if dramatic alterations are to be made in the patterns of poverty. We feel that too much emphasis has been placed upon the division of responsibility. Rather we think that emphasis must first be placed on the design of comprehensive programs that will effectively deal with the problems.

Finally we believe that regardless of how the constitution is interpreted the Federal government has a responsibility to ensure that a basic minimum level of services are available to all Canadians. Most of the present cost sharing arrangements do not accomplish this objective.

Two examples of programs most closely related to alleviating poverty are welfare services and housing.

Present welfare benefit schedules do not reflect cost of living variations across the country nor do the services provided reflect the relative need for those services. In housing the New Brunswick Housing Corporation's Brief to the Federal Task Force on Housing and Urban Development pointed out that between 1962 and 1967 Ontario with 35 per cent of the National population was able to get 98.3 per cent of all N.H.A. Federal Public Housing money and 97.2 per cent of all Federal Housing subsidies under section 35e of N.H.A. The Brief points out that "the paradox is that the rate of improvement in provinces with lesser needs was faster than that of provinces with greater needs. Thus the housing gap widened".

Our recommendation is based on the belief that programs designed to solve the problem of poverty cannot hope to achieve their objective if they must be dependent for implementation upon jurisdictions having greatly differing capacities to meet the levels of needs that exist. The tax sharing equalization agreements do not solve the problem because at best they are a "keep up" rather than a "catch up" measure.

While these mechanisms are being developed and the basic restructuring is going on there are a number of measures that we believe can be undertaken within the framework of the existing Federal legislation.

(a) Provision of special Federal assistance for the development of human resources similar to that provided under the present FRED agreement. We believe that the use of these agreements to cover broader areas would enable the development of integrated and co-ordinated program of rural adjustment in human resource development covering, in the case of New Brunswick, the whole province. In our case it would complement the economic development program now being implemented through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

(b) Restructuring of the Family Allowance program to provide assistance to families living in poverty. As mentioned in our White Paper we believe it is essential that additional funds be invested in children to ensure that they have the capacity to compete, on an equal basis, during the years when they are obtaining the education and skills that are so important if they are to lead productive lives. In terms of human resource development we do not think there is any group that is more important.

The use of Family Allowances would, we think, go some way to solving the policy problems associated with establishing adequate minimum wage levels, establishing adequate welfare benefit levels and providing strong incentives to work. Minimum wage levels, Unemployment Insurance benefits, and Workmen's Compensation Board payments all reflect the earning potential of the family head. They do not take into account the size of the family and its relative need. We believe that a restructuring of the family allowances program provides a means for ensuring that adequate levels of assistance can be provided under a needs tested welfare program without at the same time removing the incentive to work for employable persons with large families.

If the increased allowances were combined with changes in the Income Tax Act designed to remove the benefit from those that do not need it we do not think the overall cost would be great.

(c) Provision of a more equitable cost sharing formula under Canada Assistance Plan such as was recommended in the Brief submitted by the Ministries of Public Welfare of the Atlantic Provinces to the Honourable John C. Munro on May 1, 1970.

The major weakness of the Canada Assistance Plan is that the cost sharing formula does not take into consideration the "need" aspect of the program. Instead an arbitrary 50-50 cost sharing formula is used which leads to a lack of uniformity in the implementation of the program.

Income distribution and the extent of poverty varies from province to province. Using J. Poduluk's poverty line, 55 per cent of Newfoundland's population, 43.5 per cent of New Brunswick's population and 18.6 per cent of the Ontario's population are below the line (See table 4). This means the "needs" for revenue for welfare and poverty programs are much greater in Newfoundland and New Brunswick than in Ontario. However, under the present cost sharing formula, the provinces must finance the other half of their welfare expenditure from their own revenue. As a result, the poorer provinces are forced to pay a lower benefit schedule as they have more people on welfare. In addition, as observed by the Canadian Welfare Council, this leads to the inability of the poorer provinces to take full advantage of the preventive programs subsidized under the Canada Assistance Plan. Yet, it is in these poorer provinces that the hard-core poor are located and that more intensive programs are needed.

(d) Implement improvements in the National Housing Act along the lines recommended in the Brief of the New Brunswick Housing Corporation. Any program to alleviate poverty must include a concerted effort to provide a much improved level of housing accommodation. Special emphasis should be given to financing better housing and the services required for such housing in some of our rural communities.

Finally we wish to emphasize the need to develop improved methods of measuring our progress in meeting the problems of poverty. If the purpose of economic development is to improve the welfare of the people generally then surely we must have some concrete measures of our success in achieving progress in the different parts of Canada.

The first requirement is for the Federal government to take leadership in developing, in concert with the provinces, an overall framework of objectives and priorities pertaining to social and economic development. Within such an overall framework it would be possible to establish more clearly the impact of decisions with respect to economic development in such areas as housing, health and education in various parts of the country.

The Economic Council of Canada has already developed some of the elements of this framework. However it must be broadened to include much more, and this is perhaps the logical body to undertake such a task.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, May 28, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: We will call the meeting to order.

We have a brief from the Pointe St. Charles Community Clinic. On my right is Mr. Collis Wilson, Chairman of the Board of Directors. He will introduce those who are accompanying him this morning.

Mr. Collis Wilson, Chairman of the Board of Directors, St. Charles Community Clinic: Mr. Chairman and members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, we have come as representatives of the Pointe St. Charles Community Clinic of Montreal. Various members of our panel will speak on the following topics:

I will speak on health care delivery to an urban community. Mr. Rosenfeld will speak on education services in the same urban community. Miss Barbara Stewart will speak on family health workers as a means of providing comprehensive care, and Madame St. Aubin will speak on family planning in Pointe St. Charles. Mrs. Castell will participate in the question period at the end.

The Pointe St. Charles Clinic was opened on July 2, 1968, by a group of medical students in order to provide a centre for comprehensive health services in a community where, in a population of 25,000 people, there were only two full time and one part time doctors.

The reasons for establishing a clinic in this area were many, the more important being . . .

The Chairman: You do not have to read the brief as we have all read it. It is not customary to read the brief. You can summarize.

Mr. Wilson: My main point which I have to say here is that in the light of this commission it seems to me that in order to deal effectively with any problem you must have the recipients of any kind of services which are offered, deeply involved in the administration, and the ideas leading to the making of decisions. Up to the present in our clinic we have had the board of directors, which was founded in November last year, and we have had 5 committee members on this board.

To the present, they have been participating actively in all of the decisions of the board. They are there to ratify any medical people which we bring to the board. The medical people are brought to the board by doctors who are recommended and citizens who ratify their decision.

We feel that through this way we can deal effectively with the problem of alienation of citizens from the services offered, which I believe is very important. I believe many people have spoken to you about this before.

Another problem is this whole concept of comprehensive care which has not been to the present dealt with effectively in Canada. We have at present very sophisticated hospitals located in cities where in order to get in as a public patient you must pass through an out-patient department where the waiting time is interminable and the services offered are good, but in order to get to those services you have to wait. To a lot of people, money is time and time is money.

These comprehensive care centres offered to the general public in a community like Pointe St. Charles, a place where they can go and feel at home and have services which are equally as good as those of a hospital, and even better in that more follow-up and referrals are dealt with in the small community health centres.

That is a brief summary of what I have to say. Since Mr. Rosenfeld is not here yet, Miss Barbara Stewart will speak on family health workers.

Miss Barbara Stewart: I will begin by introducing myself. I am a public health nurse and I have been working in this community the length of time the clinic has been in existence in Pointe St. Charles. We are very concerned—I think your committee is too—in getting health services to the people who just do not or are not able to avail themselves of the services existing, extending services into the community.

One of the ways we feel we could do this in a more effective way and perhaps an economic way, which should interest you, is that instead of bringing more and more highly trained professional workers into the community, to train people in the community to assist in attacking their own problems.

We feel specialists are not needed in these areas so much as generalists—people who with their own background and familiarity with their own community, the way of life, the mores of such community, can more effectively work with these people under the guidance of and working with specialists who supervise them.

We have a proposal to train such a group of people in our community services. It may seem a bit ambitious for us to do this but we really feel this is one way to get medical attention further into the community.

Education, to my way of thinking, is one of the prime reasons why people do not avail themselves of existing health services. If you are planning to provide more and more health services, this is not the whole answer. You have to work right at the local area educating the people. I think one of the best ways to do this is to educate the people who live there. That is really all I have to say. I would be glad to answer questions later.

Senator Fournier: Did you have much success in working with your own people and trying to train your own people?

Miss Stewart: The program, I regret to say for our own financial reasons, has not been put into effect but the community interest is there. We have already discussed this.

Senator Fournier: I assume that you are just initiating this program?

Miss Stewart: This is in our proposal for the forthcoming year.

Senator McGrand: How long has the clinic been in operation?

Mr. Wilson: Since July 2, 1968.

Senator Fournier: Who do you intend to pick for your local organization, mostly young people or anyone who volunteers?

Miss Stewart: We will first of all see all who are interested and who volunteer. I think it will depend a great deal on the personality and the temperament and possibly the experience of the person. I do not think any of us have an exact idea of the age range.

Senator McGrand: How many physicians have you attached to the clinic.

Miss Stewart: One full time and one part time.

Senator McGrand: Who pays him for the full-time work?

Mr. Wilson: We are awaiting a grant from the federal Government. As you know, that is interminable.

Senator McGrand: That is not the answer I am looking for. Here is a man that is full time and to get a full-time physician is quite a lot of money. Who pays him?

Mr. Wilson: Are you talking of the doctor at the clinic?

Senator McGrand: Yes.

Mr. Wilson: It has been a problem to the present. You see, we are dealing with two things: research and services offered. The provincial government is in charge of services and the federal government is in charge of research as far as health care is concerned. The money we have received from the federal Government so far has been for research.

Senator McGrand: When you say research, you mean on the development of a scheme of this kind?

Mr. Wilson: Exactly. Now, the money we have received to pay people has come from foundations so far.

Senator McGrand: You have two physicians, one full-time and one part-time?

Mr. Wilson: Yes.

Senator McGrand: And they both receive remuneration. Who pays the money?

Mr. Wilson: The clinic does. We solicit from foundations.

Senator McGrand: You collect from the patients that come in?

Mr. Wilson: It is 50 cents a head.

Madame St. Aubin: I am also part of the Bureau of Direction of the Clinic, Pointe St. Charles, but before that clinic was opened a group of us, headed by my husband and me, started a committee on family planning.

We have a clinic on family planning. As you know, most clinics are paid by the province but administered by the city. I should say to you that we have not had life made easy for us because they close our clinic down for nothing because we know that is a very important thing.

When we started working on family planning, my husband and I took an interest in the Association of Family Planning of Montreal and since then we have become a part of them.

My husband looks after the documentations, and I am the French secretary. If we do that kind of work, it is because we know by experience that planning your family is one of the ways to help diminish poverty. Statistics prove that the family with the most children are the least stabilized moneywise. The reason is very simple.

The wife of a rich man will go to a gynaecologist to have her children, and in general those doctors are very good in knowing how to go about explaining family planning to their patients, whereas the wife from a poor family will go to a general practitioner. Those doctors, most of them, are very good men but have so much work that they do not have time to help their patients with the necessary information. So it is for these women that our services are valuable.

Those families write to us and we send them documentation on family planning. If necessary we send them addresses of places where they can go and have these medical services that are necessary for the different treatments, or the kind of service they can pay. You can understand now why our goal, being the same as that of the clinic St. Charles, is to be able to help people in society. We think it is very important that we work together. Thank you.

Senator Fournier: I was going to ask: was your speech in French and you made the translation as you went along?

Madame St. Aubin: Yes.

Senator Fournier: It was very good, excellent.

The Chairman: She was very helpful to us too, thank you.

Mr. Wilson: Mr. Abe Rosenfeldt, who is director of the education project at the clinic, will address the meeting.

Mr. Abe Rosenfeldt: I will just talk briefly on what I have learned in the last two years in working in Pointe St. Charles in education. It is a hard thing for me to summarize because I have not had any time to reflect on it, and I am still learning. Having come down to the community, I find that really I am not a teacher but a student finding out what the people are like, what the children are like.

I would like to first talk a little bit about the schools and what it is like for a child from the community to go into the school system as it exists now. To begin with, the majority of the children in the community are not prepared in any way to enter into kindergarten. They do not have the skills that they need in terms of visual skills, in terms of auditory skills, in terms of concentration and memory.

Furthermore, they are not prepared in terms of work habits which are very crucial for the type of situation they are going to face in the classroom. This is particularly true of boys who go into kindergarten, particularly when they are rewarded for neatness and good manners. The majority of kindergarten teachers favour quiet individuals, children who just fade into the scene, whereas the majority of young boys from the community are outgoing and rough. It is really unsettling for them to come into that particular situation.

There is no compensation for that initial lag, at least not in our community. What happens over a period of time is that there is a build up in deficiencies. The build up results from a log of different factors. The teachers that come down to the community are not particularly prepared to teach in that area. Most of them have had absolutely no training for work in the inner city. The curriculum in the schools is not particularly designed for the community.

There is very little consideration for the fact that Pointe St. Charles happens to be somewhere else than Westmount or St. Laurent, if the schools in the district use the same text books, the same approach in terms of teaching as schools outside the community.

Finally, the general orientation of the school does not really match the type of child that comes in. It is difficult for a child who is outgoing to line up, to be quiet, to listen to people when he is told to.

The result of this is that the children become quite frustrated. There is an accumulated deficit in terms of their capacity to learn, and by the time they reach high school the frustration they have, when coupled with the financial pressure, causes many to drop out. The drop-out rate in the community is exceptionally high. It is about 60 per cent.

The effect on the children personally in going to school is quite amazing. It is almost humiliating for them. It is their first contact with the middle-class system. It is their first contact out of the home. Many of them, because of their inability to work in that particular situation, become very depressed. They are literally convinced that they are unable to do many things because in the classroom the teachers constantly remind them of the fact that they are unable to do things.

Just briefly about how the parents relate to the school system, the majority of the parents regard the school system as being a completely alien institution, something which they have very little influence over. This is strange and very typical for any service that is found in the community, whether it is medical service or educational service or welfare service.

Though it is a service for the people, they have absolutely no feeling in terms of their power or influence to change any of the things going on in those particular structures, though those structures were originally created to serve them. There are very few PTA's organized in the community, and the existing ones really do not serve the functions that are needed.

Finally, there are a large number of parents who just do not see the value of education. What are we doing in particular about the situation I have described, perhaps rather bleakly, is very simple.

I think the first premise we have to accept is that these children can learn. There is absolutely no reason why they can't. The only reason they are termed "disadvantaged" is that they are disadvantaged in the sense that they cannot function in the school system which exists in the community right now. If there were changes in that school system, I really sincerely believe, because we all have a capacity to learn, that these children could progress a lot further than they have up to now.

The second point in terms of change simply leads from the first. The school system could be made more viable. How to do this, I think the first step is to involve parents. This is a very crucial factor. These are the people whose children are attending school. They are very well aware of what their children are like, and I feel that the suggestions that they could make in terms of how their children could be taught are invaluable.

Secondly, I think that certain of the programs that we are doing right now offer the school an opportunity to revise the approach it is using towards the community. For example, our learning clinic program gives the teacher an opportunity to look at a child as an individual, and it also gives them the opportunity to look at techniques for the possibilities of working with these children.

A very important point that has to be made in terms of working in education in this community and working in any field in this community is that the approach has to be comprehensive. It has to be broad. You cannot just provide a "head-start" program. "Head-start" is not enough. There is a lag among the children in the school that cannot be overcome by giving them initial training while they are 3 or 4 years old. It has to go right across the board. The children have to enter a school system that is adapted for them, that means grades 1 to 7. This means that teacher training has to occur. There has to be revision at the universities to prepare teachers to work in this type of community.

Another factor that has to be worked on at the same time is the high school situation. There is no high school in the area. There is very little opportunity for a lot of these children to go to high school because of financial pressures. Some type of support has to be offered in that particular area.

Again, in a broader sense, education alone cannot work. It is not an isolated event in a child's life. He is influenced by the house he lives in; he is influenced by his state of health; he is influenced by the particular balance of mental health that his parents have.

If we are going to make progress in terms of the children, we have to work in other areas as well. We have to be sure that if children are facing medical problems we can in some way or other provide them with a solution. Some of these medical problems are quite substantial in terms of interfering with the child's ability to learn. This is one of the reasons that we are working with the medical clinic. It has to go much broader than that. There have to be improvements in the community as a whole in terms of housing, in terms of family problems, so that the children can have an opportunity to progress.

Senator McGrand: You are discussing these problems, and you say that is why you are working with the medical clinic. Now, would you just go on and tell us how you work with the medical clinic and what is the co-operation, the liaison, between this medical clinic and what you are doing?

Mr. Rosenfeld: In some situations it is direct. We have a remedial program for children with learning disabilities in the school.

Senator McGrand: Whom do you take those children to?

Mr. Rosenfeld: All of these children are examined by a doctor, because quite often it is found that learning problems have a basis in a perceptual motor handicap or neurological damage. The doctor has to find out if this is present or what factors in terms of these medical problems are hampering the child's progress.

Senator McGrand: Where do you go to get that service?

Mr. Rosenfeld: We go directly to the clinic. The doctors who have been hired by us have done the medicals for these children. Also, in the schools, when an emotional problem with a child comes up in terms of behaviour, we refer them to our psychiatrist at the clinic. On the other hand, doctors have often come to us with a three-or four-year old and said, "This child has a problem relating with other children. The mother is having a large number of problems at home. Would it be possible to put him in pre-school." As a result, both the mother and the child benefit.

Even with older children, 14-year olds, doctors have come to me and asked if we could possibly find a tutor for them because they are very upset that they cannot learn. Quite often we have found that the symptoms they are presenting are just simply psychosomatic—just a means of asking for help, help which through the educational program we can sometimes provide.

Senator McGrand: At the bottom of page 3 you say:

In July and August of 1968 medical services were offered by volunteer doctors who worked in the evening clinics held five days a week.

Then at the top of that page you mention the names of two doctors. Are these volunteer people or people you pay?

Mr. Wilson: There are two parts to the clinic. The day clinic, as you mentioned before, is operated by the one doctor and one part-time doctor, who are paid. We have two nurses who are paid. We have a receptionist who is paid, and the director of education is paid.

Medical students are there on elective, which is part of our school year, and the volunteer doctors who come at night are just that—volunteer doctors.

Senator McGrand: Do they come from the City of Montreal?

Mr. Wilson: They come from the Montreal General, the Royal Vic, the Montreal Children's Hospital, et cetera.

Senator McGrand: Are they graduate residents at any of these hospitals?

Mr. Wilson: They are practising physicians, specialists.

Senator McGrand: And their services are volunteered?

Mr. Wilson: Yes, because they are interested in this approach to health care.

Senator Fournier: We have heard quite a lot about the Pointe St. Charles clinic but we know very little about it. Where is your clinic situated in Pointe St. Charles?

Mr. Wilson: The exact address?

Senator Fournier: Suppose I want to find it.

Mr. Wilson: 900 Charlebois.

Senator Fournier: How about the population, you have some 40,000 people?

Mr. Wilson: 25,000. I gave you a sheet of statistics here. Population in 1961 was 25,500.

Senator Fournier: You have French and English?

Mr. Wilson: As you see on the sheet, the mother language, 55 per cent French, 33 per cent English, but the official language is 30 per cent French and 33 per cent English and 34 per cent bilingual. On the next page you can see the education statistics and the employment and the unemployment.

Senator Fournier: You mentioned about the frustrations of the children going to school. I quite agree with that. I believe possibly the parents have a large effect on the frustrations of the children and the conditions under which they live. I think you defined it very well.

Mr. Rosenfeld: We have to realize that it is a two-way street and that we can't really blame the parents in the community. Some of the problems lie with the attitude of the parents towards education. This system itself is not geared towards the children in the community. Far too often when we try to look for a fault as to why something is not working, we tend to blame the individual rather than the system. For example, in medical services you find that people will say that people in the community, for instance, Pointe St. Charles, can't come to the hospital. They do not say that the hospital has not come to them.

It is the same process in the schools. You can say that the people have not come to the schools, but the schools have not really reached out to children either.

Senator Fournier: What can we do to overcome that situation? Let us talk about the schools. I will leave the medical part to the doctors. What would you do to overcome the problems in the schools?

Mr. Rosenfeld: I do not think you can have a simple solution. Like I said before, it has to be done across the board. It has to start with pre-school education. It has to in all phases involve parents as actively as possible. In our pre-school we are trying, although we have not been entirely successful, to have parents from the community form the major part of the staff. On the French side, I am told, we have had better luck.

Madame St. Aubin: In the French school it used to be very bad, and a group of people got together and really worked on it. They had an awful lot of trouble, but now our schools are getting much better, starting in the very small classes. We are waiting for the schools to provide the higher grades, because now we have to send the children to St. Henri after the ninth grade. That is why most children leave school. If they have to go to St. Henri it costs the parents much more money, and the children get discouraged because it makes a very long day for them.

Senator Fournier: Are St. Henri and Pointe St. Charles adjoining districts?

Madame St. Aubin: Yes, but the connecting bus service is very bad.

Senator Fournier: They are two adjoining districts.

Madame St. Aubin: Yes.

Senator Fournier: Is the French population of children more than the English population?

Madame St. Aubin: Yes.

Senator McGrand: How many medical students have you involved in this program—I mean senior medical students who have a chance to get some clinical knowledge of people in this condition?

Mr. Wilson: Would you like it over the two years?

Senator McGrand: At the present time how many people are involved?

Mr. Wilson: At the present time there are three students on elective at this clinic. Elective means, one-quarter of your school year where you can do anything you want. This is what McGill does as part of its education. Also, there were four or five students working there during last summer who were paid by the university.

Senator McGrand: Do I understand that the McGill medical students have one semester elective to do as they like, and you have two or three of them?

Mr. Wilson: Two or three from one class this year who decided to work down at the clinic.

Senator McGrand: What proportion of the class would that be—1 per cent, 10 per cent?

Mr. Wilson: There are also students who work down there at night, they work one night every two weeks for the whole year, so I guess you could say that they were involved in the whole concept of the clinic as well. It comes out to about 10 per cent of the class.

Senator Inman: This is a very informative brief we have before us. I am interested to know whether there are any welfare recipients on your board?

Mr. Wilson: No, senator, not on the board.

Senator Inman: Have you ever considered putting any on?

Mr. Wilson: Sure. The board was founded in November, and we had to go out and choose people to go on it. Put we hope to have, through citizens organizations, people elected to the board.

Senator Inman: How are your directors selected?

Mr. Wilson: The English members were selected from the Citizens Association of Pointe St. Charles, which is called CAPS, and the French members came from interested people, Madame St. Aubin,— Senator Inman: On page 4A, you speak of medical students. Do you find medical students anxious to avail themselves of the experience they get in your clinic?

Mr. Wilson: I will put it this way: there is not a great rush to come down there. It is mainly a problem of reticence due to fear or something different—reticence because they have a lot of work to do. There are pressures from the university to continue working and get good grades, and maybe it is our fault for not publicizing the clinic too much. We have a Montreal student health organization whose function has been to publicize this clinic and activities of the same sort.

Senator Inman: You more or less have to find them yourselves, do you?

Mr. Wilson: Yes, we do. It takes a certain kind of patient temperament to work in this field, as many of you realize.

Senator McGrand: Are they encouraged to do this by the Dean of the Faculty of Medicine?

Mr. Wilson: Not directly, no.

Senator McGrand: Does anyone at the Faculty of Medicine?

Mr. Wilson: Yes, we have a number of guiding lights in the faculty.

Senator Sullivan: What prompted you to do it?

Mr. Wilson: That is a very good question. I have been a patient myself at a hospital and have looked at their OPD service from a patient point of view. The feeling of being treated as an object instead of a person—the whole experience of waiting lines and of numbers and complete alienation from everything, made me turn to this kind of thing.

The whole philosophy of comprehensive care appeals to me. In this age of specialization, as you two gentlemen know, the problem, of course, is that people are getting more and more specialized and switching from hospital to hospital. I go there for my head and there for my feet.

The Pointe St. Charles Clinic is a place you can go for everything, and if there is something terribly serious you have excellent referral services to the General Hospital, the Childrens and Vic, and other hospitals when the need arises.

Senator Inman: Do you find any difficulty in getting true case histories from your clients or do you find good co-operation from your patients?

Mr. Wilson: Do you mean finding good case histories?

Senator Inman: Well, some patients are rather reticent about telling all.

Mr. Wilson: Of course it depends on the person taking the history, if he is a good history teacher. The two doctors we have down there I think are excellent. The students down there are in their second and third year and they are just learning the histories. In my own experience, I have no cases of reticence to give case histories. As a matter of fact, they are usually quite voluble.

Senator Inman: What do you find are the most prevalent diseases among the socially economically deprived?

Mr. Wilson: There are a lot of infectious diseases, dermatological diseases, and allergic diseases. There are a lot of chest problems, a lot of emphysema and chronic bronchitis.

Miss Stewart is a public health nurse and she can probably answer that.

Miss Stewart: The problem of upper respiratory disease is certainly one, and malnutrition, not necessarily meaning not eating enough but just eating poorly. In a clinic like ours which is situated right in the middle of the community, the public health nurses work with the doctors in the clinic and see the patients there. But we also do a lot of follow-up and teaching in the home setting. This is why I feel very strongly for our family health worker program as extensions of us in the community.

The emphasis on preventive medicine, this is really where most of our stress should be. It costs a lot of money to treat people who are already sick. I think a lot more emphasis in the medical profession generally should be placed on prevention.

The Chairman: Miss Stewart, you worked overseas in Switzerland. Did you do similar work overseas?

Miss Stewart: No, I was in a hospital.

The Chairman: You cannot relate the situation there amongst poor people and the diseases that affect the poor there as they affect the poor here?

Miss Stewart: I did not work at all in a clinic and I was a complete stranger to that country and not too familiar with their medical service operations, but I know that there they deal with a much more homogeneous population.

The educational level throughout a small country like Switzerland is much more equal than in a large country like Canada. In a big city like Montreal there are greater gaps, lower income areas, poor education. I have had some friends who worked in the social medicine field—I was strictly in a hospital ward—and they were able to push programs throughout the country, education of people, much easier than we are able to do in Canada.

Senator Inman: Do you feel like telling us how much your budget is and from what source you get it?

Mr. Wilson: As long as it is transmitted to the right places—our budget is $40,000 a year. This can take into account the kind of people we would like to hire. We would like to hire an executive director for the clinic. We would like to hire a research coordinator and we would like to hire another nurse and have two full-time doctors and two full-time public health nurses. Up to the present, we have had no executive director, and the direction has been handled in a rather haphazard way by students, by doctors, et cetera. We would like to hire a research coordinator to see whether this method of providing care is a viable one. We would also want our research coordinator to keep up on the literature on this kind of care which is being developed in small pockets in the rest of Canada and also in the United States.

We received our money up to the present, about $14,790, from the federal Government as part of our research grant. That was for the last fiscal year. We have received large donations from the McConnell foundation and other foundations—the John and Mary Marco Foundations, the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal, and private donations. We received a bus from one foundation and we have just put in a grant for $220,000 for the federal Government and are waiting patiently with fingers crossed to hear from them.

The Chairman: Do that with both hands, will you? They are hard to get money from these days.

Senator Inman: Do you find good co-operation and good relationship between the clinic and the citizens of Pointe St. Charles?

Mrs. Lorna Castell: Yes, there is. It has a friendly atmosphere and you are not afraid when you have a problem to tell them. Whereas when you go to the General, you are not at ease with the questions they ask.

Senator McGrand: It has a community atmosphere.

Mrs. Castell: Yes, it has. You feel more at home.

The Chairman: More personal, she is saying. That is what Mr. Wilson was stressing here too.

Now, let me ask the question that I think is on everybody's mind. As of the 1st of July you have medicare coming into the Province of Quebec.

Senator Sullivan: What is medicare!

The Chairman: How do you see that affecting your work in general?

Mr. Wilson: We have discussed this with the doctors themselves and it all depends of course when it comes in. I have heard rumours about December of this year and July of this year. When it does come in, hopefully we will be able to organize some kind of relationship with the federal Government or with the provincial government on a cost-sharing basis as far as the services are concerned.

Senator Fournier: I think in the morning paper, it says it is going to come out on July 1st.

The Chairman: That is what it says. It will some time, whether it is July or August.

Senator Fournier: Will some of your problems be resolved as a result of that?

Mr. Wilson: Financial problems?

Senator Fournier: Yes.

Mr. Wilson: I cannot say, really.

Senator Fournier: Well, it will remove some of the burden.

Mr. Wilson: Some of the service burden.

Senator Fournier: Yes.

Mr. Wilson: Don't forget, we are splitting into service and research. As far as paying for the services, it may help, but the provincial government may say, "Okay, we are going to give you a grant and you will have to refund all your medicare receipts."

Senator Fournier: You do not know yet?

Mr. Wilson: No. We will have to work something out.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, I certainly found the presentation and the brief most interesting and certainly compliment the Pointe St. Charles Clinic on the project which they have undertaken. I hope that they are going to be able to secure the money one way or the other to carry on, which seems to me to be a very progressive and necessary community service. I think we will be very interested to see if this can be carried on and if this can be extended into other communities.

I would like to know one thing. Can anyone in the community avail himself of this service or is it limited to people whose income is under a certain amount?

Miss Stewart: To begin with, senator, we do not limit the service to anyone. It was open to anyone who came. Even the 50 cent fee was only a sign on the wall "The fee of the clinic is 50 cents." There was no investigation of your income. All came and were asked to pay. Those who did not pay in many cases came back later and brought us the money. They felt responsible for it. We in no way chased after people for payment.

Senator Fournier: If I wanted to go, would you accept me?

Miss Stewart: If you lived in Pointe St. Charles.

Senator Fournier: That would be a requirement?

Miss Stewart: Yes, we have had, in the past few weeks, to face a few facts and are now restricting it to the families. Because of the increase in demand for the services, we are just not able to cope with one and one-half doctors. We were just not able to cope with seeing more and more new patients. So at the moment, and we hope it is just temporary, we are limiting it to the families we already know. If family members come, we ask if any of their families have already been seen and if we have files we will see them.

Senator Fergusson: Apparently your clients have increased greatly since you started.

Miss Stewart: We have a great many more.

Senator Fournier: Is the 50 cent fee perhaps the reason for the increase?

Madame St. Aubin: I think it is because it is our clinic and when you go there you are not a number, you are a human being, whereas if you go to the hospital you feel like a number. This is quite different. I would like to go there even if I had to pay $10, as I would going elsewhere.

Senator Fournier: So you do not think the money is a factor?

Madame St. Aubin: It may be for people that cannot pay, but I think the atmosphere of the clinic is much more important and I think that Medicare should be worked like that because that is the kind of medicine that doesn't push down human beings. It lets you go higher. You don't feel like a number, like I said before, you feel like a human being, and that is a very rare thing nowadays. Even when you are hospitalized, you are not Mrs. St. Aubin but you may be a leg or you may be—but this doesn't happen at our clinic.

Senator Fournier: You have your name instead of your number on your wrist?

Madame St. Aubin: Yes, and our doctors know us.

Senator Fergusson: Supposing somebody comes to you and isn't able to bring 50 cents.

Miss Stewart: They are seen anyway.

Senator Fergusson: Is there any feeling amongst the doctors in that locality that this is interfering with their regular way of making their living?

Mr. Wilson: The doctors in the community were approached before the setting up of this clinic, and I have heard that they were rather thankful that they were taking some of the patient load off their hands.

Senator Fergusson: Do you feel that sickness is one of the great underlying causes of poverty in this country.

Mr. Wilson: I think it is the other way around.

Senator Fergusson: It is that poverty causes sickness?

Mr. Wilson: Perhaps.

Senator Fergusson: Well, I have heard arguments the other way, that because of poverty we have a great deal of sickness.

The Chairman: Let us exhaust this for a moment. The question asked by Senator Fergusson was whether illness contributes to poverty. You gave the impression from your answer that it did not contribute. Certainly the medical services at the present time are available on the scale to the poor that is unprecedented in our own history in this country. Do you go with that?

Mr. Wilson: What kind of medical services?

The Chairman: Every kind of medical services.

Mr. Wilson: In hospitals?

The Chairman: Yes, I have to cover every kind of medical service available. As far as I know, hospitals are included.

Miss Stewart: I do not agree with you.

The Chairman: That is fine. Let us hear from you. That is what we are here for.

Madame St. Aubin: You know that blue card that poor people have—they have to be out of work completely . . .

The Chairman: I started on the wrong province because I assumed that you had the same services everybody else in the country had. You will not get it until July 1st. You haven't quite got it yet.

In the provinces where we have medical services that we refer to as Medicare, I do not think you could very much improve on the medical facilities available to the poor in those provinces. British Columbia is one of them.

Mr. Rosenfeld: I think basically a good parallel is in education where there isn't anyone in Pointe St. Charles that doesn't have accessibility to schools yet the percentage of people that graduate from high schools from Pointe St. Charles is .09 graduate fifth year high school and .01 go on to university.

I think there is an interesting parallel. Although there may be medical services available to the people, from a theoretical point of view, I do not think anyone who really has to see a doctor in this country could not see one—although I am starting to wonder about that when I try to see a physician.

The Chairman: You mean, he will not visit you. You can visit him.

Mr. Rosenfeld: It is difficult even to visit him. The point is, even though the service is available, is it really reaching the people in the way that it is being comprehensive and offering a reasonable service so there is an effect. Schools reach those children, but they are obviously not having an effect.

Senator Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, I would like to comment on these remarks if you don't mind. I would like to substantiate exactly what you have said.

As a practitioner for 35 or 40 years and serving in the out-patient department of a large teaching hospital for that length of time, and a faculty member for the University of Toronto, professorial rank, I disagree completely with what the witness has said. The poor are receiving services today that they never received before. I am taking care of them, and you are talking theory, not practicality.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Wilson: How many people are you not reaching? How many people do not come to out-patient departments?

Senator Sullivan: I know we don't go out on the street to bring them in.

Mr. Wilson: It has been well documented that as a matter of fact there is a large psychological barrier between middle-class doctors and lower class poor people. The language they speak is different. Their backgrounds are different. How can someone who has a middle-class upbringing understand—how can he ever understand the problems of the so-called poor people.

The Chairman: Mr. Wilson, I do not understand when you say we cannot understand the problem of poor people. I do not know where you think we all came from or how we fail to understand the problem. The only way they are different perhaps, is that you call them poor, and we are not called poor. What is there to understand that you think we fail to understand?

Mr. Wilson: I do not really know, because I do not understand myself. I think if I were to live in any area which was poor my whole life, maybe then I would start to understand the problems.

Madame St. Aubin: There are so many things that you cannot understand, even you, doctor. Suppose you have a woman patient and she has a family, and you tell her, "Now you take this medicine and go home and rest." What you do not understand is that that woman cannot rest because she does not have money to hire somebody to mind her children. She will take her medicine, but she will not be able to rest. That is one of the things.

You will tell her to eat this kind of food or that kind of food and she will go home and she will try to eat it, but most of the time she won't have the money for it. She won't take the food out of her children's mouths, so she won't eat that kind of food. Those are just a few points that people like you may not be able to understand.

Miss Stewart: Can I give one very concrete thing? I think this is in terms that everybody would understand. I think you are quite right in saying that services exist across this country which are available to the majority of people. Why do they not get to them? I really think it is a question of education. It is not just enough to set up services. You must educate people to use them. This is why I am very concerned about what is going to happen in Quebec on July 1.

It will be fine to say that anybody can see a doctor any time he wants to, but I think we will still have a great need for services like ours to interpret this to the people who should be using them.

In our districts our two "well-baby" clinics provide free of charge immunization services to that community. I was just amazed when I first went to work there. I could not believe the number of kids who are not immunized. There have been diphtheria outbreaks in the past five years in Montreal. There was one just two years ago in Pointe St. Charles. There are kids walking about there who are not immunized, not for the reason that they have to pay or that the parents have far to go.

There are two clinics in this area of 25,000 people. That is quite enough to look after them. Why don't they go? Education. The clinic sits there. They don't go out and interpret to the parents why those children should be immunized. I think this could be applied to all levels of health services.

Senator Sullivan: There might be a shortage of personnel, too, to handle it.

Miss Stewart: No, it is an attitude.

Senator Sullivan: I disagree.

Madame St. Aubin: Sometimes we ask some of our neighbours, "Why aren't your kids immunized for this or that?" and they are afraid. They say, "I am afraid those needles might make my children sick."

We are not nurses or doctors; we cannot explain. But if the nurses or somebody could explain to them that they might be sick for 24 hours but would be protected for a long time, these people would go to the clinic.

Senator McGrand: This is the sort of information that they used to get from the old family doctor, but his kind are gone.

The Chairman: But are they not getting it from the schools? Do not the schools pass out that information?

Miss Stewart: Immunization programs are for pre-school children.

Senator Sullivan: They are getting it in the schools of Ontario, Mr. Chairman. I can assure you of that.

Senator McGrand: I understood one of the witnesses to say that gynaecologists were scarce and difficult to contact and that women have found that the general doctor was not well enough informed about family planning, or something like that, or too busy to give them the advice. Is that right?

Madame St. Aubin: Too busy most of the time. You can imagine, we had one doctor . . .

Senator McGrand: Wait a minute. I don't think you have to go to a doctor to get information on family planning. You can get it from any public health nurse.

Madame St. Aubin: Yes, but before they came we did not have that service in Pointe St. Charles. That is why we formed the group, and we finally formed the planning clinic. We had to give the information. We had one student doctor with us who did give the information on family planning, and then the people would go to the clinic. The association in Montreal sent the information by mail.

Senator Fergusson: Mr. Chairman, actually I do not think some of the discussion has been very responsive to my question as to sickness being one of the real causes of poverty. I would like to pursue it in this way. For instance, if a man is sick he cannot work; if he cannot work he cannot earn money for his family. Then his family will probably fall below the poverty line and have to go on welfare. So is sickness not one of the real serious causes?

Mr. Wilson: Sure, but that is arguing literally, and we could be talking in circles about sickness and poverty at 12 o'clock and at 6 o'clock and saying that sickness causes poverty instead of saying that poverty causes sickness. The reason I said that poverty could cause sickness was that you can just keep going around in circles. I appreciate your argument.

Senator Fergusson: I found it extremely interesting but did not seem to me to really respond to my question. Contary to some things that have been expressed, and perhaps by the Chairman too, I do not believe we understand how these deprived people feel. I do not think we understand at all, and just because some of us may have been poor does not mean that we remember how we felt when we were poor. I think sometimes it is the very people—and we have learned this through some of our hearings—who through some good fortune or Horatio Alger experience have reached the middle class who are the hardest on those who have not. Have you found that this is so?

Mr. Rosenfeldt: I have.

Madame St. Aubin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer the question asked by Senator Fergusson earlier. You were asking if sickness caused poverty. Right now unemployment is a very big problem in Quebec, and if a man looks for work and cannot find it he becomes very worried about his family. He could develop ulcers by worrying in this way and become sick. Then it becomes a circle.

Mr. Rosenfeldt: May I try to answer the question too? I think we are trying to draw this too black and white. A certain percentage of people are unable to work because they are ill and this results in poverty. But the question that comes to my mind, working in education and with youths, is why is it that a large percentage of the children of these parents who are not sick end up poor later on?

Studies done across the United States have shown that education is no longer a strong determinant of what a child's economic status will be in the future. It has been shown that where parents earn less than $3,000 and have not completed high school themselves, about one-third to one-half of their children will drop out of school and they will help form the poverty cycle.

Senator Fergusson: I have just one other question I would like to ask of Mrs. St. Aubin about family planning. It is in reference to the clinic of family planning. Do many clients come to that?

Madame St. Aubin: It was a condition when we got the clinic that we would bring 10 new patients in a week. We were supposed to do that for 7 weeks and we did it for 7 months. For 7 months we brought new patients to the clinic, and after a while it was no longer a problem. They had appointments for a month or two in advance. But then they find all kinds of reasons to close down the clinic. Now the city is telling us that they do not have the doctors for it. We are still fighting it because we think that the clinic should be in Pointe St. Charles.

Quebec are paying part of the cost, and it is their responsibility to provide the necessary doctors in the community.

The women attending the clinic not only receive counselling in family planning, but they also receive medication and tests, and so on. Things that cost too much money, the women in our community would not go and get except at the clinic where they are free.

Senator Fournier: There are two sides to many of the things that have been discussed here. I think it is going to take a long time before we understand the poor unless we have been poor ourselves. I think some of us have been poor, or have lived with the poor. It is very hard for a man born in wealth with a golden spoon in his mouth to understand the difficulties that some of these people go through—and I can say that I went through when I went to school.

There are two sides to the theory that sickness causes poverty and poverty causes sickness. A great many examples could be given. I know many families that were ruined on account of medical bills that they had to pay for the rest of their lives.

Sometimes I believe that this committee here, is not going to solve the problems of the poor in these rooms here. We can find out what they are, but unless we take time to go out and visit places like St. Charles and St. Henri, and spend a whole week with these people and see the conditions for ourselves, and get the true picture, we are not going to arrive at very much. We are just going to have a stack of paper which will be thrown away later on.

I believe that whoever is responsible, possibly the Government on account of trying to squeeze the budget, it would be much better to spend a few more dollars and let the members of this committee take the time to live with the poor, stay with them, and visit all these institutions. We should go with these people and visit their homes. Then we will have a true picture of the poor. Unless we do that, we are not going to get very far.

I congratulate this group this morning for the effort they are making and for the community spirit they are developing. I think it is the right start to educate their people. You work with your people and get them involved in this program which was never done before. It is the right start; it is the right move, but it is going to take time and devotion and patience. We may have to hear things that will provoke us but we will have to swallow it and take it. For the time being, we have to be the victim of these efforts. I congratulate you for being here.

The Chairman: Are there any more questions? Is there anything you would like to say, Mr. Wilson?

Mr. Wilson: I would like to thank you, Mr. Chairman, and senators, for inviting us to appear today so that we could express our views. I trust that some of you will follow through with what we have said, maybe for even a longer time.

The Chairman: I would like on behalf of the committee to say that we appreciate your imaginative undertaking, the interest, dedication and effort that you have for the poor, which we share in common with you. We hope that you are able to carry on the work which appears very beneficial to those in the community. We hope that what you expect in the way of grants will be forthcoming, and with that we wish you good luck. Thank you.

The Chairman: We have a brief now from the Canadian Medical Association. On my right is Dr. D. A. Geekie, Secretary of the Canadian Medical Association Council on Community Health Care. He will now introduce his colleagues.

Dr. D. A. Geekie, Secretary, Council on Community Health Care, Canadian Medical Association: Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, thank you very kindly for the opportunity to speak with the Senate committee. First of all, may I introduce my colleagues. On my far right is Dr. G. LaSalle, who is Chairman of the C.M.A. Committee on Medically Disadvantaged—Urban.

On his left is Dr. D. Cappon, Professor, Urban and Environmental Studies, York University. On my immediate right is Dr. J. S. Bennett, Secretary of the Council on Provision of Health Services for the Association, who will be the chief spokesman for the association this morning. I am going to ask Dr. Bennett not to read the brief but to very briefly review for you some of the highlights that are contained in it, and then ask Dr. LaSalle and Dr. Cappon to amplify one or two points from their particular point of view, and then throw it open to questioning.

Dr. J. S. Bennett, Secretary, Council on Provision of Health Services, Canadian Medical Association: Mr. Chairman, members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, on behalf of the Canadian Medical Association we would like to thank you for permitting us to come here this morning and tell you what we think about poverty and ill health.

We, as you know, represent over 21,000 doctors, and poverty enters into the delivery of health care at all levels. In the submission we have attempted in the beginning of the brief to relate the relationship between ill health and poverty, which has been pointed out by many people over the years. Just one or two specific examples were selected to point up this relationship and we have attempted to carry on and point out that this relationship still exists, and that in spite of our improvement in living standards poverty and ill health are still present and seem to be inter-related.

We have taken, as far as we were able, figures and statements from various sources to show you that this relationship does still exist. I think the relationship is shown up in the report from the Winnipeg Health Department which was presented by them in 1968 in which they implied that the cases of instant dysentery were an indication of poverty and poor environment. I think that also in that context the submission from Vancouver in 1968 also pointed up this relationship.

I think, too, that the relationship between ill health and poverty has been shown in other areas of the country as well, not only in the rural environment but in urban environment too. We have got poverty in ghettos in our larger cities, and I think it is no secret to say that many of these people do suffer from ill health in the environment in which they live.

It is very difficult to define poverty, as I am sure members of the committee will have found out by now. Poverty is rather like beauty: it is in the eye of the beholder, and everyone has a different definition of what it might be. We tried to talk about the environment of poverty and relate it to the basic factor such as lack of good sanitation; the presence of poor housing; in some instances over-population and in some instances under-population; poor nutrition, and poor educational achievements. All these things contribute.

We have also tried to point out that among the basic ethnic groups, and by that I mean the Indians and the Eskimos who in many instances live in poverty—that their infant mortality rate is considerably higher than the so-called average. Taking one specific disease, tuberculosis, it could perhaps be pointed up that although there has been a spectacular drop in the mortality of the disease it is still found among many of the poor.

We have also, although it is not specifically our terms of reference, pointed up that there is a relationship between poverty and dental care and that dental care itself does have considerable influence upon the health of an individual.

We tried to show that these problems exist. It is not just a question that people are poor and are not taking advantage of the services offered to them. We try to look at some reasons why they do not take advantage of health services. We have mentioned in particular perceptual deprivation; the lack of the innate drive possessed by many of the non-poor people; the instinct of self-preservation which may be lacking in those people. Some of them have a lack of perseverance and when they are rebuffed or when they run into problems, when they seek health care, they are sometimes set back so much that they make no further attempt to break out of that particular environment and seek a better form of health care.

There are the obvious barriers, such as educational and information barriers. Many of these people do not seem to know of the availability of the services. It is a question of going to them and in some instances having to actively seek them out and make them aware of what services are available.

On an educational basis also, many of them are not aware of the so-called basic health requirements. They may not be aware of the factors that contribute to disease: lack of sanitation; poor water supply; poor personal hygiene; poor housing. All these contribute to it.

We have tried to outline mechanical barriers. Very often these people know of the availability of health services but for some reasons it is impossible for them to take advantage of them when they are required. I think that we will speak a little more fully on the anachronism which exists today that some of the poorest in terms of health care are actually residents within the shadow of some of our largest teaching hospitals. The rural poor have mechanical barriers because they are removed from the sources of delivery and may not have the facilities to take advantage of them.

We have pointed out the general terms of the delivery of health care; that the medical profession in the past has in many instances provided health care for the poor; the fact that there is now universality of medical care but in many instances it has not improved the health coverage of these people and this kind of defeats the intent of the delivery of medical care as visualized in the medical care insurance act.

We have looked at the delivery of health care, particularly to rural disadvantaged. We have pointed out that there are problems, some of which are being resolved; in other words, staff recruitment problems and location of treatment centres, particularly among the northern disadvantaged people. We have looked at the delivery of health care to the urban disadvantaged. Both gentlemen sitting on my right are very knowledgeable along those lines.

We have suggested several means whereby health care can be brought to the poor. We have looked at the removal of financial barriers. We have looked at the availability of these health care services and what we think is required in terms of geographic and temporal terms.

We talked about the education that is required at various levels to bring these people from the poverty and ill-health cycle. We have looked at their environment and suggested means whereby this can be done. We have talked about rehabilitation. We have mentioned the preventative medical services and then we have specifically outlined what the Canadian Medical Association is doing. We are in the process of undertaking a detailed study, and I quote:

Of the potential use, qualifications, training, licensing, controls and formal recognition of the physician-associate as a means of extending and improving the current health care system with particular reference to medically disadvantaged areas by isolation.

We have also along those lines made several other suggestions about health care to rural disadvantaged. We have also a committee looking into the medically disadvantaged. And we outline there some of the subjects which are either under study or will be studied; that is, recruitment of doctors, for group doctors' clinics; provision of allied health and social workers; examination of the role of the urban hospital with particular emphasis on the type of facilities offered and the availability of services, and the role of the medical student street-front clinics as currently instituted in several Canadian cities and the future of those clinics.

We have a committee looking into the delivery of health care not only to the poor but to all Canadians. Mr. Chairman, if I could just quote from the brief again, I think the last paragraph would certainly apply. I am quoting Prime Minister MacKenzie King when he said:

The preservation in health and strength of its population is surely the best of all guarantees of a nation's power, of its progress and of its prosperity. Our greatest national asset is the health and well being of our people.

Dr. Geekie: Just a couple of comments before I call on Dr. LaSalle to amplify one or two things that Dr. Bennett has said.

I think it would be unfortunate if we lost contact or improvement of things as they are today compared to what they were and it would be disrespectful for us to be in a room with people like Dr. Gordon

Bates and others who have been active in this area for some years and not point out that there have been tremendous advances made in the area for all populations including the poor.

We earlier heard a presentation relative to an outbreak of diphtheria in Pointe St. Charles. I would point out to you that in this has become a rarity in the 1900s. It becomes a medical exception, and I think the delegation at the back would agree that when this happened practically every medical student in the city would be anxious to see this particular patient because it might be the last chance he would ever get to see one. They just don't exist any longer.

Within the last ten years we have seen practically the elimination of poliomyelitis as a major cause of disease, and as a major cause of poverty because there is no doubt it was very heavy financial drain.

On page 13 Dr. Bennett has referred to the undertaking of a detailed study by the association relative to the use of physician-associates. This is really an acknowledgement of a need to see an extension of care. Whether this is the answer or not, we don't know, but there is no doubt that we have a shortage of medical personnel to meet the demands of service to the general public and the actual financing of same by medical care insurance is not going to solve our problems in this particular area.

In fact some of our speakers will point out that in one or two areas it will in fact aggravate the problem rather than solve it. However, certainly it was a major step forward.

On page 14 of the brief Dr. Bennett made reference to the provision of services, particularly in some of the remote areas, through university teaching hospitals and some of the hospitals in local areas. There are about four or five universities that have taken an active part in this with the Universities of Toronto and McGill being involved. The University of Manitoba and the University of Alberta are also very actively involved in the provision of this type of service.

This is in many ways somewhat similar to the situation outlined to you earlier this morning. These provide, first, the service required in those areas where there are not medical personnel and, secondly, they do provide very excellent training opportunities for younger physicians, residents, and so on, in this type of area.

Earlier we all made reference to the medically disadvantaged to live in our major cities. Dr. Bennett made reference to the fact that some of those who are the poorest in terms of health care delivery unfortunately seem to live in the shadows of some of our major teaching hospitals.

We have a special committee studying this under the chairmanship of Dr. LaSalle.

Perhaps Dr. LaSalle might have a few specific comments to make in relation to the poor in the urban areas and major centres relative to health care delivery.

Dr. G. LaSalle, Chairman, Committee on Medically Disadvantaged—Urban, Canadian Medical Association: Mr. Chairman, members of the Senate, ladies and gentlemen, I do not think I should belabour the points that are in this brief or that have been emphasized by Dr. Bennett.

There is one point that struck me as a member of society and this is the influence that our technical world is having on unemployment. Years ago there were a certain percentage of jobs that could be held by people whose reflexes were not very acute, people whose intelligence might be a little lower than others. They worked in shanties during the wintertime, and they could work on farms as helpers, in institutions as cleaners and in elevators. But all these jobs have been eliminated. They cannot work on prosperous farms today. You have to have brains, and probably more brains to be successful farmer today than in any other job. You have to have brains to work in a shanty in the wintertime nowadays because they use some very complicated and dangerous equipment—dangerous to manoeuvre.

The same thing applies to jobs in our institutions. They have all been eliminated. So this is one point where our technology interferes in the economies of our society by creating a new kind of unemployed.

The second point I wanted to mention is the awakening that we have seen in the past five years among those interested in medical care on the sad state of health of those who live in the neighbourhood of our great international medical centres. We have seen it across the border in Boston; we have seen it in New York, and we have seen it at Johns Hopkins in Baltimore. The same would apply, I suppose, to Detroit and Chicago. We also have it in Montreal. This is one problem that the Canadian Medical Association has asked me to study with a group of my colleagues. As a matter of fact, the group that just preceded us from Pointe St. Charles are just a stone's throw from some of the best institutions in the world, and the state of health of those people is far from being up to par.

Mr. Chairman, that is the only comment that I have.

Dr. D. Cappon, Professor, Urban and Environmental Studies, York University: I think earlier on we discussed the relationship between poverty and ill health. What I would like to elaborate on is the relationship between poverty as a total thing and the economic factor, because poverty is certainly not just economic. There are instances where poverty is neither economic nor felt, although it exists. For instance, there are people who take self-imposed vows of poverty. They are by definition poor but they do not feel it and they need not be actually poor. In the life now of a great many young people, the hippies and yuppies who have taken up quite a lot of the leadership population, there is disdain for possession. So there are thousands of kids in the rising generation who are spending 100 per cent—not 70 per cent of their earnings or money for subsistence, but they neither feel poor nor are they poor. Then of course there are the economically poor who do not feel poor, who have a rich family life and healthy children and who are essentially living on the produce that they raise themselves. So there are at least three categories of people, and probably many more, among whom poverty exists by definition although it is neither economic or felt.

Then there are situations where poverty is felt and felt very acutely but it is not economic because there are lots of people in urban areas, in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, who earn between $6,000 and $10,000 a year and support a large family. They live in an urban area in an era of inflation, and it does not matter that they happen to earn as much as this. The fact is that as a result of inflation and because they cannot make ends meet, they do spend 70 percent or more of their $6,000 to $10,000 on subsistence. In other words, wherever there is a disparity between a person or group and their neighbours, poverty is felt even if it is not economic.

One could add to this. One could say that poverty is extremely acutely felt on the basis of a rising expectancy. If everyone is poor in a rural area in Canada, or if there is a depression and everyone is poor, there is no rising expectancy. Everyone is equal with his neighbour and there is no acutely felt poverty.

But if there is an intermixing with some groups as in pockets of poverty in urban Toronto, people expect to be well off and if they are not, no matter what their level of income, they feel themselves to be acutely poor.

Other comments I would like to make are about the associates of poverty. Poverty is a state of being. It is not just an economic formula that economists have put forward. It has important associates of which ill health is paramount. Ill health in some form or another is universal in areas of poverty, especially in mental health, and one of the aspects of the poverty cycle is the mental attitude with regard to one's self—the image that the poor have of themselves that keeps them in the poverty cycle, because very often there is no lack of I.Q. There is no lack of information available, and there is no lack of delivery of mental health. That, too, is available. What is lacking is the perception that they have of themselves of being equal with other people. So these people are in a cycle and they are trapped in it and they will not emerge from it.

Emotional deprivation or a state of lovelessness is an extremely common associate of poverty. There just isn't enough time and opportunity and love to go around, so the children get deprived and a state of poverty exists.

Of course, there is ignorance and fear. There are more medical services now since health insurance and medicare than there ever were. I think the chairman was absolutely right. To begin with their quality is not what it used to be in the days when teaching hospitals were dedicated to the poor. The services are there but they are not being made use of by the poor, as has been pointed out before, because of their ignorance and fear in approaching these services.

In relation to this I would like to make a recommendation to the Senate Committee on Poverty, which I will come to later, as to what could be done about that.

Another important associate of poverty is physical environment. If it is not dilapidated to begin with, it soon becomes slum-like, even if the public housing is modern and even if it is high-rise. All that happens in the high-rise is that you squish or squash the slump upwards instead of horizontally.

Poverty means political poverty as well. It means that the people power that may exist among other people is lacking among the poor because the poor are disorganized. They are obviously not joiners. They are not articulate, for one thing. They are not sufficiently educated. In any case, they do not care enough to join one another so that they do not form associations, or present themselves politically so that they are politically deprived of power.

They are also judicially deprived of justice. The legal aid system, especially the one in Ontario, is the finest in the world, but it is not good enough. If you want to get a divorce and you are poor, you simply cannot do it. So people who are poor live common law. They do not get divorced and that produces emotional deprivation.

There is intellectual poverty among the poor. The reason for that is that the population sifts itself, and the more intelligent become more mobile and the less intelligent lag behind and get trapped and sifted down in areas of poverty. So there is a falling intellectual ability among the poor.

The social attitudes of others towards the poor is benign charity at the very best and hostility at the very worst. The best example of hostility of the non-poor to the poor happens in public housing. All you have to do is to put a public housing unit up and the hostility of everybody rises because they do not want their children mixing with the children of the poor who they consider to be automatically inferior and because the price of their property comes down, and so the hostility is pretty high.

In summary what I was trying to say is that poverty is not entirely economic. Perhaps the economic measure is the least measure of poverty. There are instances where poverty is economic but is not felt. There are instances where poverty is felt and it is not at all economic, and most instances, when they coincide, the many associates of poverty have to be associated at the same time and thought of at the same time.

Dr. Geekie: Mr. Chairman, before you throw this open to questioning, I would like to make one comment of behalf of our New Brunswick Division. Within the last few days you had representation from the Province of New Brunswick in which you had some discussion relative to the provision of health care for welfare patients and the cost thereof. There was one comment to the effect that welfare patients were being refused health care by the physicians in the area.

The Chairman: Just hold everything. Does anybody remember that statement. Does anyone remember that statement being made, that welfare patients were being refused service by doctors in New Brunswick? I was here, and I did not hear that, doctor. The minister was here, and we would have .

Senator Fergusson: I do not remember that.

From The Floor: What was said by the welfare minister? He said that some doctors do not want to take welfare recipients.

The Chairman: What he said was in this context: when the question came up as to why one doctor had more money coming to him than another, he said that some worked more and some said, "Go some other place". That was the context, if I remember correctly, and that is common all over the country.

Mr. Geekie: We would like to put the record straight on this. I think you were referring to the northern area of New Brunswick, and Senator Fergusson was involved in the discussion with Senator Fournier. We would like to point out that we have looked into this in some areas and it is quite conceivable that a welfare patient might have been refused service, but for the same reason in that area as anyone else. We would like to point out that in that area there is one physician for about every 3,800 people. This compares to one for 825 in the country as a whole. This is one of the areas, and there are several in Canada, in which there is just a chronic shortage of medical personnel. We wanted to make sure that the Senate Committee was aware of this information. To our knowledge, contrary to the report, we know of no areas where welfare patients or anyone else are denied service by the profession whether they are paid 70 percent of the fee, as they are in New Brunswick, or paid nothing at all.

The Chairman: We know of no such instance either. This was an unusual situation where a man was practising in an area where there was no other doctor. He did the very best he could and where he could not, he referred the case to someone else. This happens in the City of Toronto, too.

Madame St. Aubin: May I say something about that?

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

Madame St. Aubin: There are many doctors in Verdun, which is a town right beside Pointe St. Charles, and many of those doctors refuse the card from people on welfare. I know this to be a fact, because I know a woman who died because of that. She was refused by a doctor and then she was so shy she did not ask for anyone else to come. They had to get her to the hospital at the last minute, and she died two days later.

The Chairman: Dr. LaSalle, you are aware of the practice in Quebec. We are not so aware of it. How does it differ from that which we carry on in Ontario?

Dr. LaSalle: I think for the past three or four years they have adopted the same system where the welfare patients are entitled to medical care and the doctor's services are paid for. That is only a new development. Up until three years ago, all these cases were treated for free.

I cannot make any statement on this except that cases like that should be brought up to the attention of the College of Physicians. I know they will deal with cases like that because I was on board of the College of Physicians myself for three years. As a matter of fact, I think I am the one who started getting that as much publicity as we could on TV, radio and in the newspapers. But any case such as that should be reported.

Mme Claire St-Aubin: Je vais vous donner un exemple que le médecin a refusé, parce qu'il a dit: « Ne me remontez pas cette carte-là, parce que je ne revien-drai pas. »

Dr. LaSalle: Je l'ai dit au début, madame, et vous n'avez pas compris. Je suis obligé de me fier à ce que vous me dites. Je ne peux pas donner de réponse à votre cas, car je ne suis pas au courant. Dans la province, actuellement, ces cas-là doivent être rapportés au Collège des médecins parce que le Collège des médecins compte maintenant douze médecins, plus que toutes les autres provinces ensemble. Des cas sérieux comme ça devraient être rapportés au Collège afin que le Collège puisse faire enquête.

Mme St-Aubin: Peut-être que l'on serait mieux de continuer en anglais.

The Chairman: Are you satisfied that you made your point for the record on the question that was asked?

Dr. LaSalle: Right.

The Chairman: So there is no misunderstanding and anyone else can refer to it.

Dr. LaSalle: Right.

Senator McGrand: I forget who mentioned that the poor do not take advantage of medical services, and yet as we have gone around the country the last few months we have heard that charge everywhere. Halifax, Montreal, Toronto.

What is the cause of that breakdown? I think it was the same speaker who said, "When they are rebuffed". Now, why are they rebuffed? Where is this breakdown between those who administer medical care and those who are too poor to have medical insurance?

Dr. Bennett: I think we should start by saying that really nobody is too poor to have medical insurance, because it really doesn't make any difference whether they are rich or poor under the universality of medical care. The services are available to them.

I think Dr. Cappon, in much more detail than I did, pointed out that there is this lack of drive, this perceptual deprivation in these people that does seem to provide this barrier between them and the provision for health services. This is why as I said it may be necessary to go and seek these people out. These people exist. They are ill. People know that they are ill but they do not take advantage of the health services. I am sure Dr. Cappon will elaborate on this.

As to the second part of your question as to why they are rebuffed, if you ever had the time or opportunity to sit in the out-patient department of a large urban hospital, particularly a teaching hospital, I think you would see in many instances where someone who is not poor, using the term in its general sense, might be sufficiently aggressive enough to demand and obtain services whereas someone who perhaps is already a bit perceptually deprived would sit in out-patients' department and let the world go by. He would become secondary to the system of the delivery of health care and eventually sort of give up and feel they didn't want him because he was poor, and he would never go back.

Senator McGrand: You don't mean that they are rebuffed deliberately; they just simply come up against the problem and then fall away from it?

Dr. Bennett: I am sure all doctors have had patients who have sat in the corner of the waiting room, and you more or less have to go and get them because they won't come in. They feel that they are imposing. They have a certain attitude of mind which I cannot describe, but I am sure Dr. Cappon who is a psychiatrist, can.

They do not impinge themselves upon the delivery of health care, and perhaps they construe the lack of rapport which sometimes exists between themselves and the doctor as a deliberate insult to them. This is what we mean by rebuffed. We don't mean that they are told to go away because they are poor and not to be cared for.

Senator McGrand: You mean they are influenced by this cultural poverty that they seem to be caught up in. That has a lot to do with it, has it not?

Dr. Cappon: Let us talk about urban poverty, because the same thing does not apply in rural areas where there are family physicians who know the people, and where communication is better. So, to begin with, we are talking about an impersonal environment where people are units and where numbers are given and no one knows anyone else anyway. The poor do not call a doctor or come to the hospital except in an emergency. So, they are emergency-orientated. They leave it to the last minute. Why? Because they are in awe of the institution, of doctors, of policemen, of all the huge imposing buildings that medical hospitals are nowadays. So they do not make their approach until it is almost too late. That is what happens.

Several other things happen afterwards at the interface between the prospective poor patient and the doctor or the medical organization which, as Dr. Bennett suggests, discourages them from coming again. It is mostly neglect.

Senator McGrand: The group from Pointe St. Charles are pleased with the success that they have had. I think you were here when they gave their presentation.

Dr. Geekie: I was.

Senator McGrand: They are very pleased with the success they have had. I have a feeling that that is perhaps the way to approach this problem in some of our large centres, by sectioning areas such as Pointe St. Charles, and the downtown parts of Ottawa, Toronto and Vancouver where there are congregations of poor. These people feel at home when they go to little places like the one at Point St. Charles; they do not feel rebuffed. Isn't that it? They are in a milieu that they understand.

Dr. Geekie: I think this is largely the case, sir, but I would like to take it a little further. I think the group from Pointe St. Charles would be the first to agree, as they pointed out to you, that one of their major concerns is research. This is a clinical research study, if you like, into servicing this particular type of area.

There are others in other parts of the country which are functioning a little differently and quite effectively, from their point of view, but still they have to be proven before we can really say that this is the answer.

You mentioned a little earlier, sir, that one of the things that we are trying to replace is the old "family physician" as people saw knew them some years ago. I think this is a relationship that also is involved here. The big teaching hospital is a far different institution than the family physician who had an office in his home and probably was only two or three blocks removed from where these people lived and his patients could relate to him. He was a member of the community. The majority of people practising at the Royal Vic do not reside in Pointe St. Charles so they have relatively little contact with this particular group. I do not think anyone at this stage of the game can say what the real answer is. We are looking for the answer. There is a recognition that there are inadequate services in these areas, and we are probably going to have to find new ways and means of providing them.

Whether the Pointe St. Charles system or comparable systems is the answer is subject to question, because with this particular type or group of patients, continuity of service is extremely important, perhaps more important than with the more affluent part of our community. And teaching hospital clinics are not renowned for continuity of service.

If you go to a teaching hospital or one of these community clinics quite frequently you will see a different physician each time you go. Certainly this would seem to be the case with regard to medical students who are participating in some of these clinics. They are only going to be there for a short period of time, so the next time the patient goes back, he probably sees a new individual. The same thing is true at the teaching hospital.

Senator McGrand: That is why he calls himself a number instead of a person.

Dr. Geekie: To some degree, yes.

Senator McGrand: I graduated from McGill in 1923, and I have many memories of the old out-patients' department of the Montreal General Hospital filled from morning to evening with patients coming in and getting medical care, poor people getting medical care with very little expense, and then all went away quite happy.

Now, it does not seem to me that the population has increased over the years in proportion to our medical facilities. We have bigger hospitals and more X-rays. We have all these things that we did not have in those days. Most people have medical insurance, but still there seems to be an inability, on the part of people to get the medical care they are looking for. And, of course, the poor come last. This seems to me to be a big problem to face.

Another point is that rural populations disappear and in the future you are not going to have many rural people or rural doctors, with the result that this is going to be an urban problem. Is this not so?

Dr. Geekie: I will turn this over to Dr. Cappon, but I am going to make one comment, before I do. I am sure you are quite aware that the need for medical services is one thing. The demand for medical services is an entirely different thing, and it has been our point that the demand for medical service by the population as a whole is increasing at leaps and bounds beyond the facilities to provide it. It is in short a bottomless barrel.

Senator McGrand: It would seem to me that the population does not increase tremendously. We have an increase in facilities and we have more drugs, antibiotics, insulin, and all these things that keep people well, but still we seem to have more illness than we had previously. I have my idea why this is so, but there is an awful lot of people throughout this country have no idea why it is. Just give us your idea why this happens.

Dr. Geekie: I think you are leading to the psychiatrist, sir, so I will just give it to him.

Dr. Cappon: I think the first thing the psychiatrist would say is, "What is your own idea why this is so?"

Senator McGrand: I will give you my idea. People want to have a perfectly healthy body. They are not satisfied to suffer any minor ailment today. They think there is medical care and all these facilities, all these wonder drugs, and perhaps these wonder drugs lead them to it. I think that is why. People are demanding more from medical care and they expect more from medical science than they ever did before. Is that right?

Dr. Cappon: I do not think it is the full answer. It is certainly right that there are more psychosomatic and neurotic illnesses now than there were previously because of what you mention; people want to have a perfect mind and a perfect body. However, it is a different thing as far as physical illnesses go, such as lead poisoning in children, which is an index of poverty. It so happens that even in the most affluent of nations like Canada and the United States, 20 per cent of the population are poor. There are forty million poor in the United States, and 3,500,000 in Canada, and this 20 per cent of the population suffers something like 75 to 80 per cent of the major illnesses.

Senator McGrand: You are referring to Canada?

Dr. Cappon: Yes.

Senator McGrand: I had better get those figures.

Dr. Cappon: I say that there is relative poverty in Canada that amounts to about 20 per cent of the population, and they account for three-quarters of the illnesses.

You get the same situation as to accident proneness, in these cyclical situations where 10 per cent of truck-drivers account for more than 75 per cent of accidents. The same situation occurs in the poor.

There are two recommendations that I want to suggest myself which in part relate to your questions but which would only be part solutions because they would not overcome the impersonality barrier. The first suggestion is that all teaching hospitals be required to use their students and their facilities to support general practice in their areas. In other words, huge teaching hospitals so richly endowed with money and personnel should cease to live in their fortress and should go out and relate themselves at least to the population in the immediate vicinity.

This is what John Hopkins has not done, and until recently, it has been one of the foremost medical schools in the world. But they have richly deserved the hostility of all the community around them. People have wanted to burn it down because it did not do this. I would suggest that Canada learn from the experience of John Hopkins and others and require the teaching hospitals to do general and specialist practice and support the general practitioners in going out into the community; not staying there and waiting for patients to come.

The second recommendation I would suggest is to integrate the environment with medicine, to bring medicine to the people and to de-institutionalize and de-centralize medicine. At the present time the distance between a central large hospital and the people, the poor, is an unbridgeable distance. In order to bridge this distance and take care of the environment, I would suggest that wherever there is a housing development, especially a public housing development, it should be a requirement that medical facilities be provided. Within the housing development, there should be clinics built for group practice where doctors should be encouraged to go, just as they should be encouraged to go into the north country to practise. These are two suggestions I have.

Senator McGrand: This is much like what is occurring at Pointe St. Charles.

The Chairman: I have one question. I do not recall any similar undertaking to the Pointe St. Charles one in the City of Toronto at the moment.

Dr. Cappon: No.

The Chairman: And we do have some teaching hospitals that are pretty well endowed, despite the fact that they cry for more money?

Dr. Cappon: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you share that view, Dr. Sullivan?

Senator Sullivan: There is not a duplication in Toronto of what these people are doing in Pointe St. Charles. I think they are doing an excellent job, but I want to re-emphasize strongly what Dr. Cappon has said. Some of the large teaching hospitals, due to the funds that they are being endowed with, are being "fossilized". And here I am using the words of the famous English surgeon Sir Arthur Lang. When asked about Hopkins, he said, "Hopkins, oh, yes, the place where they fossilize men." That is what is happening to a lot of the big teaching centres. They are medical science complexes. They have got to get out, as Dr. Cappon said. It is a very good point he brought out because it could be imparted to a great many of the deans of medicine across this country today. Let us emphasize that one.

The Chairman: Well, Dr. Sullivan, we are all laymen except Senator McGrand, and we have been sitting back for a long time. You people have been running the hospitals and the medical associations. What has kept you from doing something about it long before this?

Senator Sullivan: Correct me if I am wrong, Dr. Cappon. There are two groups developing in medicine.

There is one group composed strictly of medical research people, who practically never deal with patients. There is a medical research complex in each of the large teaching hospitals.

Then there is another group made up of top-notch men, who are dealing with patients. But there is an effort to direct every outstanding man into research, and away from being a practising physician dealing with patients. I feel that in spite of medicare this is due—I do not like to say this, Mr. Chairman—to these institutions having had unlimited funds bestowed upon them. They have been endowed with the idea that we must turn out nothing but research medical scientists and not the doctor who can go out in the Community and take care of patients, as you people were emphasizing.

As one who has been engaged in research all my life, I am being quite frank when I make that statement, and I hope the change will come about.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, I have a question, that was half answered. You said that 20 per cent of the population is among the poor, and they have 75 per cent of the diseases.

Dr. Cappon: Illnesses.

Senator McGrand: If you went to the Civic Hospital in Ottawa, which has approximately 1,000 beds, and if you went from bed to bed, would you expect to find that 75 per cent of the sick were among the 20 per cent of the poor?

Dr. Cappon: No. You used to find that.

Senator McGrand: That is right. In the old General Hospital in Montreal, the wards were nearly all public patients.

The Chairman: Senators, would you mind letting the witnesses answer your questions. What is the answer to that?

Dr. Bennett: Mr. Chairman, I think I can partly answer it, by saying there are these education, information, and mechanical barriers between the poor and the provision of health services. We have tried in a brief way to outline what these barriers are. We are aware that these barriers exist and we are trying to do something about it.

If I may also answer something that you brought up earlier. I think that teaching hospitals are beginning to recognize that they have not been catering not only to the public but to the medical profession itself. If you look at the teaching hospitals you will see that many of them within the last few years have instituted, by whatever name they like to call it, family practice units whereby family practitioners are being trained in an academic environment. They are being exposed to family practice while still within the academic complex, and family practitioners are returning from the field to the academic environment to be upgraded in terms of their specialty. Let us face it, family practice is just as much a specialty as anything else. Due to many reasons, the image of the family practitioner has been denigrated and put at the bottom of the totem pole.

I think the place of the primary contact physician is being recognized. The academic institutions are recognizing that he has an important role to play and the establishment of these family practice units is going a long way towards answering the points that you raised earlier, that they are not entirely being lost in the aura of research. They are coming back to the grass roots, to use a phrase that has a political connotation.

Senator McGrand: I asked this question and it is about ten minutes ago since I asked it. If 20 per cent of the people produce 75 per cent of the illnesses, I would expect that in a large hospital of 1,000 beds to find a greater number of people from that 20 per cent than I would from the remaining 80 per cent. But I think if you took a census of the hospital beds you would not find that. I asked you if you could give me a reason for that. Is it because people who do not need to be in hospital are occupying beds because they have medicare?

Dr. LaSalle: Someone made the statement a few minutes ago that we had spent a lot of money and provided ourselves with tremendous buildings and institutions. But we have not built the right institutions. We thought that we would be doing a good job by adding beds. There is only one thing that is sure about a bed: if it is available, it is going to be fully used.

Twenty-five per cent—and that is a low figure—of patients in hospitals today do not need a hospital bed any more than I need another pair of hands. But they occupy these beds at the cost that we know of, and they use up the physicians' time, the residents' time, and the nurses' time.

The Chairman: Doctor, who keeps them there? Do I keep them there?

Dr. LaSalle: You don't.

The Chairman: Who Does?

Dr. LaSalle: Doctors do, I will be raising that point in a talk I am going to give. I will send you a copy. This point has been taken up. We are finding today that our institutions are filled with beds but they have not got the facilities to look after the out-patients. They have not got the facilities to do the referred work, and the lab and X-Ray work, that the doctors and general practitioners are asking to be done. The slowness of the process is such that everyone gets discouraged. Moreover.

Let us talk about the out-patients. The out-patient procedure of a big general hospital is part of the hospital's administrative process. It is impersonal, slow, and full red tape. This keeps patients away too. This matter is being taken up by the deans. I know they are worried about this in the United States, and I think some of that worry is creeping up into Canada. Let us not be mistaken. We have not got the proper facilities to look after the patients.

Dr. Geekie: We have two distinguished senators here who have graduated from probably the two most prestigious medical schools in this country, the University of Toronto and McGill. These are the institutions which are producing the majority of Canada's teachers. They are not producing the providers of medical care.

To come back to your discussion about teaching hospitals and the proportion of the population, the truth of the matter is that the major teaching hospitals are not community hospitals. They do not serve a particular community. They are very largely referral hospitals where they are drawing special patients from great distances across the country, so they do not give you an accurate reflection of the disease or care required in that particular community.

Senator McGrand: I you went to the Charlottetown, St. John's, or Moncton, or Saskatoon and went to a large hospital of 500, 600 or 800 beds, whether it was a teaching hospital or not you would find that the majority of beds are not occupied by that 20 per cent of the people who suffer 75 per cent of the illnesses.

Dr. Bennett: You may be correct. I cannot answer that.

Senator McGrand: Mr. Chairman, you told me today you wanted me to ask questions so I am going to take advantage of that.

The Chairman: Yes, of course I did, but you are going to have a chance to ask questions in a minute. Senator Inman has a question and then we will come back to you again.

Senator Inman: With regard to the last question that Senator McGrand asked about conditions in hospitals and the beds being occupied, I was on the trustee board of a very small hospital in my own hometown and the same conditions existed there. What do you propose could be done about this situation? You are doctors, and after all you did say that the doctors keep them there. And I know that very well. What conditions could be arranged?

Dr. LaSalle: I apologize for using my own institution as an example, but we had a big problem in Sherbrooke so we set up a division of social medicine. It is headed by a young economist—he is not a doctor. Its purpose is to try and change the mentality of doctors so they would become cognizant and worry about the social implications of disease and sickness and economic conditions as well.

We feel that we will have to go right back to the beginning and educate a new brand of physician whose eyes are wide open to these very important economic conditions, and all the implications of disease, hospital care and social welfare.

There is a change coming about in the United States now. You have read about it in magazines. I am talking about the NIH, because it was pure research. Very little research was applied to the distribution of medical care. The system was such that they did not graduate their young doctors as practising physicians. I think the deans are quite worried about this situation today.

Dr. Cappon: I would like to emphasize Dr. LaSalle's comments and support some of the things Dr. Bennett said. I don't know any hospital, not just teaching hospitals but any hospital that is built for the patients. With all that has been planned and built, it seems that all hospitals are built for the needs of its doctors and nurses. When we build hospitals for patients as opposed to institutions for the permanent staff, I think we will humanize both the institution and social aspect of medicine much more.

This has not happened. Society has become technological, and advances have been sought from the scientific point of view. Money has been given for research but no research has been done about getting your ideas across to people.

A new era is coming and the young are leading the way. By their dress, speech and value system they will force us to break down this arrangement and build hospitals from the social point of view or from the patients' point of view.

Dr. Geekie: Many patients are kept in hospitals for the simple reason there is no other place to send them. There are many patients in the hospital who conceivably could be as well or perhaps better cared for in nursing homes or their own homes, if the services were available. But these things just don't exist, so what do you do with people? What do you do with old, senior-citizen patients whose families no longer accept the responsibility of caring for them when they reach that age? When you have no facilities, no chronic care hospitals, what alternative do these patients really have other than to be maintained as patients?

The Chairman: I think personally you are doing the right thing in maintaining them in these circumstances, but that is not the answer. In this country, as you know, we have nursing homes, some good, some bad, some indifferent, and at the present time they are not covered under the agreement, with the exception of British Columbia. We recommended that they be covered in 1966 when we studied the matter of aging. Since then B.C. has, I have not seen you doctors getting behind that kind of pressure, or have I missed that?

Dr. Geekie: You must have missed it because we have always advocated the need for chronic care hospitals and nursing care facilities.

The Chairman: And treatment under the system for that?

Dr. Geekie: Yes.

Dr. Bennett: On a very personal level, for four years in the hospital in which I work we were to build a chronic care unit. One of the greatest costs in the provision of health care is the so-called acute hospital bed. A system of graduation from acute to rehabilitation to chronic was well outlined in the task force reports gathered earlier this year. This would be the answer. We have found that it takes a tremendous amount of political pressure to get these services provided by the province, and, with all due respect I do not feel that the medical profession as such necessarily has the strongest political base in the country. We are a relatively small percentage of the voting population. There are 25,000 of us in Canada, and we do not carry too much weight politically.

Senator Fergusson: You have great prestige.

The Chairman: I will give you a short lesson in politics. I sit with other members of Parliament and we discuss problems that are common to us all. This problem is constantly discussed, and there is a certain pressure on members to do something. It is your member of Parliament, at provincial and federal levels, who you can bring pressure to bear. You do not have to do it yourself. You ought to take this to your member of Parliament, provincially or federally, and you will be surprised at how soon they will act.

Dr. Bennett: That is exactly what we did. The prime minister of British Columbia came from the town in which I was practising, and we did exactly this. But I do not think it fair to leave the impression that the medical profession is unaware of this problem. We are as much aware of it as any one, and have tried to do something about it. I would respectfully submit, however, that we are perhaps a small voice crying in the wilderness and much of the pressure has to come from other segments of the population to reinforce anything we may present and perhaps Dr. Sullivan and Dr. McGrand . . .

Senator Sullivan: We will have to re-baptize the Minister of Health.

Senator Inamn: I want to pay a little compliment to our province. We have a very lovely chronic home. We were fortunate enough to have a practising physician as Minister of Health. At page 6 of your brief I was very interested in reading about the travelling clinic. You recommend some sort of travelling doctors' clinic, but I was wondering whether the public health services could provide this. It would be a wonderful thing for the people in real distress. If they found serious cases they could not deal with they could refer them to private medical sources.

Dr. Geekie: There are a number in the University of Toronto who are on a roster of physicians. They are using resident doctors who are located right there for a period of time. The University of Manitoba is providing the same type of service for the northern part of Manitoba, and the Indians of the Northwest Territories. A group of general practitioners in a hospital in Winnipeg are providing volunteer services once a month every year. They are giving servicing in the area in just exactly this fashion.

The University of Alberta has done what you suggested, but on a smaller scale. They have medical students, third or fourth year students, located in the field working with public health nurses and other nurses working in the area. So these have been established but on a small scale, and they are being studied to see how effective they will be.

Senator Inman: On page 2 you speak about differences between under-privileged men and women taking advantage of medical services despite their higher illness rate. You say that women in this category do not take advantage of these services as often as do the men, or as often as the women in the higher-pay echelons. Why do you think this is so?

Dr. Bennett: That is an awfully dangerous subject to try and answer. There are so many factors involved. As I am sure everyone is aware, there is a marked difference in the self-health assessment between the sexes, speaking in a general manner. So, you have this factor to think about in terms of comparing two sexes, and when you compare the sexes within the facilities that you find, I cannot give you an exact package answer to say why this or that is so.

Dr. Cappon: I was not aware that there was too much difference. I know that women are very prone to take their children to be cared for by medical services. That is their first priority but when it comes to themselves they are reluctant to do that.

Dr. LaSalle: I think men fuss more. They actually have a higher pain threshold.

Dr. Bennett: When you get down to this level, there is introduced the lack of perceptual appreciation of health care.

Senator Inman: I have come in contact with that sort of thing, and I just wondered what you thought about it.

I have one more question. When you were making the studies on the delivery of health services to the disadvantaged, what use do you propose to make of these completed studies? What do you expect to come out of it?

Dr. Geekie: We would hope that these studies would result in a change in the system in which health care is provided for the Canadian people. It is obvious even in the area where they start that there is a shift in people as to how they obtain their health care. The Pointe St. Charles Clinic is a logical example. It is obvious that a fairly large proportion of the patients that they saw previously were not receiving care, or were receiving a different type of care at one of the out-patient departments of a major hospital.

The Canadian Medical Association has submitted certain recommendations to the Department of Health relative to the task force reports. I am sorry that I am not at liberty to divulge the recommendations, but a number of the things that have been touched on this morning have been specifically recommended.

For example, we have suggested that we should set up a pilot project to study the use, training, et cetera, of physician associates. This is a group of people who would be somewhere between a highly-qualified nurse and a physician and would be working in a variety of situations. They would be working in the north, for example, where no physicians exist. The type of care they would be providing there would be one thing. They would also, hopefully, be used in the private physician's office where they could perform many of the less demanding tasks to allow the physician to spend his time where his highly-skilled training is required.

This would obviously make a shift in the way in which health care would be provided, to render—and I think this is most important for us to remember—the quality of care that the Canadian public requires and demands. We must at all times protect the quality of care that the people are receiving. We must, as much as we possibly can, not allow the quality to deteriorate. The Canadian people do not want second-class medicine. They want first-class care.

Secondly, they have to watch at all times, as is becoming very evident, the cost of providing this type of care. On the surface it would appear to be more economical to provide services by lesser-trained people, but in effect on some occasions the exact opposite could be true. It can be more expensive to provide it rather than less, and it is this type of question on how it will function that we are trying to find the answer to. Those that work and work well I am sure will be accepted by the profession and utilized, and it will effect a change in the manner and system in which you receive health care. Some of it you may not like. Most people are not very happy about not being able to get house calls. This has been a shift in health care that has occurred in the last year. It has resulted from necessity because of costs and the shortness of personnel. A lot of people are not very happy about this.

You may not be happy with some of the changes that come in the future but if they are the most effective and best way of providing the health care, obviously this is the route that we should be taking.

Dr. LaSalle: One of the big paradoxes of the actual situation is that while medical schools and research labs have produced a lot of new ideas and knowledge, they have not made sure that this new knowledge is available to those who need it. They have spent too much time in their labs, and they have forgotten about the communities. Today the accent has to be a return to the community, and I think we are realizing that. What I am a little bit scared about is that the cost of medical care is going up so fast that the accent may be on trying to reduce costs instead of trying to make sure that the population requiring care gets it.

I just read in the press where they had a meeting in Ottawa on task reports, and practically all of them deal with reducing costs. But that is not the main problem. The main problem is to see that those who need care get it. If we work out a good system, it will cost less. We will spend less money on the big hospitals and more to see that the patient gets the care in his home or in the doctor's office where he needs it.

Senator Sullivan: By means of the physician-associate?

Dr. LaSalle: By means of a new system if needed.

Senator Fergusson: We are grateful to the Canadian Medical Association for coming before us, because your presentation certainly will assist us in our work. You have told many things that we did not understand as well before.

I am not going to take too long, Mr. Chairman, because I feel that Senator McGrand and Senator Sullivan have some questions much more penetrating and useful to the committee. I studied the brief and there are a few things that came to my attention that are different from what we have heard so far.

In your recommendation on page 12 dealing with rehabilitation, you point out the inadequacy of treating symptoms and then sending patients back to the same physical or social environment in which he was before. I know that doctors cannot do much about this, but have you any suggestion about what can be done so that you just do not send them back into the same situation that they were in before—and then perhaps have to come back to you again?

Dr. Bennett: Mr. Chairman, perhaps Dr. Cappon will elaborate on this, but I think that this is where one sort of starts thinking about medicine in a larger social context and not about an individual per se. You have to start with the individual, then the family unit, and then the environment. As we have pointed out, it is of little value to treat a patient and return him to the environment from which he came, which perhaps was very instrumental in creating his illness in the first place.

The whole social concept of this type of medicine has to change. It has to move away from the individual into a much broader base. It is going to involve para-medical or allied health personnel, and you are going to involve home care nurses, and rehabilitation centres to a greater extent. You are going to involve things that Dr. Cappon has been involved with in his activities, the creation of social activities. These are really part of the health picture. They produce happiness, and a happy person is less likely to have certain mental illnesses.

I think this is what we mean by improving the environment. You impose the environment structurally by providing better housing for the people, better educational standards in terms of personal hygiene, and health care. It is a terrifically large picture to try and create.

Senator Fergusson: It is an integrated program throughout many areas.

Dr. Bennett: Could I give you a simple example of what we are talking about? There are a number of Indian reserves in the northern parts of several of our provinces, so one can only say that we have there a chronic situation of dysentery, especially among the children. They are treated and sent back to the community and are re-infected. Dysentery is transmitted by poor sanitation and infection. There is no sewage disposal. There is no practical way at the moment of cleaning up this particular situation. So, this is a never-ending cycle. You treat the child, he goes back, he is re-infected because of the environment he lives in, you clean him up again and he keeps going back. In short, there is really only one answer and that is to take them off that particular site and move them to one where they have got proper sanitation.

Now, that is a very simple example of change in environment. Dr. Cappon could probably give you a more complicated one.

Dr. Cappon: The wisdom of the ages is sifted through language, and it is a wonderful thing sometimes to study language to give you an answer to this particular question. I don't know if you are aware that welfare, wholesomeness, healthiness and holiness are commonly rooted. The wisdom of the ages told us a long time ago that you cannot deal with the health system without affecting the others, and you cannot really make a decent report about poverty either, certainly not about health and poverty, without taking in the whole environment.

For instance, the labour unions have to relate themselves to this problem. Recently they promised to do something about the poor. Well, they have to relate themselves to the health of the poor. Industry has to do the same. In building developments you have to think of the health unit as part of the building development. You cannot really affect one system or implement one thing without affecting all the others.

So it is more than what Dr. Bennett says. It is more than the fact that we are only 25,000, and we do not have enough political power. It is a fact that we are caught in a "now" society where everything is extremely complex, and the question of health bears on wealth and even holiness. It has to be looked at as a totality or it is no good at all.

Senator Fergusson: On page 13, paragraph 49, you say:

... in the present system of the delivery of health care is the carrying out by highly trained individuals of procedures that could be done equally well by others with lesser training.

Could you explain that? I understand that we have Nurses' Aids, but how is that going to work among the medical profession? How is it possible for it to work?

Dr. Bennett: I can elaborate a bit on that. I think we mentioned a short while ago when talking with Dr. Sullivan that many of the tasks that are done by physicians, particularly in this day and age of increased demands by the public, could be very well done by someone else. In the armed forces particularly, people are screened so that only those who really need attention get to the physician. Others are very adequately treated by service orderlies. This is one method of medical care within the armed forces. We have to look at whether this could apply to civilian life. There are schemes in the United States, for example at the University of Denver, Colorado, where they have pediatric assistants. These persons have received a certain amount of training and can deal with the runny noses and minor ailments of childhood, leaving the pediatrician who is trained to deal with more complicated aspects of pediatrics to devote his time and his skills to that aspect. This is the type of thing that we have to look at.

We cannot say that this is necessarily the best method. There are all sorts of factors involved, the least of which is consumer acceptance.

Senator Sullivan: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. First of all, I want to thank you for allowing me to participate this morning, for I am not a member of your committee. As one who has been interested in welfare all your life—and I know your brothers very well—I know what this presentation means to you. This is an entirely new concept that you have heard this morning. I would ask that Dr. Cappon's complete brief be published. I think it is most important. That is all I have to say.

The Chairman: Senator Sullivan, you have not been reading our proceedings or you would know it has been published.

Dr. Cappon: At the risk of appearing impertinent, I do want to make a suggestion about the usefulness of Senate hearings and even royal commissions. I think they are marvellous forums for ventilating feelings and for putting ideas forward. But if you were to do something in the area of poverty, I would suggest that the results of Senate hearings should not be implemented in any kind of way, because these days you cannot and you must not do things for people. You have got to do things with people, and especially with the poor, because as you have all heard they are extremely sensitive.

Therefore, if you do not do anything else, I would suggest the single most important thing you might do is establish throughout the country what I would call listening posts, places, areas, ramshackle houses, even rural houses scattered all over Canada in strategic places where doctors and other experts interested in poverty may come and consult with the people on a continuous basis, say, for six months or a whole year. Make it so that people do not have to come to Senate hearings; it is too difficult for many. These experts could live, work and plan with these people for a half a year or a year before anything is done.

The Chairman: Doctor, if we did that, and it is admirable, we could only do it for a very small portion of the population, so that the 99 per cent of the population whom we could not reach in that way we would have to reach in some other way. This is the way we attempt to reach them and bring them within the fold, by letting them read the proceedings. They understand this pretty well, so there is really no substitute for airing a problem if you want to reach a broad area.

Dr. Cappon: Unfortunately, senator, people in general do not read and the poor do not read at all. So, reading is not really much good. You have to live with them and talk to them. There is no other way.

The Chairman: It is so much more difficult to do it the way you suggest, doctor. You say that the poor do not read. Perhaps they do not read books, but they listen to the radio and they watch television, and messages get across in this fashion today. Radio may very well report much of what you people have said today.

Dr. Cappon: What about the feedback from them?

The Chairman: When you talk about feedback. This did not start last year. This started many, many years ago. Why have you not been able to get your message across: service is free of charge to anyone who is ill; we will come and look after you. You are quite right, we are not getting across to people and you are in a better position to get across than we are.

Dr. Cappon: In the past the poor were always with us. They expected to remain poor and were not a problem, but now with rising expectation and with the little power they are getting, they are a threat, so something has to be done now that was not necessary before. Simply more royal commissions or Senate committees is not really sufficient for them to get the feeling that they are working with you, and their suggestions are delivering up some of the answers to these problems. The job cannot be done in any other way.

The Chairman: If beneficial results come to the poor from royal commissions or Senate hearings, there will be a participation, and an acceptance that was not there before. And that is the hope.

Senator Inman: Are there any free psychiatric clinics for the poor? Is there any place they can go where they can get assistance free?

Dr. Cappon: Most of the mental health clinics are free for everyone. They must not be this free for the poor because then you discriminate. They have got to be just free.

The Chairman: They are even more free than most other clinics?

Senator Inman: Are they? We have not got one and I just wondered.

The Chairman: You need one in Prince Edward Island?

Senator Inman: We have a mental health hospital, but it is not free.

The Chairman: I have been associated with hospitals for 35 to 40 years, first in Windsor by virtue of my position on metropolitan and other hospitals, and I know something about them. Since going to Toronto I have been associated with an important hospital, and I know something of the others. In all those years, your outpatient departments have never changed in my view, and I cannot understand that. The world has changed. Everything else has changed, but that has not. Why?

Dr. Bennett: Changed in what way?

The Chairman: Well, the world has changed in many, many ways, but not this service. I used to go down and see the people standing around waiting for service when I was mayor of the city. Now I go down as member of the board and look around and I see the same things going on. Nothing has changed.

Dr. Bennett: Waiting?

The Chairman: Waiting and waiting. A woman on relief said, "Look, Senator Croll, I have a child coming in from school. I have to go back and feed her. I have been waiting here two hours and I can't wait any longer." So she had to go back the next day. What can you expect from these people. Their problem is the greatest problem there is.

Dr. Bennett: Many of these people, Senator Croll, and I think we mentioned this, do not have what they call a family physician. Therefore, to them the provision of medical care is in one place only, and that is the out-patient department. As I think somebody pointed out earlier today, they go there not thinking of people in general but thinking of the poor, they tend to go there when an emergency arises. This is the time that they seek medical care. I agree with you, this has not changed across the ages.

The other thing which has compounded the sort of numbers which go to out-patients is the fact that the demand on the physician in his office has considerably increased. You ring up the doctor and say, "I would like an appointment to see you" and he says, "Well, I think I can give you one in three weeks' time." But they know that if they go down to the out-patients clinic there is a pretty good chance of being seen that day.

The Chairman: What does it mean today to say "I have a doctor,"—you always advise someone to have a doctor. It doesn't mean anything to them at all. He is a doctor who has the record, but he doesn't come to the home. He just can't. He doesn't come unless it is a great emergency. I call my doctor, I am an old patient, I will get an appointment a little quicker than you will. That is the only advantage. I will call up and say, "I want to see you, doctor," and he will reply, "Well, if it is really something I will see you right away." But if you call up you will wait three weeks to be seen. That is the only advantage there is to the family physician, today.

Dr. Bennett: I was not thinking so much of calling up. I was thinking of the point of view that the individual in many instances prefers to go to the out-patient department of a hospital by choice rather than by necessity. This has been my experience, but many people will go there because they know that there will always be someone available in the hospital who will eventually see them.

Dr. Geekie: Particularly our Central European immigrants. They are accustomed to this. This is what they do.

The Chairman: You may be right on that.

Dr. Cappon: I think three things have changed in the out-patient department. First of all, the social composition of the out-patient has changed. It used to be that many more of the poor spent all day waiting, not for emergency treatment but for the equivalent of general practice. Nowadays many more people who are not poor, of the category I mentioned of between $6,000 and $10,000, go to the out-patient department because they cannot easily find family physicians or even afford them. so the composition has changed.

The nature of the complaint has changed from more chronic to more acute. Another thing has changed, and that is the inhumanity or lack of humanization has increased. Even general care is not as good in some ways as it used to be before the numbers became overwhelming. Nowadays attempted suicides who come to the out-patients department are treated as an emergency and are put out again to try suicide again. There are often no beds to admit acute emergencies. People are shuffled around, whereas in the older days, if that is what you are thinking about, most of those people were admitted because there were more beds and more facilities.

Now, I think we have brought out the reason that there has not been enough change. It is that the medical institution has been in-looking, self-satisfied that it was doing a job, but technology has grown around the citadel, so those other things that you would like to see changed have not changed.

The Chairman: Doctor, with all the emphasis that you have had here today on research and expenditures, one of you said that the quality is not as good as it was.

Dr. Geekie: I think one thing should be made very clear, sir. The emergency out-patient's departments were inadequate some years ago, and if you are saying that they are still inadequate, we would agree with you.

The Chairman: I did not say that. I said they had not changed, and that totally the picture was not the very best.

Dr. Geekie: The numbers have increased.

The Chairman: I know that.

Dr. Geekie: The other thing that we would like to make very clear, and I think this is extremely important, is that there has really been very little research done relative to the system of providing care. There has been all kinds of money spent on basic medical research and clinical research but really very little has been done to evolve a better system of delivering the actual care itself. I think this is the area you are going to see the most activity in, or a great increase in activity in the next five or ten years.

As I pointed out to you before, if we do not leave any other message, the provision of medicare insurance is not going to solve the problem as a provision of health care to the poor of this country. It will not solve it. In fact, this is the group that we started out first to try to help, and I suggest to you that we have not really provided them with a helluva lot of help.

The last thing I would like to point out in connection with the out-patient and emergency departments is that the association intends to initiate a study in the very near future to look in considerable depth at the emergency departments or out-patient departments of hospitals.

Senator Inman: What do the doctors think of having more general practitioners?

The Chairman: Earlier they said they were in favour of it, senator.

Dr. Bennett: We are, and we are increasing the availability of family practice units. Many of the graduates are being exposed to family practice, because, as you know, when you go through medical school you very rarely as a medical student come into contact with a family practitioner. You are with people who are in the teaching environment and who are not necessarily family practitioners. More and more medical schools are having family practice units where the practice of family medicine is carried on by family practitioners on an instructional basis within the academic environment. This is increasing in the institutions both in Canada and in United States.

I think it is fair to say that indications are—and I think this can be borne out by the College of Family Practice—that the swing to family practice is increasing, and more people are becoming interested in primary contact care.

Senator Inman: My grand parents' doctor, who was also my father's doctor, delivered me, and when anyone was sick and I sent for the doctor, the minute he came in I felt that everything was going to be all right.

Dr. Cappon: We have determined that one of the great drawbacks to doctors becoming family practitioners—and we did not put this on the record—is the question of medical student selection. When you have got to make 80 to 85 per cent to get into Ontario medical schools, for instance, you have to be an introverted bookworm who is not much good in general practice, and they want you to have degrees and laboratory and medical facilities, but nothing to do with human beings. It is only when the selection process changes that you have the kind of persons who will be interested in people.

The Chairman: Doctor, may I on behalf of the committee suggest that you be our delegate to change that process, I felt that there was a great deal of room for change.

Let me on behalf of the committee say that this was a thoughtful brief. It took a lot of work, but the best part about it was the fact that you let us share with you some of your knowledge and some of your experience. You have given us some information and some idea of your problem, I am sure you realize the extent of our problem. On behalf of the committee, I thank you.

The committee adjourned.

Pointe St. Charles Community Clinic Brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty, we have come as representatives of the Pointe St. Charles Community Clinic of Montreal.

Various members of our panel will speak on the following topics:

1. Health Care Delivery to an Urban Community
2. Education Services in the same Urban Community
3. Family Health Workers: a means of providing comprehensive care.
4. Family Planning in Pointe St. Charles.

Introduction

The Pointe St. Charles clinic was opened on July 2, 1968 by a group of medical students in order to provide a centre for comprehensive health services in a community where, in a population of 25,000 people, there were only two full times and one part-time doctors.

The reasons for establishing a clinic in this area were many, the more important being:

- a. to bolster medical services in the area.
- b. to provide a place in the community where patients would be assured of comprehensive care which would include diagnosis and therapy follow-ups, home visits and referral to Hospital specialized services, social agencies, dieticians and education counsellors.
- c. to eventually have citizens of the community take a major part in the decision making process of the clinic

The clinic now employs one full-time and one part-time doctor, two full-time public health nurses, one receptionist and the education director. Volunteer doctors, nurses and students staff evening clinics.

The average cost/patient taken over a three month period is $7.40. The average time spent on the patient (excluding psychiatry) is 25 1/2 minutes. Drugs, when possible, are free.

The clinic, to the present, has been financed by private foundations, donations and a Federal Government Research grant. The charge per patient is $.50.

One of our number from the community has defined poverty simply as a state where income is insufficient to meet basic needs. There certainly is no primary "poverty of spirit" or primary "poverty of motivation" in the Pointe. However there are those who are depressed, disenchanted and lacking in motivation due for the most part to recurrent refusal at hiring agencies and institutional delays in the "so-called" charitable organizations and remaining always and only at the receiving end of aid if it does arrive. Their ideas on the delivery of that aid are never heeded; in other words there is an appalling lack of feedback concerning goods delivered.

At the clinic, we have tried to avoid the charity label and the isolation of recipients from the health delivery system by incorporating citizens on the Board of Directors. This Board was organized late last year to include five community members, two students and two staff. The citizens are not presidents of monolithic enterprises—they are persons interested in the clinic and the philosophy behind community involvement. The functions of this Board include policy decisions in matters of finance, hiring, administration, discussions on community involvement in the clinic, and discussions of roles of personnel working in the clinic.

After two years in the community, the clinic personnel have found, as have others before, that medical care to the average working man is a luxury because of:

- a. time taken to travel to Out-Patient Departments in distant hospitals.
- b. time taken waiting in O.P.D.'s.
- c. cost of drugs and services.
- d. food, shelter and clothing for his family are higher in priority.

One of the solutions to this problem of lack of health care facilities for the urban disadvantaged has been discussed for a number of years. This is the establishment of community comprehensive care clinics whose medical staff would have admitting privileges in regional hospitals. These clinics should be, if not in the same building, at least in close proximity to social agencies, dietetic counsellors, etc. Much co-operation between municipal and provincial governments is needed in these ventures—co-operation which is in our experience, sorely lacking. The Federal Government is interested in the Pointe St. Charles project from a research point of view, and hopefully will continue to support us.

C.M.A. Brief to the Special Senate Committee on Poverty

Mr. Chairman and members of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty:

The Canadian Medical Association, representing over 21,000 physicians and surgeons of Canada, is pleased to have the opportunity of presenting its views in this important field to your Committee. This Brief will deal in the main with matters relevant to the delivery of health care to the "disadvantaged" in Canada.

Background

Physicians, economists and social reformers have long been aware of the intimate association between poverty and poor health, and of the major role played in ill health by economic factors. At the beginning of the 18th Century, Bernadine Ramazzini stressed the need to examine the relationship between the health of a populace and its environmental conditions. In the late 18th Century, Johann Peter Frank described the misery of the people as "The Mother of Diseases", adding that considerable improvement in health could be obtained by raising living standards, providing good housing, nutrition and education. In the early 19th Century, Villevivré showed that not only were mortality rates linked to living conditions of different social strata, but that poverty was associated with higher rates of disease and health. In the early 20th Century, Devine stated: "Ill health is perhaps the most constant of the attendants of poverty", and Biggs wrote: "Disease is largely a removable evil. It continues to afflict humanity, not only because of incomplete knowledge of its causes and lack of individual and public hygiene, but also because it is extensively fostered by harsh economic and industrial conditions and by wretched housing in congested communities. These conditions and consequently the diseases which spring from them can be removed by better social organization. No duty of society, acting through its governmental agencies, is paramount to this obligation to attack the removable causes of disease".

In England during the 19th Century, both Seebohm Rowntree and Charles Booth attempted to define poverty and in so doing recognized that there are no hard and fast rules and that its interpretation was relative to both time and place. Townsend and Fuchs in this century have also found difficulty in establishing the true measurement of Poverty.

The precise relationship between ill health and poverty presents a problem. Is the inter-relationship such that poverty brings about ill-health or is the converse true? Often overlooked is the handicap of being born into poverty and because of the continuance of environmental factors, the problem of poverty self-perpetuation. Evidence is available to show that the stress of poverty generates a large volume of personal disorganization shown by high rate of school drop-outs, emotional and psychiatric problems, abuse of drugs and alcohol.

Poor Health and Poverty

The 1950-51 Canadian Sickness Survey showed that working-age men in the low income groups were much sicker in terms of "disability days" than the comparable working-age men with higher incomes.

Low income families are the least able to care for chronic illness in the home environment and consequently there is great pressure from this income group to remove the chronically incapacitated to institutional care.

Studies of low income groups in Canada have shown the inter-relationship between poverty and disease. The native peoples, not only in the North but also in the Provinces, have a greater incidence of diseases of infancy, e.g., dysentery. In 1968 the City of Winnipeg Health Department reported that numerous cases of infant dysentery were an indication of poverty and a "poor environment". A 1968 survey in Vancouver of 300 multi-problem families on low or marginal incomes showed significant greater number of health defects as compared to families in the higher income bracket.

Immunisations among children are significantly lower among the low income families. A study in 1969 in Montreal showed that "stress syndromes" were present in an inverse ratio to income as well as being higher in the welfare group than in the self-supporting group. A Saskatchewan study in 1967 showed that symptomatology associated with illness, both physical and mental, was found to a greater degree among the lower social groups and that the men in these groups made greater use of medical services than their counterparts in the higher social groups. However, women in the lower groups, despite a higher illness-rate, did not take advantage of medical services as much as their higher-group counterparts.

The Economic Council of Canada in its 5th Annual Review suggested that 3.85 million people are living at or below the poverty level. Families who expend more than 70 per cent of their total income on basic necessities (food, clothing, shelter) were considered to fall into the "poverty class". However, poverty does not only mean lack of money. It is a total state made up of many factors; economic, social, political, judicial, educational, informational, intellectual, moral, emotional and perceptual deprivation.

Many areas of poverty in Canada are of the collective type, affecting a group of people in a specific geographical area, e.g., the urban ghetto. The cause of these delineated areas is not uniform; ethnic and language barriers, changes in the economy of the areas, the downward trend found in the heart of many cities, slow economic development because of demographic and geographic factors can be contributing factors.

The environment of poverty is pictured as lack of good sanitation, poor housing, overpopulation, poor nutrition, poor education standards; these factors lead to the flourishing and spread of diseases.

In 1968 the infant mortality rate for all Canadians was 21 per 1,000 live births, 49 per 1,000 for Indians and 89 per 1,000 for Eskimos. In 1968 35 per cent of all Indian deaths and 56 per cent of all Eskimo deaths occurred in children 5 years old and under.

Tuberculosis is a disease found frequently among the poor and although there has been a spectacular drop in mortality from the disease, the morbidity rates have tended to flatten out with the highest incidence of the disease being in the lower socio-economic segments of the population.

Various studies have shown that the highest incidence of social mal-adjustment is found among the poor and that their emotional disturbance is often of a more serious nature than in the non-poor.

Ill health and poverty are inter-twined in dental care and a large segment of the Canadian poor receives either no dental care or care only at the time of a dental emergency. Orthodontics is almost unknown to the poor and in some instances could aggravate the individuals status, e.g., psychological factors, unemployment because of appearance, etc.

Lack of education among the poor can also predispose towards accidents and it has been shown for example, from Indian health statistics, that the accident mortality rate for Indians is 4 times the national rate.

The association between ill health and poverty is pointed up in figures indicating dependency. In March 1969 in Ontario, 30 per cent of all General Welfare recipients were granted aid because of major health problems as compared with 43 per cent granted assistance because of unemployment.

The cycle of poverty-ill health is often perpetuated by the loss of wage earning capability because of ill health by the main wage earner of the family. This loss leads to a change in a downward progression of the family's socio-economic environment and so the cycle is maintained. Where an individual or family unit is already marginal economically, ill health is often sufficient to depress them even further and interfere with education processes which is one of the main avenues of escape from poverty.

Problems

Perceptual deprivation contributes very largely to the inability of the poor to actively seek out methods of improvement in their status, and perpetuates the inertia and apathy.

In some of the poor, there is an absence of the innate drive, possessed by many of the "non-poor", to "break into the system" and the so-called "instinct of self-preservation" is either absent or so depressed that the impoverished remain paralysed in their physical, mental and ill health environments.

For some of the poor, attempts to break out are rebuffed, often unintentionally and because of the lack of tenacity and perseverance the will to make further attempts is destroyed. This is when helpless despair takes over and ill health allowed to increase to one of two outcomes. Either the health picture reaches "emergency status" and medical aid is sought at that point or the individual sinks into apathy where there is nothing to lose except life itself and death may come as a welcome relief.

In addition to the lack of drive on the part of the individual there are other barriers which lie between the poor and health care. These can be summarized into two groups:

- (i) The Education/Information Barrier
- (ii) Mechanical Barriers

The Education/Information Barrier

No matter how large the array of services, they cannot be said to be truly available if those who should use them the most do not know of their availability. It is going to be difficult to persuade the poor, who do not use health care facilities because of this barrier, to take advantage of the facilities offered; it may be necessary to actively seek out these people and make them aware of what is available.

In addition to the lack of knowledge about services, the poor may also be unaware of the many basic underlying factors contributing to disease, e.g., poor environmental factors such as lack of sanitation, poor water supplies, poor personal hygiene, poor housing.

Mechanical Barriers

Even when properly informed and contacted, the poor may still be unable to take full advantage of available health care. The site of the services, transportation problems, type and periodicity of service, may all preclude their full utilization.

When the original thinking behind the formation of hospitals many centuries ago is considered, it is an anachronism that to-day one can find people, sadly lacking in health care, within the shadows of the walls of some of our largest hospitals.

The rural poor may not have any service to turn to for assistance. They are often geographically removed from sources of health care and economically may be unable to travel to centres where care is available. They live in areas that are unattractive to the providers of health care because of the poor economic and cultural environment.

Assuming these difficulties can be overcome, the potential recipient of health care can find himself lying a poor second to the functioning of the system with the end result that he may be reluctant to use the facilities in future. Geiger in a 1966 address to the American Public Health Association said "These barriers are real. Most of all, 'care' does not truly intervene, either into the health of the poor or into the poverty syndrome itself".

Delivery of Health Care—General

In recent years many aspects of health care has undergone fiscal changes, i.e., prepaid insurance schemes have replaced the traditional methods of direct payment for health services rendered.

It has also been traditional for the medical profession to provide health care for the underprivileged, who did not have the ability to pay, at no cost to the recipient and without a "means test".

Where welfare agencies provided recompense for health care for the poor, the tendency has been to reimburse the doctor, using a schedule of benefits much lower than that applicable to the "non-poor".

This does not imply that the poor received inferior health care for this reason, but it did little to obliterate the stigma of charity or to de-emphasize the gap between the "have's" and the "have-not's".

Under the provision of the Federal Medical Care Act of 1966, programmes of health care have been introduced by 7 provinces. In British Columbia enrolment is voluntary; in Ontario enrolment is partly voluntary and partly compulsory and in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland participation is compulsory.

Some of the stigma of "charity" has been removed by the introduction of the Federal-Provincial cost sharing schemes such as the Canada Assistance Plan and the Medical Care programme.

Canada Assistance Plan

Under this Plan, enacted in 1966, the Federal Government undertook to pay 50 per cent of the cost incurred by provinces and municipalities in providing health care to the indigent.

Medical Care Insurance

Enacted in 1966 and made effective July 1, 1968 this plan sets out to ensure that all Canadians, regardless of financial status have access to medical care. The provincial plans must meet the following criteria:—

- (i) be operated on a non-profit basis by a public authority;
- (ii) make available all medically necessary services rendered by medical practitioners as insured services on uniform terms and conditions to all residents of a province;
- (iii) cover not fewer than 90 per cent of the total number of insurable residents of the province during first year of operation, with a commitment that coverage must rise to 95 per cent;
- (iv) portability.

Two provinces, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, finance the provincial part of their plans from general revenue and therefore there is no direct cost to low income families. In Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia subsidisation of premiums is available to those with little or no taxable income.

Despite medical care insurance, many people in the poverty group use institutional outpatient emergency departments instead of using a family physician, assuming that they even have one. Thus they run the risk of impersonalized health care, as stated earlier.

Delivery of Health Care—Indians & Eskimos

The Medical Services Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare makes available medical and public health services to registered Indians and Eskimos who are unable to provide for themselves and who are not included in a provincial scheme.

The health picture of these groups on marginal or submarginal incomes is shown in the morbidity and mortality figures mentioned earlier in this presentation.

An interesting comparison is one between on-reserve and off-reserve Indians. Among the latter and in the younger age groups, mortality is much lower than their on-reserve counterparts in spite of the fact that the Indians who have left the reserves live in urban environments and on the average have a much lower standard of living than their non-Indian fellow-citizens.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has indicated problems in providing health care which are peculiar to this segment of the Canadian population and has selected 3 problems as of major importance. These are:

- 1) Staff recruitment problems—i.e. low pay scales, lack of trained personnel.
- 2) Location of treatment centres—low population densities, transportation and communication problems.
- 3) Separation of facilities for Indian and Eskimo patients from those provided for others, i.e., the provision of specialized services, low population densities and shortage of expertise makes it difficult to provide specialized health care.

Several Canadian Universities are providing health care for disadvantaged Indians and Eskimos in the North. Training programmes are currently providing native personnel to work in the delivery of health care systems to their own people.

Delivery of Health Care—Urban Disadvantaged

Several authorities have pointed out that the people living in the central core of most Canadian metropolitan areas suffer from inadequate health services. It would appear that the implementation of universal medical care insurance has not entirely improved the lot of the urban underprivileged.

Institutionalized health care, particularly for the urban poor, has resulted in a pattern of services requiring children and their parents to attend separate facilities at different hours under differing standards of eligibility. The fragmentation of these services has reflected and supported the fragmentation of family life already present among the poor. Social services are frequently set apart from preventative and therapeutic medical services and both may be separate from psychiatric services. Mental health services are insufficient to meet the demands made on them and are very often non-existent for the poor.

Recommendations

The success of any programme designed to provide comprehensive medical care for a population depends on both the programme and the type of population to be served.

Programmes must be designed to close the gap between health supply and demand and if the health services are to operate for the good of everyone, all factors involved in the delivery of health care must be weighed accordingly.

(i) Financial

Where low incomes contribute to the barrier between provider and consumer, health care programmes must minimize the financial considerations.

(ii) Availability

The delivery of health care must be available in geographic and temporal terms; it must be in attractive surroundings; it must preserve the dignity of the individual; it must provide good quality care; it must be integrated with all community health services; it must be comprehensive and should be family-orientated.

(iii) Educational

A greater educational approach must be made to the poor. They must be made aware of programmes of health supervision; well baby clinics, etc.; of personal hygiene and of good sanitation; of the advantages of early diagnosis and treatment.

It may be necessary to actively seek out the disadvantaged and enlighten them as to the availability of services. The health-education programme should be instituted in the schools at all levels.

(iv) Environmental

The areas of poverty must undergo environmental changes. These include the provision of better housing, the reduction of pollution, the institution of hygiene and sanitation programmes, better nutrition, fluoridation of water supplies, better job opportunities, good transportation, provision of day care centres, schools, clinics and recreational amenities.

(v) Rehabilitation

Both physical and mental rehabilitation are important. Education in both these fields is particularly important in the case of the poor whose educational standards may prevent them from recognizing their needs and from appreciating their treatment.

In addition the rehabilitative process should also take into account the environment. To treat symptoms and then to send the patients back, unchanged in knowledge, attitude or behaviour, to the same physical and social environment—also unchanged—that overwhelmingly helped to produce their illnesses and will do so again, is to provide antibiotics for cholera and then send the patient to drink once again from the Broad Street pump.

(vi) Preventive Medical Services

It is becoming increasingly apparent that these services, formerly the responsibility of local health departments, must now be provided on a much wider basis, utilizing the departments, hospitals and allied health services agencies. In addition to the traditional main concerns such as control of communicable diseases, morbidity, mortality, counselling, there are schemes for the early detection of children with genetic defects, hearing, seeing and speech defects. Problems of to-day include drug abuse, alcoholism, the mentally ill—all these need early recognition and active treatment in order to provide a firm basis for the rehabilitative process.

Role of the Canadian Medical Association

The C.M.A., through the Council on Community Health Care, has initiated studies into the delivery of health care to the Canadian disadvantaged in isolated and urban environments.

The Committee looking into the medically disadvantaged in isolated areas has met with officials of the Department of National Health and Welfare to discuss the problems and has acted as the Association's Advisory Committee to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

The Committee is agreed that one of the major areas of inefficiency in the present system of the delivery of health care is the carrying out by highly trained individuals of procedures that could be done equally well by others with lesser training. Some current studies are being done on transfer of function but the determination of the proper role of each member of the health care team is far from being accurately established and there is a great need for further research in this matter.

The Council has recommended the following:

(i) That the C.M.A. undertake a detailed study of the potential use, qualifications, training, licensing, controls and formal recognition of the physician-associate as a means of extending and improving the current health care system with particular reference to medically disadvantaged areas—isolated.

(ii) That the C.M.A. recommend that the Divisional Medically-Disadvantaged sub-committees explore, with the Regional Director of Medical Services, D.N.H. & W., the feasibility of setting up a roster of "travelling doctors" to serve isolated areas.

(iii) That orientation courses be set up for physicians proposing to practice in Northern and isolated areas. (Committee members currently practising in these areas are willing to participate in the provision of this training).

It must be pointed out that in addition to these areas of proposed study health care to the medically disadvantaged through isolation is currently being provided by some medical teaching units and by some hospitals through schemes whereby personnel from these units undertake "tours of duty" in the isolated areas. There are also individual physicians who donate their time and skills on a voluntary basis to helping the residents of isolated areas.

The Committee looking into medically disadvantaged—urban—has currently under study the various methods of delivery of health care to the residents of these areas.

The following are among the subjects under study:—

(i) possible solutions to the problems of recruitment of doctors for the areas involved, e.g., group practice clinics;

(ii) provision of allied health and social workers;

(iii) the role of the urban hospital with particular emphasis on the type of facilities offered and the availability of services;

(iv) the role of the medical student street-front clinics as currently instituted in several Canadian cities and the future of those clinics.

The C.M.A., through the Council on the Provision of Health Services, initiated the setting up of a co-ordinating committee to look into the delivery of health care to all Canadians. This committee, under the chairmanship of a member of the Council, included representatives from the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, the College of Family Physicians, the Canadian Nurses Association, the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges and the Federation of Provincial Medical Licensing Authorities of Canada.

This Committee has made recommendations, regarding the setting up of pilot projects, e.g., training, utilization and acceptance of allied health personnel; types of practice and relationship to quality of health care, etc.

It would seem fitting to close this presentation with a statement by Prime Minister Mackenzie King in 1948. Speaking on the establishment of National Health Grants he said; "The preservation in health and strength of its population is surely the best of all guarantees of a nation's power, of its progress and of its prosperity. Our greatest national asset is the health and well being of our people".

Summary

In this brief, we have endeavoured to show that the following are contributing factors to poverty in Canada:

1. Excessive taxation.
2. The high cost of the damage caused by alcohol, narcotic drugs and cigarette smoking.
3. Unwise expenditures by government.
4. The high cost of building and buying a house. Excessive interest rates. Inadequate housing.
5. Inefficient law courts.
6. Loss of revenue.
7. Misleading propaganda.
8. Mental illness.
9. Defective Births.
10. Emotionally disturbed children.

Recommendations

1. That Federal, Provincial and Municipal taxes be kept to a minimum.
2. That inadequate pensions be increased to keep pace with inflation.
3. That the Food and Drug Dept. be requested to revise the classification of alcohol, to reveal its true nature.
4. That the Canadian Medical Association be requested to commence a campaign for the prevention of acute and chronic alcoholism similar to the cigarette smoking campaign.
5. That business and industry be encouraged to promote alcoholism prevention programmes.
6. That the Canadian Government keep pace with the latest research done in all parts of the world, with respect to the effect of alcohol on the human body.
7. Consideration be given for a rehabilitation programme for alcoholics throughout Canada, with a works programme to help finance this project.
8. That the Special Senate Committee on Poverty read "The Amazing Story of Repeal" by Fletcher Dobyns, Signal Press, 1965.
9. That the Canadian Government institute an educational programme to educate the public about the physiological and psychological and sociological effects of alcohol.

10. That a statement showing the total cost of alcohol damage paid by the taxpayer be compiled and widely circulated.

11. That a closer check be kept on government expenditures.

12. That no financial assistance in any way be given by the government to breweries, wineries or distilleries.

13. That lengthy consideration be given to find ways to reduce the cost of housing. That action be taken to reduce interest rates.

14. That a study of law courts be made to reduce unnecessarily lengthy trials and to ensure that justice is done.

15. That a study of Liquor Control Board reports throughout Canada be made to determine whether or not there is loss of revenue for licence fees with respect to brewers, vintners or distillers.

16. That liquor advertising be limited or preferably eliminated.

17. That research be find the causes of mental illness be accelerated.

18. That research be done to determine whether or not alcohol affects the unborn child.

19. That consideration be given to "the need for great attention to treatment of the children in the alcoholic's family".

20. That the Health & Welfare Department be requested to commence a positive campaign to promote physical, mental and emotional well being.

21. That every Canadian child be encouraged to attend Trade, Technical or High Schools. Those past school age, be encouraged to continue adult education.

PREAMBLE

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union is grateful for the opportunity to express its concern regarding poverty in Canada. The main purpose of our organization is the protection of the home and the individual. Our motto is "For God, and Home and Every Land." Anything which hinders the wholesome and healthful development of the child and adult in the home, is of primary importance.

There is a crying need to be concerned about the underprivileged, the handicapped, the unemployed, and the unemployable, in Canada. In the world picture, what affects one, affects all. Genuine concern demands action.

From "THE UNION SIGNAL" dated September 14th, 1957, Sydney J. Harris in a recent column said: "We have no right to speak glowingly about our 'high standard of living' until we are able to spend our money as wisely as we are able to make it; the ultimate test of a civilization is not its power or its riches, but its sense of values; every flourishing empire of the past collapsed because it began paying more attention to the incidentals than to the essentials of a good life."

Page 70 of the United Church booklet published in 1969, "POVERTY", lists the following expenditures:

In an average year, Canadians spend:
 $ 1 billion on alcohol
 $400 million at the race tracks
 $200 million on candy

1. POVERTY—The following are further interesting facts taken from "POVERTY": "The Economic Council of Canada reported that 1/5 of Canadian families in 1965 had an average income per family of $2,263." "The Report considered those victimized by poverty to be single persons with incomes of less than $1,000 a year, families of 2 with less than $2,500, and families of 3, 4 and 5 or more with incomes of less than $3,000 and $4,000 respectively."

"Roughly at least 1 Canadian in every 5 suffers from poverty." "It can be a crime to be poor in Canada. The accusation? Vagrancy—being without visible means of support or a shelter. A vagrant is sent to jail."

2. POVERTY OF THE WORLD—Again quoting from the booklet "POVERTY": "Economists tell us that the greater part of aid given by rich nations over the last 15 years has been wiped out by changes in the terms of trade and in losses suffered by developing countries when prices of their exports fell and imports from industrialized nations rose in value. For example—Canada buys sugar at less than it costs the Jamaicans to make it, thereby undercutting the real value of Canadian aid to Jamaica. Before we take any credit for giving aid to under-developed countries, we need to know the extent to which our affluent style of living is being financed at the expense of poor countries. In 1955, Brazil exported 2.11 tons of cotton to pay for a 39 H.P. Massey-Ferguson tractor. In 1962, for the same tractor, 4.79 tons of cotton were required." "One African leader has said, 'When the whites have turned to loving, the tragedy is that we shall have turned to hating'" "Prime Minister Mrs. Indira Gandhi said, 'The question before advanced countries is not whether or not they can afford to help the developing nations, but whether they can afford not to do so.'"

"Failure to assist poor countries to bridge the gap separating them from rich nations is an 'invitation to violence', stated United Nations Secretary-General, U Thant.

3. TAXES—"The Canadian Economic Foundation today said taxes, not wages, are the significant factor in the rapid increase in prices across Canada No matter how hard investors, executives and employees have worked together to reduce production costs, rising taxes have nullified all their efforts in recent years." "Taxes Get Blame for Rising Prices" Sun, February 28, 1967.

"Everything that the average fully-employed Canadian earned since January 1st will have gone to pay his share of 1968's federal, provincial and municipal taxes." This was stated in the May 4th, 1968 issue of the "Vancouver Sun", under the editorial heading "Dismay Day".

"YOUR DOLLAR IS WORTH 64 CENTS"—so states Robert McKeown, in Weekend Magazine, of the Sunday Sun, December 14, 1968, and continues, "Wages go up, prices go up. Costs go up. The more you make the less you seem able to afford. In terms of the spending power of a dollar of 1949, the present day dollar is worth only 64 cents."

The little man has to bear the continual increase in taxes, the hidden taxes, and the all too evident tolls on his pocket-book. The demand for increased wages does not benefit the man or woman on a settled income, yet all are expected to bear the consequent increase in taxes.

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That Federal, Provincial and Municipal taxes be kept to a minimum.
2. That inadequate pensions be increased to keep pace with inflation.
4. FUNDED DEBTS—British Columbia's per capita funded debt is the highest in Canada. (Funded debts are long-term obligations (15, 20 or 25 years).

British Columbia	$785.00
Manitoba	745.00
New Brunswick	700.00
Saskatchewan	665.00
Quebec	645.00
Ontario	610.00
Nova Scotia	495.00

Cont'd

Newfoundland	385.00
P.E.I.	380.00
Alberta	33.00

(Chet Bell, "Booming B.C.'s Funded Debt Estimated at $1.41 Billion" Sun, November 19, 1966.)

If Alberta, with a low per capita debt of $33.00, can manage, is it not possible for high per capita debt provinces to considerably reduce their funded debts and thus decrease the burden of taxation?

5. DRUG COSTS—"Also, according to a Yale study, we learn that at least:

- 30% of divorces
- 25% of all insanity
- 37% of all poverty
- 47% of all child misery
- 50% of all Crimes, and
- 50% of holiday traffic deaths are caused by the use of alcohol." Listen, May, 1967 by John Walker, "I Dare you!"

In a recent financial statement distributed by the Nova Scotia Federation on Alcohol Problems, it was estimated that the cost of the alcohol tax dollar was $7.36. The estimate included costs of alcohol associated traffic accidents, crime, insanity, incarceration of prisoners, poverty, absenteeism, alcohol treatment, alcoholism programmes, etc. "A Study in Stupidity: Spend $7.36 to get $1.00"

James H. Gray, writing for an Edmonton paper, and quoted in the Victoria Daily Times, May 8th, 1968, states "Over the past decade Royal Commissions have gone probing into most of the darkest nooks and deepest crannies of prairie life. There is one glaring exception. Nobody has paid the slightest attention to the blackest patch of all, which alcohol is causing. The cost socially and financially of misuse of alcohol is beyond computation." "Counting the Costs of Prairie Alcoholism."

"In these modern days of economic stringency, Parliament should be required to direct its attention to this important issue and make the liquor traffic directly and specifically responsible for the discharge of its own financial obligations and no longer should it be permitted to shuffle out of them by placing the burden on the State. So states the Research Student Services, Britain, September 1966. "Who Pays Liquor's Debts?"

Listen Magazine, May 1967, points out that the "greatest toll exacted by the poverty makers is not financial. It is human and spiritual, the appalling waste of human resources. Who can put a cost label on a man's genius, his self-respect, his health, his home, or perhaps his life, laid waste by beverage alcohol?" Ray, R.W. "Are Liquor Tax Dollars Profitable?"

Ray Hunt, General Manager of the B.C. Division of the Retail Merchants' Association of Canada, "in commenting on reports from Eastern Canada that shoplifters last year bilked Canadian retailers of about $375 million worth of goods... said that the consumer and not the retailer is the final victim because losses become part of the cost of doing business, and must be added to merchandise markups."

Hunt further said, "B.C. merchants' losses to shoplifters would run close to the national average—nearly two per cent of gross sales—but that losses on the Lower Mainland would probably be fractionally higher than in the rest of B.C. This pattern, he added, would be partly attributable to the relatively higher drug-addict-shopliifter population in the larger centres than in the hinterlands. On the gross retail sales of $2.5 billion in B.C. last year, shoplifters probably spirited about $40 million worth of merchandise out of stores without paying." "Shoplifters List Cost of Goods." Sun, April 4, 1968.

In the 1962 Index of Crime report, by the Narcotic Educational Foundation of America, is the statement, "Your taxes and mine are infinitely higher because of the narcotic and crime problems. The billions now being spent for larger police Departments, jails, courts, penitentiaries, etc. are only a small part of the total cost of these evils. There are increased insurance premiums, higher prices and lower earnings on investments, plus many other losses you 'absorb' to pay your share of crime's cost. There are also millions of dollars directly lost each year to criminals by their victims. Billions of dollars raised by taxing the better citizens are spent to 'educate' youth who later cost additional billions to incarcerate because of our neglect in teaching moral values." The cost of crime in Canada is an estimated $400,000,000.00—Sun, March 29, 1967.

An article in the "Vancouver Sun" June 19, 1969, with the heading "14,000 Deaths In Year Blamed on Cigarettes", by Jan MacDonald, stated "Cigarette smoking took the lives of almost 14,000 Canadians, and rang up a health bill of about $400 million in 1966, Health Minister John Munro said. The following figures listed was a breakdown compiled by the department:

Lung cancer, $56 million
 Coronary heart disease, $201 million
 Chronic bronchitis, $14 million
 Emphysema, $7 million
 Other disabilities, $96 million, and Fires caused by smoking, $13.5 million

WAGE LOSS—"How often do the contents of the pay-packet find their way to the licensed premises, so contributing to the sorrow of mothers and children?"

Whether alcoholism causes, or is caused by slums, is beside the point; the two evils are indissolubly bound together and must be tackled together.

Alcoholism is a disruptive factor in our modern society, a destroyer alike of marriage, of the parent-child bond, and of the family unit. It is clearly a socio-economic scourge of the first magnitude." Alex G. Mearns, M.B.E., M.D., B.Sc., D.P.H., F.R.S.E. "What Does the Doctor Say About Temperance?" Church of Scotland.

TRAFFIC DEATHS—It is estimated that 50% of traffic deaths are attributable to alcohol. Over 5,000 traffic deaths occur annually in Canada.

J. R. Coghill of Waterloo, and president of the Canadian Federation of Insurance Agents' and Brokers' Associations, said, "The insurance business 'cannot control the highway slaughter—only governments can do that'. 'Control over the severity and frequency of accidents is the only way to reduce the loss portion of the premium dollar.' 'Average liability claim cost in 1968 was $673, up from $635 in 1967 and $471 in 1964.'—Vancouver Sun, January 20, 1970. "Politicians Duck Responsibilities"

Again from the Vancouver Sun of September 1, 1967, the Automobile Insurance Industry states, "One classroom of high school students is wiped out every week because of car accidents. More young Canadians are killed in automobile accidents than by any other cause." "The Dead Classroom"

The cost of traffic deaths in B.C. was estimated at $85,000,000.00 by M. L. A. Ray Perrault. Province, August 10, 1965. In the December 13, 1967, Sun, Byran Brabant estimated the cost of traffic accidents at $74,000,000.00 in B.C.

WATER & ECOLOGY... "It takes 125 gallons of water to produce one gallon of neutral spirits used in the making of gin, rye, vodka and liquors. The water is consumed in the processes of cooking, distilling and cooling." says C. T. J. (Bill) Terry, Domestic Sales Manager and Vice-president of Potter Distilleries... "

"Alcohol Uses 125 Gallons of Water", Sun, October 21, 1967.

"Operations of the new Hiram Walker distillery in the Okanagan, B.C., have raised several questions in the area: how will the discharge of millions of gallons of heated water affect the ecology of the Okanagan Lake System" . . . up to five million gallons a day (are) to be discharged into Vernon Creek at temperatures up to 80 degrees. It is estimated that 7.2 million gallons of water a day will be diverted from Okanagan Lake, reports Jes Odam in "The Wealthy, Yet Depressed, Okanagan", Sun, September 27, 1969, pages 12, 13. "Dr. Allan McIntosh, President of Kelowna Medical Society, is another who is concerned . . . 'Maybe we are going to wake up in 50 years and find it has made a difference and then it is too late,' he said.

Has the operation of the distillers with respect to water had a detrimental effect elsewhere in Canada as regarding pollution and high consumption of water?

May we suggest that you look into this, as pure water is one of our greatest assets. What about the harm to fish and other water life through pollution on such lakes. Also there is the factor of water sports and summer camping on a possible polluted lake.

RECOMMENDATIONS

3. That the Food and Drug Dept. be requested to revise the classification of alcohol, to reveal its true nature.
4. That the Canadian Medical Association be requested to commence a campaign for the prevention of acute and chronic alcoholism similar to the cigarette smoking campaign.
5. That business and industry be encouraged to promote alcoholism prevention programmes.
6. That the Canadian Government keep pace with the latest research done in all parts of the world, with respect to the affect of alcohol on the human body.
7. Consideration be given for a rehabilitation programme for alcoholics throughout Canada, with a works programme to help finance this project.
8. That the Special Senate Committee on Poverty read "The Amazing Story of Repeal" by Fletcher Dobyns, Signal Press, 1965.

6. GOVERNMENT'S RESPONSIBILITY—"Suppose we know that the government could increase its revenue by victimizing another 100,000 of its citizens. It would concern the government's responsibility for securing its revenue at the expense of the health and welfare of its people. The problem concerns . . . the measure of our responsibility as children of God for anything in our society that maims and destroys bodies and souls." Dr. E. M. Howse, "Common Factors in Temperance Thinking".

"We must fight for a nation in which men and women no longer seek the false stimulation and the fake security, the humbug happiness and the counterfeit strength of liquor. To these ends we must devote our knowledge and our talents and our time. So long as men are lost to the cup of fury, our fight must continue."—Upton Sinclair, "The Cup of Fury".

RECOMMENDATIONS

9. That the Canadian Government institute an educational programme to educate the public about the physiological and psychological and sociological effects of alcohol.

10. That a statement showing the total cost of alcohol damage paid by the taxpayer be compiled and widely circulated.

7. PREVENTION—"in these young persons, must we forever wait until alcoholism has become an established disease, with all the manifestations we know so well—cirrhosis of the liver, cerebral edema, personality changes, and insanity; conflicts and heartaches among family and friends; and death and destruction on the highways—before we do anything about a disease which might have been prevented?" Edith Petrie Brown, M.D., President, American Medical Woman's Association. "The Prevention of Alcoholism". Journal of the American Medical Women's Association, December, 1961.

"The principle behind research in any field is to find the cause of problems so that they can be prevented; in short, to save money. Not to spend money to prevent alcoholism, is to waste further money.

8. PROSPERITY DURING PROHIBITION—In the January 1930 issue of the Ladies' Home Journal, Mr. Samuel Crowther in a feature article states under the heading of A GREAT ECONOMIC EXPERIMENT that "In 1919 there were around 18 million individual savings accounts to a total of 13 billion dollars. Last year (1929) there were more than 53 million accounts, holding in them twenty-eight and a half billion dollars. Life insurance policy holders increased from more than 13 million in 1919 to more than 27 million in 1927. The stocks and bonds of the large corporations are now so widely distributed that probably as many people have them as have automobiles. This country in a very literal sense is coming to be owned by the mass of its citizenry." "Merchants in Gary, Indiana, where our largest steel mills are located, report that since Prohibition, working men are purchasing a much better grade of wearing apparel of all kinds, and that, as a general rule, payments are made at time of purchases, whereas formerly it was necessary in many cases to extend credit."

In the February 1930 issue of the Ladies' Home Journal, an article by Samuel Crowther entitled "WHERE PROHIBITION IS A SUCCESS" states, "It has saved $15 billion from Drink for the Purchase of Better Living". He quotes in this same article what Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., the President of General Motors, said: "Having been intimately connected with industrial problems for many years, I am thoroughly convinced that Prohibition has increased our national efficiency, has added to the purchasing power of the people, and given us an advantage in our competition for foreign trade."

"In an investigation made of 3,000 saloon properties in New York City, it was found that new businesses were occupying all of them and the new concerns employed between three and a half to four and a half men as against two men each for the saloons." "With the rerouting of at least two-thirds of the money which formerly went for drink into the buying of useful goods, a higher level of general living has been established in this country." We have as a nation been infinitely more prosperous since Prohibition than ever before.

Fletcher Dobyns in his book "THE AMAZING STORY OF REPEAL" quotes Mr. Samuel G. Blythe, distinguished author and journalist, in an article in the Saturday Evening Post of July 9, 1927, in which he states that "A new and gigantic purchasing power has developed in this country since we have had prohibition that accounts for the prosperity of our railroads, our manufacturers, our trade in all directions. That, in a large measure, is a purchasing power derived from the diversion of former booze money into economic channels. It does not come from the very rich, nor from the very poor, although it has decreased the number of the very poor, as any student of economics knows. It comes from the great average American citizen and it comes in part because booze is no longer an article of legal merchandise in this country... Hence, the individual, his family and general trade get the benefit of the wages and profits that formerly went to the non-productive saloon-keeper.

We wish to point out that prosperity prevailed in the U.S. because of the curtailment of the consumption of alcohol.

9. GOVERNMENT WASTE... "Canada grows more food than it can consume, sell abroad, or can afford to give away." Time, March 9, 1970. We question that latter statement. If we can help the hungry in Canada, India, China, South America and Africa, we are easing dire need at home and the famine situation abroad. Our government is suggesting that it pay farmers this year to omit the wheat season. Time, in the issue mentioned above, quotes Toronto Globe & Mail, "There is an inescapable immorality in paying farmers not to grow food when half the world is hungry and some of it is starving." Could that one hundred million dollars involved be better spent paying the farmers for their crops, using the surplus for those in need?

"Canada's bank guard has pulled the trigger on gross waste and misuse of taxpayers' money," so claims the Sun in an editorial of February 24, 1968. Among numerous instances of waste mentioned there, is the $8 million in payments for work never done, questionable practices which include losses on re-sale of military equipment, over-payment by millions to contractors. "The Auditors's Nightmare"

A news item in the same paper, dated October 6, 1967, reports the C.B.C. spent $400,000 to cover the Conservative leadership convention at that time, while the privately-owned CTV network did a better job with considerably less staff, at a cost of $43,000 "C.B.C. Wastes Money"

More recently, the Sun, in its September 27, 1969 issue, stated that "The (Hiram Walker) distillery is expected to qualify for a $5 million cash grant, plus accelerated capital cost allowances for tax purposes." "The Wealthy, Yet Depressed, Okanagan" pages 12, 13, feature article by Jes Odam.

According to the October 7, 1969 issue of the Vancouver Sun, Allan Fotheringham, columnist, said, "H.M.C.S. Bonaventure, Canada's only aircraft carrier, which cost $6 million to build and was purchased by Canada for $18 million in 1957, was refitted at a cost of $13 million in 1967... only to be retired 12 months later. Highest bid for it so far is $14 from the Board of Trade of Brandon, Man., 700 miles from the nearest ocean."

"In 1963, the original financial plan for Expo 67 estimated a deficit of $47.5 million. This was revised six times with the latest last June, putting the deficit at $210,665,000.00"—Vancouver Sun, February 20, 1968. "Expo Deficit Soars to $210.6 million"

"The Canadian Government is to give a Canada Council grant, paid for by Canadian taxpayers, to a notorious separatist agitator, Francois Dorlot. Dorlot is not even a Canadian, but is a native of France, yet he is being given a Canada Council grant of $4,500, plus all travel expenses, to return to his native Paris to study at the Sorbonne." Vancouver Sun, October 23, 1968. "Government Feeds Hand That Bites it".

RECOMMENDATIONS

11. That a closer check be kept on government expenditures.
12. That no financial assistance be given to breweries, wineries or distilleries.

10. HOUSING—"The average price of a home in Vancouver has risen by 80 per cent in only 10 years" according to figures from the Greater Vancouver Real Estate Board. The Vancouver and District Labour Council estimated costs as follows for a 1,200 square foot of bungalow on a 33 ft. lot on East Hastings:

18.2%	or	$10,000	—cost of land
24.1%	or	$13,253	—cost of materials
7 %	or	3,847	—cost of wages
		$27,100	—cost of home
		$27,839	—National Housing Mortgage at 10% over 20 years
		$54,939	—Total cost of home

We cannot or do not supply adequate shelter for our own poor, and this is one of the most basic needs of civilization. Indeed, many of our middle class families are able to provide proper housing for their families at a price they can afford to pay. Please refer to "Dream House Only a Dream". July 30, 1969. Sun.

RECOMMENDATION

13. That lengthy consideration be given to find ways to reduce the cost of housing. That action be taken to reduce interest rates.
11. INEFFICIENT LAW COURTS—"... England's courts have no backlog of untried cases as compared to American courts, which are years behind.

... The essence of Anglo-Saxon law is that a man is presumed innocent until proven guilty. But in U.S. courts, a man is presumed innocent long after he has been proven guilty a half-dozen times over, if he has enough money to try out every technicality and a smart lawyer. Here the guilty are treated as guilty." "A Lot of Law in 90 Minutes", by John Crosby, Vancouver Sun.

RECOMMENDATION

14. That a study of law courts be made to reduce unnecessarily lengthy trials and to ensure that justice is done.

12. LOSS OF REVENUE—The Statement of Profit and Loss of the B.C. Liquor Control Board, March 31, 1969, on page F.12, includes Licence fees paid by Brewers and distillers in the amount of $165,394.00. Why is no licence fee paid by the Vintners of B.C.? What is the policy in other Provinces regarding licence fees for brewers distillers and wineries?

RECOMMENDATION

15. That a study of Liquor Control Board reports throughout Canada be made to determine whether or not there is loss of revenue for licence fees with respect to brewers, vintners or distillers.

13. MISLEADING PROPAGANDA

Liquor Propaganda—"The principles of their strategy were these: 'Never argue', use "Emotion-detonating phrases", achieve 'fixation by repetition'. In less technical terms, use language that would simultaneously state a lie, arouse a prejudice in its favour, blind the eyes and close the mind of the hearer of the truth and make reflection impossible; repeat that language incessantly until the lie is exposed or becomes stale; then invent a new one and repeat the process, always making sure that the truth never catches up with the lies; let the lie, the emotional poison and the tear gas strike the victim at the same instant and all take effect together." Fletcher Dobyns, "The Amazing Story of Repeal" pages 208, 209.

Mr. W. J. L. Hilton, Educational Secretary of the Alcohol Research and Education Council, said "...and we must limit or eliminate advertising of alcoholic beverages of all types."

"I have been told on good evidence that when Goebbels began his work in Germany, he sought expert counsel from the men who had promoted this extraordinary under-cover campaign of propaganda against the 18th Amendment. Ahead of him they devised and exploited every technique for playing upon the greed and passion and prejudice, the ignorance and vanity and fear of the multitude, until as they gloatingly boasted, in three years they effected the most marked overturn in public sentiment in the history of the country." said Rev. Dr. Ernest Marshall Howse, "Our National Scandal", May 24, 1942.

RECOMMENDATION

16. That liquor advertising be limited or preferably eliminated.

14. MENTAL ILLNESS—From the EVANGELICAL CHRISTIAN of March 1967, we read that "More than half the total number of hospital beds in Canada are occupied by mentally-ill patients. The annual cost of this is over $600,000,000.00. Forty-two percent of all patients attending Out-Patient Mental Health Clinics in Ontario are under 17 years of age.

In his annual report, the Chief Coroner of Metropolitan Toronto, stated that there were more suicides in 1965 than road deaths."

"ALCOHOL constitutes the country's greatest mental health problem." Dr. Karl Menninger, "Alcohol's Effect on the Brain." Alcohol Problem Association.

Dr. P. B. Rynard, M.P., was quoted in the Vancouver Sun of June 22, 1967, as saying "Canada's mentally ill are treated as second-class citizens under federal health legislation. 1.9 million Canadians suffer from mental disease and account for 25 million patient-days in mental hospitals."

Dr. Wm. C. Gibson, a University of B.C. professor, said "Canada is far behind the U.S. and Britain in mental illness research. For the size of the problem facing the country, the research picture is discouraging." "We are a second-class nation in this respect. Unless the Government spends more money on research, increased leisure will only bring more mental illness. The cost of mental illness to society is staggering, and the only way to reduce it is through research. We are now looking for preventive treatment to wipe out mental illness altogether." Vancouver Sun, May 31, 1966.

Dr. J. D. Griffith, general director of the Canadian Mental Health Association, claimed that "the average amount spent on caring for mental hospital patients is only $7.00 a day . . . whilst that for general hospital patients is $30.00 a day." He also stated that "other important steps required include recognition of emotional disorders before children go to school, combating mental health problems in underprivileged families, more community and family care facilities." Also "older chronic patients who are transferred to nursing homes where there is no expert psychiatric help are heavily tranquilized and become bed patients with a short life expectancy." Vancouver Sun, May 31, 1966.

Reader's Digest of February 1966, in an advertisement, said, "There are more than 600,000 mentally retarded in Canada. In fact, one child in every thirty is born mentally retarded."

Health Minister Ralph Loffmark said "... at River-view Mental Institution at Essondale 500 out of 800 patients have suffered acute alcoholism." "Pot Bad, Booze Worse"—Loffmark. Victoria Daily Times, June 11, 1969.

RECOMMENDATION

17. That research to find the causes of mental illness be accelerated.

15. DEFECTIVE BIRTHS

UNBORN CHILD—Dr. C. W. Salesby, of Great Britain, an eminent eugenicist, said, "The movement against alcohol is more than a question of reducing drunkenness, preventing accidents, increasing efficiency; it is a question of preserving life from generation to generation." "Temperance and the Changing Liquor Situation," by Deets Pickett, Methodist Book Concern, 1934.

Women are warned, "Be especially careful of any drug-taking during pregnancy. The views on drug-taking by pregnant women have changed drastically since the thalidomide disaster of a few years ago." "Dangerous Drugs You May be Taking." Family Circle, March, 1967.

"The birth of defective children must be recognized as North America's greatest public health problem," Dr. W. H. Tooley, Director of Newborn services in the Cardiovascular Research Institute, at the University of California Medical Centre in San Francisco, said Monday. "Defectives' Birth 'Greatest Problem'," Sun, January 31, 1967.

RECOMMENDATION

18. That research be done to determine whether or not alcohol affects the unborn child.

RESEARCH—"The Canadian Medical Association says public money in Canada is much more likely to be spent to treat your ills if you are a sick cow than if you are a sick child."

"... The federal government last year spent only 66 cents per capita on medical research while $1.71 went for agricultural research." Another 85 cents was spent on biological research . . . "Sick Cow better Off Than Child", Sun, November 24, 1965.

RECOMMENDATION

19. That consideration be given to "the need for great attention to treatment of the children in the alcoholic's family".

16. EMOTIONALLY DISTURBED CHILDREN—"They've been neglected, abused, often brutalized at home for as long as they can remember. Since they don't vote, have no unions and wouldn't know how to pressure anyone for aid or protection, they are virtually ignored by all levels of government. They are the children of Canada's 250,000 odd alcoholics." Bill Stephenson "They Learn to Live With Drinking Parents" Maclean's, June 6, 1966.

"The fourth and perhaps the most important recommendation arising out of this study, concerns the need for great attention to treatment of the children in the alcoholic's family." The fifth recommendation is that more serious consideration should be given to the prevention of alcoholism and family breakdown," said Margaret Cork of the Addiction Research Foundation, Toronto, in "The Forgotten Children".

The Vancouver Express of April 4, 1970, reports, "One million children in Canada need treatment and care because they have emotional and learning disorders, says the Commission on Emotional and Learning Disorders in Children." There are 144 recommendations in the report, most of them calling for a change in public attitude."

RECOMMENDATIONS

20. That the Health and Welfare Department be requested to commence a positive campaign to promote physical, mental and emotional well being.

21. That every Canadian child be encouraged to attend Trade, Technical or High Schools. Those past school age, be encouraged to continue adult education.

THE SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON POVERTY EVIDENCE

Tuesday, June 2, 1970

The special Senate Committee on Poverty met this day at 9 a.m.

Senator David A. Croll (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the brief this morning is from the Canadian Teachers' Federation. On my right is Brother Brennan. His curriculum vitae is with the brief. He is the first full-time President of the Canadian Teachers' Federation. He will introduce to you those who have accompanied him. Then he will make a short statement.

Brother A. F. Brennan, President, Canadian Teachers' Federation: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and honourable members of the committee, I would like to introduce to you the other members of the delegation making this presentation to your committee. On my immediate right is Miss Geraldine Channon, Executive Assistant to the Canadian Teachers' Federation, and the person responsible for the actual writing of the brief. She is also Staff Coordinator of the committee that was responsible for preparing the brief. Then there is Miss Nora Hodgins, Secretary-Treasurer of the Ontario Teachers' Federation, and then Mr. Norman M. Goble, Secretary General of the Canadian Teachers' Federation.

As spokesman for the group, I will just make a brief presentation. There may be some questions that you might want to ask. Some of the members of our delegation who are in a sense more closely involved in the work of the preparation of the brief will assist me in replying to any questions you might wish to ask.

On behalf of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, I would like to express our appreciation to you for according to us the opportunity to appear before you and to make some little contribution to this major task that has been assigned to your committee, because, as teachers, we are concerned with the state of poverty in which so many of our young charges are condemned to live realizing full well the difficulty our young people face and the rather dismal future that awaits them because of their poverty, and realizing also the connection as we see it between that future state of theirs and their lack of education, or the lack of education that is envisaged for them under many of the conditions that exist today. We are very much concerned in making some recommendations to this committee that we hope will be of some benefit to you in your recommendations when you come to present your report.

Our organization is a voluntary federation of provincial teachers' associations which are autonomous in themselves, and when we present a brief of this nature, we try to make it as closely as possible a consensus of the opinion of teachers in Canada from coast to coast. For that reason, it is not the type of assignment that can be done overnight, and therefore we are appreciative of the co-operation of your committee in allowing us the slight extension in the actual presentation of the brief.

You will note on reading the brief that it is not a brief that contains a number of statistics gained from scientific research and investigation into the question of poverty and its relationship to education, or, on the other hand, education and its relationship to poverty. But we did not approach it from that point of view perhaps for two reasons, one was that in the time allotted to us, we felt it would be impossible to do it because of the process through which our work would have to go because of our relationship to the provincial associations, etc., and also because we feel that there are other agencies in the country that are perhaps better suited to providing this type of statistical information, and that your committee would be more interested, perhaps, in the presentation of our point of view, that is the point of view of the Canadian Teachers' Federation, and the recommendations we might have to make in that regard.

Besides the brief, we have passed on to you also "The Poor at School in Canada" which is a supporting document. Again it is not a scientific type of research as this is generally understood. It is intended to be really some case studies that underline or underscore some of the thoughts presented in our brief. The case studies in themselves did not produce any information or any evidence that we were not aware of before the case studies began, but we thought that this type of case study would provide a type of human interest backing, if you wish, for the cold statements of facts that we have made in our brief, and it is with that intention that it is presented for your consideration.

Since the brief has been in your hands for some time, I do not really see that it is necessary for me to make too much reference to it, other than, perhaps, to call your attention to the fact that towards the end of the brief there is a set of recommendations which incorporates the ideas that have been expressed in the brief, and this committee will be quite pleased to discuss any of these recommendations or any other part of the brief that you have before you, as you see fit. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you,

Senator Carter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to begin by saying how much I appreciate this brief and all the material that you have provided to support it.

I read your brief carefully and two thoughts stood out very clearly in my mind. One was that children enter the school system unequal, the poor as compared to the affluent, and the system increases the inequality. The other point that struck me was that the ones who need the most get the least. Is that a fair summary of the main points of your brief?

Brother Brennan: I think so. Of course, I think we should underline the fact that this is a development that is not a designed one, in the sense that no one has ever arranged that would be the way, but that is the way it has turned out, without any evil design on anybody's part, as it were. For example, we did make reference to the fact that the inner city schools generally are the worst schools we have. That is not because the educational authorities are providing worse schools for the poor, but it is just a matter of the facts of history that the economically better-off people have moved to the suburban areas and that is where the new schools have been built, and the older schools are in the inner city and that is where the poor stay, with the result that they have the poor facilities with all their consequences. I do not know whether any of my colleagues have anything to add.

Miss Nora Hodgins, Secretary-treasurer, Ontario Teachers' Federation: I would like to add to it because

I feel, for instance, that the Toronto board has made very definite efforts and has spent a great deal of money trying to improve the schools in the inner city, and I think other cities in Ontario have done the same. But short of tearing old buildings down and building new ones, you are faced with the fact that you have older schools in the older sections of cities, with the cost of school buildings being such that they cannot afford to demolish them.

One of the problems with the system also is that even though the board may try to give the best education possible in the inner city schools, it is still a fact that it may not be suitable, so that even giving better education of a typical sort does not meet the needs.

Senator Carter: In your document about education finance in Canada your figures go up to 1966. In 1966 we were spending almost $6 billion on education at various levels, which is practically the same as we are spending on welfare, give or take a few million. Is more money the answer, or to what extent is more money the answer?

Mr. Norman M. Goble, Secretary General, Canadian Teachers' Federation: If I might express a view on that, it would be an obvious fallacy to suggest that money would be the total answer. On the other hand, it equally has to be recognized that no kind of reform or improvement can be undertaken without money. Money is a necessary starting point, and I hope we have made this point sufficiently clear in our brief. I believe we have tried to. Money is not the whole story, it is not the beginning and the end of the story, but it certainly is a very necessary and fundamental element.

If I may add one more remark to what has been said about the tendency of the system to increase the difference between the rich and poor, I think we must not overlook the fact that the school plant and what goes on in the school is not the only element in the education or educational experience of children. The unfortunate thing is that the concomitants of formal education are lacking to children in the inner cities and especially in some of the more impoverished rural districts, which are available in abundance to those who perhaps need them least. By "concomitants," I mean the kind of home background that encourages reading, conversation, talk, access to ordinary public libraries and encouragement to use them, play space, availability of good fresh air and organized games and recreational activities. All these things tend to be much more abundant in the areas where you find the best schools, which are among the more affluent elements of society. So here I believe is one of the areas where money could make a difference, a deliberate application of money to develop auxiliary facilities; and I remember Conant, in 1951, using the phrase, "the basic concomitants of education," referring to this very thing, the need for the development of schools as centres for recreation for children who live in the depressed areas of the inner cities.

The Chairman: Your reference was to Professor Conant of Harvard?

Mr. Goble: Yes.

Senator Carter: In your brief you drew attention to the many shortcomings in our system—texts, curricula, organization of grades, lack of libraries and even poor school facilities. What you are saying is that every child should have equal opportunities to get an education, and he cannot have an equal opportunity unless equal facilities are available, is that right?

Brother Brennan: I suppose we could go even further and say that the poor need a little more in order to be equal, because they are working at a disadvantage anyway.

Senator Carter: Yes, they are handicapped.

Brother Brennan: Yes.

Senator Carter: One thing you did not mention in your brief, in view of the statement you made a few minutes ago about the cost of buildings and the difference in the buildings in the poor and affluent areas, obviously, no Government that I know of can afford to proliferate schools. School buildings are so costly we have either to design cheaper buildings that will be functional or make greater use of the ones we already have. I did not see any reference to that in your brief.

Miss Geraldine Channon, Executive Assistante, Canadian Teachers' Federation: If I might differ with you there, we did suggest that attempts be made to look into the design of buildings and renovation much more seriously, and we quoted one thinker who suggests the idea of proximity in school could perhaps be done away with. By this he means that one might be able to use for some purpose technological aids such as television, perhaps even in the home. Another idea is to use the community as a school, and a great deal is going on in that respect.

Senator Carter: As the school population increases, what do we do? Do we build more schools, do we have double shifts in the schools we have, or do we bring the schools we have up to standard, as far as we can? What is the wisest use of the financial resources to cope with this problem?

Brother Brennan: We have not by any means reached the maximum use of our school facilities, certainly not as community centres, which perhaps could be used to a greater extent than they now are. There are implications, of course, in making the maximum use of them as schools, to the extent of the extended school day or the double shift, and so on. I am not saying it is impossible, but I do see implications in it from the point of view of the home because our whole society is geared at the present time to the type of school that the children and their parents have been accustomed to, and you could not get much more use out of the schools without making some radical and fundamental changes that would involve not just the school children themselves but the community in which the school operates.

Senator Carter: Let us take this school that can accommodate a thousand children and in respect of which you say: "We will take a thousand children from ages one to six from 8 o'clock till mid-day, and the we will take another thousand children of ages seven to ten in the afternoon". By doing that you have doubled the use of the school building and facilities in every way. Would you agree with that type of arrangement? Do you think that that is something we should be considering?

Miss Hodgins: What would the thousand children who came in the morning be doing in the afternoon? We are talking about a poor down-town neighbourhood where they cannot go out to play in the park or down by the river. What do you do with them in the afternoon?

Senator Carter: But is not that what the school is designed for? After all, the school is there to provide the children with the basic tools of learning, and there is only so much equipment to do that. You have to make the wisest use possible of that plant and equipment, and alternative arrangements have to be made for the children when they are out of school. After all, children normally are in school for only five hours of the day anyway, so there is still that problem of what they do for the rest of the day. I do not quite follow your reasoning on that.

Brother Brennan: Society has been putting more and more obligations on the school. Things that were not part of the school obligation are now part of it, and, indeed, additional responsibilities are being suggested for the school by society at large, and this makes the school today extend far beyond being a place where reading, writing and arithmetic are important.

Senator Carter: I think this morning's radio spoke about the students in Winnipeg going on strike. They are going on strike because the teachers are working to rule. In other words, the teachers are doing nothing but their school activities, and are refraining from engaging in all of their extra-curricular activities. What is the attitude of your Federation to these extra-curricular activities, which are fringes so far as the actual learning process or classroom duties are concerned?

Brother Brennan: I think the teachers by and large have accepted extra-curricular activity as part of the overall educational process because they feel that much of what goes on outside the classroom is of importance to the development of the child. So, while they are engaged in extra-curricular activity, for the most part on a voluntary basis, I think most teachers look upon it as part of their duty in the school under normal conditions.

Mr. Goble: What may seem to be the fringe of activity sewn onto the garment of learning may, in fact, be a very important element in the total process of education. We are becoming more and more acutely aware that the school itself is a community, and depending upon the organization, shape, and the style of that community it develops one or other pattern of community behaviour, and it begins to exercise its own influences on the children which have an educative force at least as great as the formal teaching which goes on in the school.

Senator Carter: Do you take the position, then, that when the teacher is paid a salary he is paid to do this extra-curricular work outside the classroom?

Mr. Goble: That is going very fast to a rather specific aspect of the question. With your indulgence I might perhaps complete an answer to an earlier question you put that suggested that the school as a community educating children is extremely important, and say that the overall pattern of activity is extremely important. There is no way of avoiding housing school children. If the numbers increase then new accommodation has to be provided. As it happens at the present time the curve of increase in total school enrollment is less steep than it has been for many years, and new problems are arising in that space is becoming available in schools which are inconveniently located, but these are administrative problems to be solved in different ways according to the different settings in which they occur. In the meantime, two essential points arise. Where there is gross increase in population the children must be housed in a school, and there is no way of avoiding that. It is an inevitable cost burden. But, the quality of the experience of the children in that school is the vital element. If they are in school for only three or four hours a day then it is all the more important that what happens in that school is conducive to not just formal learning but education in its global sense. This is why we attach importance to light, colour, appropriate activities being open to the children, and to an attractive setting, so that the children are stimulated to awareness, to alertness, to curiosity, and to the process of learning in the schools. Here is the basis of our concern, especially in the old schools of the inner city. Generally, they offer cramped space, gloom, lack of colour, and a confining effect that narrows the spirit of the child rather than offering room for the enlargement of the spirit, which is the essence of education.

Senator Carter: You made the point in your brief, unless I misunderstood it, that when low income families move around to different parts of the city they should not be separated from their school; that some means should be found by which they can still maintain their association with their school. So, you are faced with the cost of transportation versus the cost of enlarging the school building to accommodate those children.

Mr. Goble: This has to be a local decision, according to the mix in the particular area.

Miss Hodgins: I go back to the question of using the schools for a longer period of time. One suggestion that is being considered is the semester system in which you have the same number of children in the school all year round, but you do not have the same children. The holidays would be staggered, so to speak. But, in our climate that raises the problem of air conditioning in the summer months. You go from one problem to another so far as the expense of the building is concerned.

Senator Carter: Is it not a fact that our present organization of the school year which lets a lot of youngsters out in the spring is geared to the time when Canada was an agricultural economy and the children were needed to work on the farms. The school year was fitted into the economic life of the country, which was mainly rural and agricultural. That is no longer the case, and we have not yet adjusted to the modern economic facts of life.

Miss Channon: This conclusion has been drawn by a number of educational jurisdictions, and they are releasing to local boards in some cases the power of deciding how their school year will run, or how they will break it up.

Brother Brennan: That is historically correct. However, we have now developed a rationalization for it that is no longer based upon the historical origin of the custom. To a great extent also our society and work world are related to the school year.

Most people have their holidays in the summer and it is fairly important that parents be free at the same time as their children.

It is not something that could be arranged overnight. A great amount of preparation is required on the part of the school authorities and the community itself.

Senator Carter: But should we not examine our rationalization in the light of the facts of life with which we are faced? We spend nearly $6 billion each on welfare and education for a population of 20 million. That is nearly $12 billion for those two items, which has proved to be insufficient. We have to spend another $2 billion. Where are those dollars going to come from?

Then you are faced with the problem of maximum utilization. I am not interested in rationalization just for its own sake. We are faced with a hard economic problem, to which we must find some answer.

Brother Brennan: In addition to schools there must be public buildings that are not used 24 hours a day and which could be utilized. The ordinary working day for civil servants is from nine to five. Perhaps the same argument could be used in relation to the utilization of other public buildings as well as schools.

I do not believe that it is correct to say that schools are only occupied for five hours per day. Most schools with which I have been connected have been in use not only from nine to five or four, but up to six o'clock and over the weekends, particularly if they are community schools.

Senator Carter: You are only saying that two wrongs do not make a right. I am pinpointing one of the wrongs now.

Brother Brennan: Many schools are well occupied after four o'clock.

Senator Carter: They are occupied all right, but are they occupied in the manner in which they should be in view of the problem we are facing? It is a case of priorities of the occupation.

The Chairman: The universities utilize their facilities almost year around, do they not?

Brother Brennan: A number of them do.

The Chairman: I was under the impression that a considerable number of them do. On the other hand, Senator Carter is saying that whatever use is being made after hours is minimal in so far as the educational process is concerned.

Miss Channon: That is not absolutely true. Many of the secondary schools are busy in the summer time, offering remedial courses.

Senator Fergusson: It is educational, even if it is not educating children of school age.

Senator Quart: It is wonderful that community organizations are allowed to use the schools. However, what facilities are available to the Girl Guides, Boy Scouts and theatricals produced by the schools?

Senator Carter: They could be accommodated in this other vacant space just as easily.

The Chairman: I think you had better take another line, Senator Carter.

Senator Carter: I do not believe I am making much headway on this subject.

With reference to the division of the education dollar, are you in agreement with it being divided into the fields of university, elementary, secondary, higher and vocational education?

The Chairman: To which page are you referring?

Senator Carter: There is a figure 5 on page 9.

Mr. Goble: It should be emphasized that the figure 5 is the division of the increase.

Senator Carter: Yes, this emphasizes the increase from 1957 to 1967, a period of ten years. However, the figures indicate that the greatest increase has been in higher education.

Mr. Goble: It would be fair to say that we are a little disturbed by this distribution. This is not because we do not recognize the need for higher education, but because we feel that the extreme importance of education in the very early years has been neglected. This may be due to the very obvious urgency to accommodate the large increase in the college age population.

The two areas of concern are education in the earliest years, including pre-school and kindergarten, and the education of teachers. These have not received sufficient support and development.

Senator Inman: The brief is very interesting and informative. We are all interested in education, so I read it very carefully.

In paragraph 8 on page 3 you state:

The overall question of stratification and social class is extremely complex and, in the final analysis, is a political question, which must receive a political answer.

Would you enlarge on that statement?

Miss Channon: In discussing poverty and the poor we are concerned with the distribution of funds.

There are many political theories with regard to distribution and redistribution. They vary from free enterprise, with people obtaining as much as they can and disregarding others, to equal distribution.

Therefore there obviously is a political factor as to how income should be distributed and other judgments made.

While we know that there is no complete connection between income and status, there is some correspondence. Therefore, political questions have an influence.

Senator Inman: Does this question arise during meetings of your Federation?

Miss Channon: It has come up in the form of discussions on taxation and comments with respect to the recently presented White Paper. These are such matters as the progressive character of income tax.

Senator Inman: On page 5, in paragraph 10 you say:

Teachers also experience at first hand the frustration occasioned by the apathy and lack of interest in school that many low income parents exhibit.

Could there be any sort of follow-up contact with the parents? I can understand that perhaps it is hard to get parents of poor children to attend parent-teacher meetings. Do you find teachers make any great effort, though, to find out for themselves? I have in mind a teacher in Ottawa at a school where there were a lot of poor pupils, some of whom had problems, which she could not understand. She visited some of the homes and was able to contact the parents and exchange explanations. She said some good results flowed from that. Is this usually done by teachers or not? I know one would need a rather dedicated teacher to do this sort of thing. Do you think much of that is done?

Miss Channon: I do not think it is universal.

Brother Brennan: I think the situation is aggravated in the poorer area schools, for a number of reasons. One is the constant turnover of teachers in these areas, because unfortunately most teachers in such schools are looking forward to the day when they can get a better assignment. When teachers are constantly moving in and out of a community, they do not develop this very desirable contact with the parents. For that reason the parents are perhaps hesitant to come to see the teacher, as they would do in a school where there was a certain core of teachers there all the time, who would maintain this contact between the community and the school.

Senator Inman: Do you not think it would be a great help to both the pupils, teachers and parents if this could be accomplished in some way?

Brother Brennan: Indeed.

Miss Channon: In that connection, I would mention that there is some tendency towards hiring social workers and case workers to be attached to schools, to go out specifically to explore the home situation and involve the parents in the school.

Senator Inman: I think that would be an excellent idea.

On page 7 you say:

A guaranteed income would appear to be preferable to the family allowances, which seem to provide incentives of a less desirable sort.

What incentives would you suggest? Would you comment a little further on that?

Miss Channon: I wonder if I could quote from a man who spoke to our board of directors a few weeks ago? I do not think we ought to go into this too far for a number of reasons, but he said, "Babies are the cash crop".

Senator Fergusson: We do not all agree with that. Some of the committee might, but we have had discussion on this subject in the committee, and I certainly do not agree with it for one.

Senator McGrand: I did not get the answer. Would you repeat it?

The Chairman: Suppose we drop it for the moment and go on to something else.

Senator McGrand: But I did not hear the answer.

The Chairman: The answer was that they had heard this statement made. They prefer to let it stand at that for the moment.

Senator Inman: With reference to your recommendation 6, since census data is obtained only every ten years, why does the Canadian Teachers' Federation not recommend that provincial departments of education obtain family background information on children attending school. Do you think it would help if they were included in the census?

Miss Channon: The family background of children? It is included in the census, but the analyses are not necessarily made in this form. They have information on children attending and not attending school, the years of schooling and so on. They could relate this to the income of parents and so on, but they tend not to do this kind of analysis, which it seems they could do with the computers presently available.

Senator Inman: On page 20, in paragraph 40 you speak about children going to different schools, and how they may feel greatly different. In smaller communities all children go to one school; there is no separation, there are not two schools; they all go to one school. I am thinking of my own province of Prince Edward Island—perhaps some of you may know it. In a community of, say, 2,500 people, children go to the same school and mix all the time. Do you not think this is a good thing?

Brother Brennan: Yes. I think the point we make in the brief is that one of our major problems is the urban poor, because they represent such a large group.

It is the urban group who unfortunately are confined to their own ghetto, if you wish. The same situation would not be true in smaller towns such as you suggest. The urban poor are congregated, unfortunately, in areas of the city from which more affluent people have moved.

Senator Inman: I think it would be a good thing if they did mix, because small children do not sense any difference.

Miss Channon: I think there is some evidence to show that where the children of poor and affluent parents attend the same school they may not mix at all, for various reasons, even so simple a reason as the quality of the clothing, or the parents at home saying, "Don't play with So-and-So."

Mr. Goble: I should like to emphasize the point made by Senator Inman, which I think is a very good one. The mixing of children from the earliest days in school provides the best chance of genuinely equal facilities. One of our supporting studies is, in fact, on Prince Edward Island. That study illustrates the other aspect to the point you were making, senator, that even in Prince Edward Island there are tendencies for communities of poor and rich to separate. I believe this bears out that this trend towards separation into rich and poor leads to one of the most grievous forms of deprivation suffered by the poor.

Senator Inman: Can you tell me how you define that difference? They all go to the same schools there.

Mr. Goble: In the city, according to the evidence of the observational study we have received from Prince Edward Island, even there—I say "even there" because Charlottetown is not one of the larger urban centres in Canada; certainly it does not compare with the large industrial cities of, for example, southern Ontario—even in that situation there are already dangerous tendencies because of the pattern of habitation for colonies of the affluent and colonies of the poor to develop distinctive schools.

Senator Inman: Do they all still use the same schools?

Mr. Goble: To a degree.

Brother Brennan: The same schools in the sense of the same system. It was interesting to note, after having a conversation with a chap from England, that they are introducing composite schools there. These are supposed to take the place of the old grammar schools and be academically exclusive, if not economically so. My informant mentioned that in the city where he lived they had a number of these composite schools. They have been in force only a few years, but already there is a certain polarization of the poor into one or two of the schools. I suppose this is mainly because of the fact that the poor live in one part of the town and the wealthy in the other.

The very purpose of these composite schools was to break down the social stratification. I suppose the old grammar schools which they had were setting up social and academic ratification. He also said that of the schools which had been in operation four or five years, the social stratification was beginning to take place already.

Senator Inman: Within the school?

Brother Brennan: Yes.

Senator Fergusson: I am afraid we are talking about the Maritime Provinces. I wonder if the federation has any recent information in regard to the New Brunswick schools where they are closing so many of the small ones and taking the children into regional schools. Do you think this will have any change in the tendency?

Miss Channon: In the study from New Brunswick it suggests that the inequalities have been reduced within the last three years through the consolidation of schools.

Senator Fergusson: I have read this report but I have not seen anything within the last few years following the Byrne Report, because we have done more in this line.

Miss Channon: You mean the study in here was not recent? It was material in this report referring to New Brunswick and it only referred to the time of the Byrne Report coming in.

Mr. Goble: We are at the mercy of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as far as this publication is concerned.

Miss Channon: The person who made this study on New Brunswick had a difficult time finding comparative distinctions—one poorer than the other. When he found two schools he used the one which had the highest number of poor students, fewer facilities and one which did not seem to have any kind of library, whereas the one in the somewhat more affluent area did have. Basically the facilities appeared to be much more equalized.

Senator Inman: In the middle of page 26 you say:

It is therefore the feeling within the Canadian Teachers' Federation that greater provision should be made for the establishment of kindergarten. . .

How far would you suggest that governments should go in establishing pre-school programs and kindergartens, and would you suggest that they accommodate all children irrespective of whether they come from poor or more affluent families?

Miss Channon: I believe that the teachers would strongly support the establishment of kindergartens for all children. In that paragraph we were simply thinking in terms of allocation of resources immediately, and that there should be some positive attempt on the part of the school boards to provide kindergartens for the children who need them the most.

Senator Inman: This would be attached to the school?

Miss Channon: Yes.

Mr. Goble: There is a good deal of evidence to indicate that junior kindergartens are very important to children in poor areas of cities where they need to be brought up to the level of the children from more well-to-do homes. Again, if we had to have priorities we would say that the money should be spent on pre-school education for the poorer children, simply to help them catch up.

Senator Fournier: I have to admit my guilt in not reading the report. This is what happens when you wait until the last minute. It is a large report and I was planning to wait until the weekend, but I found that it was necessary for me to go to New Brunswick to attend three business meetings.

I was going to follow Senator Carter's questions, but I see that he has just about given up. He has not made too much headway. I am not surprised, because as a former teacher there is nothing more confusing than disagreement between members when attending teachers' association meetings. This is where you find the largest group of people with very little knowledge of the society and what is going on outside of the schools, as well as very little knowledge of government operations.

The brief is similar to what I was expecting, making recommendations that come out of books, surveys, and so on, but not really coming to the point of what we want to know. As Senator Carter mentioned, we are facing problems in welfare and education which are increasing by leaps and bounds. The country is facing problems with hospitalization, medicare and heavy taxation, as well as poverty.

You cannot open a newspaper today without seeing a request by teachers for more money. In reading of the salaries which some of these teachers get, I feel that some may be out of proportion. I do believe that teachers should be well paid for the work they do, but I emphasize the form of the work. I have yet to read of one teachers' association which is making a bid for more money and which is ready to add to the services they give. School boards should impose certain obligations on the teaching personnel. Commenting in a lighter vein, I do not think in most cases we have the teachers we used to have. This is due to teachers being overpaid and this applies to New Brunswick as well.

Through the teachers' associations we have spent a lot of time at annual conventions. In my province they are usually held around Easter week. We used to take part in these "free days" for the New Brunswick Teachers' Association, the NBTA. I was the President for two years of the NBVI for the Province of New Brunswick. There was quite a contrast between the first meeting I attended when I started to teach, and the last one. I could see the change in that 14-year period. The first meetings were dedicated to improving the curriculums and methods of teaching, as well as improving the standard of teacher. The last few years the teachers' meetings have reminded me very much of union meetings. Everyone talks in terms of more money and easier work. It results in a lot of people becoming disgusted and dissatisfied. Nevertheless, the point remains the same. The cost of education in every province across Canada has gone almost beyond ways and means of taking care of it.

Senator Carter tried to pursue the use of these school buildings. It is true enough that there is no company in existence in the world who would spend millions and millions of dollars to build a factory which would operate for five or six hours a day. In the schools we do that.

There was some discussion about using the schools, having morning and afternoon classes and a word was mentioned by one lady when she said there was a problem of "air conditioning" in the schools. That was one term which was used. It is one of the obstructions that we find. This is typical of what we find within the school system, through the teachers. In my days, they did not care much about air conditioning in our schools.

Senator Fergusson: You did not have school in the middle of the summer.

Senator Fournier: Well, now, we were working very hard, believe me we were working. We would much prefer to be in school than to be out in the fields. On the question of air conditioning, I am not serious about that, as I do not think it is a serious matter. I do not think it is obstruction, but the fact that it is mentioned reflects on the attitude of the teachers when we get into this argument.

Senator Carter says the money has to come out of the 20 million people, but I would like to tell the senator that it does not come out of the 20 million people but out of 8 million people because there are only 8 million taxpayers or scarcely even that number.

Another thing which is very bad, as far as I am concerned. In my days, I belonged to the teachers' association. In those first few years that I was in it there was never any talk about teachers striking, because the teachers were a model of society. In order to be a teacher you had to be a model in your own community. Even your private life was affected, because what you do at night, with whom you associate, whether you go to the pool room or what you do, your children will come back in the morning and say "I saw my teacher last night, he was there, or she was there." All these things reflected on the society and on the children.

This is something of the past. I was talking about strikes. If we had this mentioned about strikes—Senator Carter mentioned about children going on strike now. Naturally children are going to strike because they copy what the teachers are doing. The children are going to strike and say that they will not go to school in the morning, because the teacher said something they do not like or because they do not like the principal, we do not like this and we are going to strike for two or three days, and if we do not succeed we will break the furniture, we will break the glass and so on. Who gave the example, in the first place?

The Chairman: Senator Fournier, let us . . .

Senator Fournier: I am making a lecture and not asking questions, but this is all related to this society and related to this question we have before us. The result of it is the cost of education is alarming to everybody. The cost of transportation in my province is high—where we have to transport people 35 to 40 miles in busses, and where we are going I do not really know. I cannot answer the question.

The Chairman: Brother, have you some views?

Brother Brennan: I would like to discuss this matter with the honourable senator, because I have very definite views on it; but I think it is a little bit off the topic we are discussing.

The Chairman: Yes, we have not the time today.

Brother Brennan: If there are any comments on the brief, we will be glad to respond to them.

Senator McGrand: I do not want to re-thresh old straw, that we have been discussing. Nevertheless there is a point which and I think Senator Fournier had a point in his view. I am going to ask this question. This is not a question I had prepared but a question which developed out of the conversation this morning. If teachers accept the concept that the school was part of the community and if they accept that the school is part of the community, what effect does it have on the spirit of the community when teachers go on strike? Then you come down to this. In most of these schools, when these students that go on strike, I have a feeling that most of those who go on strike come from the schools in the upper class and middle class areas. Now, here is the point. How does this relate to the re-orientation of the poor, and apart from that I have no other views at the moment.

Miss Hodgins: I would like to point out that the Ontario Teachers Federation policy is opposed to strikes. The discussion of strikes, it seems to me . . .

Senator McGrand: I am not talking about the right to strike. I am talking about these other things—if the teachers strike, and the pupils strike, how does that affect that re-orientation of the poor people? It is the poor people we are talking about. Does it have any effect on them?

Miss Hodgins: I do not think so.

Senator McGrand: Very well. Then you have answered the question.

On page 3 of your brief you mentioned "the overall question of stratification and social class is extremely complex." The work "stratification" has been brought up two or three times this morning. Does this reference to stratification, as you use it—this is the word "stratification"—stratify—is rather a permanent structure in this business. Does that mean that we can develop a sort of caste system in which the poor belong to a caste? You mentioned that in Prince Edward Island you have that problem—it even happens there, and in other places, that poor people are segregated, even within the school structure of the building. Can you see the emergence of a caste system coming?

Miss Channon: If you look at caste systems, you find that the distinguishing characteristic is that it is a legal position that you are not allowed to get out of; and I do not see that as developing in our society, not in terms of a caste as you find it in India.

Senator McGrand: Then you cannot use the word "stratify" either, because that belongs to geology. You are using the word "stratify", which is a rather strong word, so I am using the word "caste", because that is a strong word.

Miss Hodgins: There certainly seems to be a development, and I am quite certain you have heard this discussed in your discussions throughout Canada, poor people tend to perpetuate their poverty. You have had these statistics indicating that families "inherit" welfare, and families of three generations will be on welfare.
